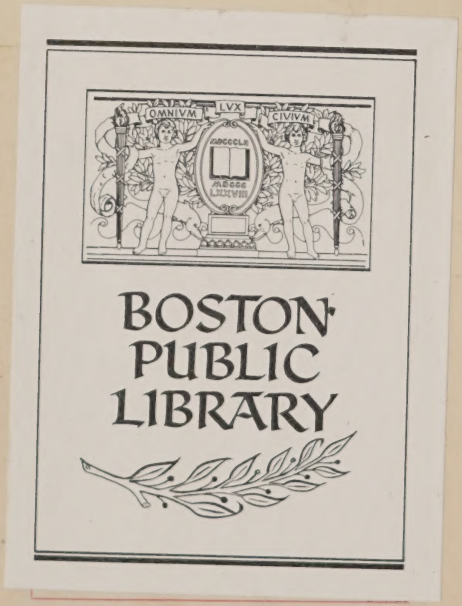
Boston Public Library
3 9999 10588 670 7

PRESENTED TO

THE MALDEN PUBLIC LIBRARY,

BY E. F. BICKFORD.

Malden, Oct. 1st, 1885.



The Nation:

A Weekly Journal

DEVOTED TO

Politics, Literature, Science, and Art.

VOLUME VI.

New York:
E. L. GODKIN & CO., PUBLISHERS.
1868.

Periodical
AP2
.N2

CONTENTS OF VOLUME VI.

10576

The Week.

AT HOME.

Alabama election, 142, 162—Arkansas election, 302.

Brien, Judge, fights Senator Corry, 2—Gen. Butler's speech at Richmond, 42, challenge received, 82, his repudiation meridian, 262—Judge Busteed shot by Martin, 42, accused of ignorance, tyranny, and corruption, 482—Mr. George Bemis's reply to "Historicus," 242—Sergeant Bates reaches Washington, 302—President Buchanan's death, 443—Butler to be reconciled with Grant, 502.

Conventions of the Southern States, 142, 182, 242—New Constitution of New York, 182—Connecticut election, 281—Chicago Convention to meet, 403, Proceedings, 421 Convention of Radical Missouri editors, 442—Chief-Justice Chase and the Democratic nomination, 462—Chase movement receives its quietus, 482—Catholic Church endowed by N. Y. State Legislature, 363.

Congress:—Assembles, Senator Thomas's disloyalty, Mr. Boutwell's new scheme of reconstruction, 21—Senate reinstates Stanton, 41—Senate encourages inflationists, 42—Legislating against the President, 41—Whiskey tax and penalty, Mr. Brooks on negro anatomy, 43—Fernando Wood reprimanded, House passes new reconstruction bill, Mr. Bingham's speech, 61—Mr. Bingham and Mr. Eldridge, 62—House passes Supreme Court bill, Reconstruction bill in Senate, Doolittle's and Trumbull's speeches, 81—Banks's report on indefeasible allegiance, Mr. Ingersoll as an inflationist, 82—Senate discusses Reconstruction Bill No. 4, Banks's bill on expatriation, 101—Retrenchments, 102—Alabama constitution rejected, 121—"Special diplomatic agents," 122—Bingham's Alabama bill, 141—Senate rejects Thomas, of Maryland, 162—Committee on Retrenchment report on frauds, 202—Mr. Van Wyck's report, 242—New Alabama bill, Bill depriving Supreme Court of appellate jurisdiction, 262—Passage of the Amendatory Bankrupt bill, 341—Blackguardism in the House, 361—Gen. Butler's reply to Brooks's Alta Vela resolution, 362—House passes bill admitting Arkansas, 381—House Committee on Foreign Affairs report for the purchase of Alaska, 403—Butler's report on corruption of Senators, 422—Progress of the corruption investigation, 441—Mr. Schenck's financial statement introducing the new Tax bill, 442—Wooley's disclosure, 461—Mr. Woodward's resolutions concerning the late President Buchanan, 462—Passage of the bill admitting the Carolinas, Georgia, Florida, Alabama; Tax bill recommitted, Butler's reasons for opposing the bill, Reverdy Johnson Minister to England, 481—Civil Service bill postponed, 482—Arkansas bill passed over President's veto, Arkansas senators sworn in, Mr. Schenck's new Tax bill and rate of tax on whiskey, House Committee report on railroads, 501—House Committee on Judge Field, 502.

Delmar's "financial" statistics, 22—Dickens Press dinner, 322, 342—"D. R. Anthony and others" telegram to Senator Ross, 443.

Erskine, Judge, abused by Robert Toombs, 22—Erie War legal tactics, 263.

Field, Judge, under "enquiry," 102—Financial Report of Chicago Common Council, 162, Financial plank of Indiana Republican State Convention, 162—Free-trade meeting in New York, 402—Senator Fowler and Gen. Butler, 502.

Grant: nomination by business men, 1; views on impeachment as announced by the Tribune; charged with drunkenness by Mr. Phillips, 282—German "I.P.P." 43—German immigration—Greenbacks as a Southern panacea, 63—Grant-Johnson Correspondence, 102, 122—Gold-market as affected by impeachment, 182—Garfield's speech on the financial situation, 402.

Hoffman, Mayor, at the New England Dinner, 2—Horace Greeley's absence from N. Y. Constitutional Convention, 163.

Impeachment: Johnson's message defending appointment of Gen. Thomas, 161; public feeling, Mr. Stevens and the abuse of the appointing power, 181; Senate debates on the rules of procedure, 182; differences between Senate and Chief-Justice, 201; Judge Chase's electioneering reacts upon him, 222; titles of the impeachers, 223, 283; President's reply to Managers' charges, 241; Butler's opening speech, 263; Mr. Sumner on Chief-Justice's right to vote, 281; comparative demeanor of Managers and President's counsel, Judge Curtis's speech for defence, and arguments on admitting Gen. Sherman's testimony, 301; Stevens and Logan refused permission to make speeches, 321; Speeches of Boutwell, Nelson, and Stevens, 341; rumors of a vote by ballot, 342; speeches of Bingham and Evarts, 361, 362; verdict postponed, 381; reasons for and effects of acquittal, 382; defeat of XIth article, 401; Senate discusses the accusations of bribery; abuse of Trumbull, Fessenden, and Grimes, 402; Senate adjourns as a court, 422—Independent discards Judge Chase as Republican candidate for the Presidency, 342; Illinois on repudiation, 382.

Ku-Klux Klan operations, 283; one of its circulars, 302.

Logan's attack on the Treasury Department, 223.

Mexican Congress convenes, 2—Gen. Meade's conduct in Georgia; Humphrey Marshall's "views" on finance, 62—Manufacturers' Convention, 83—Michigan, Ohio, and Wisconsin elections, 282—Michigan constitutional election, 322.

Negro insurrections that did not come off, 1—New Hampshire election, 202, 221, 261—Negro's influence on the white mind, 262.

Ohio election, 102, 282.

Pope and Ord removed, 1—Wendell Phillips "catches up" with the Nation, 42; accuses Grant of drunkenness, 282, 303—Pennsylvania Republicans and Senator Cameron, 302—President vetoes Arkansas bill, 502.

Raymond's, H. J., reasons for attending the Philadelphia Convention, 2—Reconstruction summary, 123, 330, 341, 382—Repudiation: prospects, 203; the West not all for it, 263; in Illinois, 382—Commissioner Rollins resigns; why Senator Ross is persecuted longest by the impeachers, 482.

Sherman's, Gen., report on the Indians, 22—Secretary Stanton reinstated, 41; resigns, 421—Supreme Court bill, 62, 82—Supreme Court's decision in Mississippi (McCardle) and Georgia cases, 41, 121—Senator Sherman's Consolidation bill, 142—Thaddeus Stevens's reflections on the Declaration of Independence, 222—South Carolina and Arkansas elections, 302—Seymour's Birthday Dinner and Belmont's March letter, 362—Collector Smythe makes no reply to Thurlow Weed, 442.

Tribune's Washington letter on Presidential prospects, 21; reasons for Reconstruction Bill No. 4, 101; language towards Horatio Seymour, 322; course on impeachment, 402—George Francis Train's arrest in Ireland, 63—Minister Thornton's reception, 122—Mr. Trumbull's bill limiting political jurisdiction of Supreme Court, 142—Times (N. Y.) on taxation of Government bonds, 142, 202, 203; on reporting the Dickens Dinner, 343; on the question, Who is the "criminal" produced by the impeachment trial? 403.

Walker, Hon. Robt. J., on St. Thomas and St. John Islands, 122—Ward's, Mr. Sam, letter to World in the Wooley corruption affair, 422—Wisconsin election, 282.

Yo-Semite Valley sacrificed to "good-nature," 163—Yo-Semite Valley before Congress, 502.

ABROAD.

England:—Fenianism: Irish reform and Greek fire, 2; Clerkenwell explosion, 23; robbing gun-shops, 83; public mind clearing, 103; trials of Barrett and Burke 403; attempted assassination of Prince Alfred in Australia, 343 colonial horror and consequent treason-felony bill, 462—Vernon Harcourt ("Historicus") on laws of allegiance, 2; on "mixed jury," 103; worsted by Pall Mall Gazette, 242; discussion with Lord Hobart on Alabama case, 122—Arbitration between masters and workmen, 22; Briggs and Crossley's successes in co-operation, 163; "National Labor Parliament" to be held in London, 243; masters file a bill in chancery against Riley and Butterworth, 323; colliers' strike, 382; story of the Briggs colliery, 463; J. W. Hill's speech at meeting of Trades' Union Council, 383—Gladstone's speeches, 23—Declaration of Catholic clergy, 63—Lord Stanley and the land question in Ireland, the Queen's book, 83—Minister Adams resigns, 122; absent from royal reception for want of court costume, 242—Protestants defending the Church in Ireland; Cambridge University examinations for girls, 163—Debate in the House on Alabama claims; Lord Russell's and J. S. Mill's pamphlets on Irish question, 203—English press on Disraeli's promotion; Gladstone's resolutions to abolish Church Establishment in Ireland; movement to establish a female university, 243—Defeat of Disraeli on Irish Church question, 283—Duke of St. Albans on Suez ship-canal, 343—Abolition of flogging in army and proxies in House of Lords; speeches of Stanley, Disraeli, and Gladstone on Irish Church, 323—Interview between Disraeli and the Queen; public meeting for women's rights at Manchester; Prince of Wales visits Ireland, 343—Queen's reply to House of Commons, 403—Prince Czartoryski's speech before Polish Historical Society, London, 423—Disraeli abandons resistance to Irish Church bill, 443—Report of British Commission on the neutrality laws; Parliament to be dissolved; Governor Eyre to contest Mr. Mill's seat, 483—The Queen's coronation oath and the Irish Church bill, 503.

France:—Military preparations; Italy never to have Rome, 3; M. Dupanloup on the higher education of women, 3, 103; M. Duruy on the same, 23; the Pope on the same, 182—Moustier vs. Rouher, 23—Army bill, 23, 63, 83, 103—Almanach de Coöpération, 143—M. Magne's statement; Chevalier's speech against Army bill, 143—Press bill, 143, 163, 183, 223, 263; debated in Senate, 423—Financial revelations, 183; Plée's "Curiosities of the Budget," 423—M. Kervéguen's charges of press corruption, 223; exploded, 243—Post-office and foreign newspapers, 263; "Les Titres de la Dynastie Napoléonienne," 283—French applications for American naturalization papers, 303—Petition of French clergy concerning materialistic teachings, 343; defeated in Senate, 483—Jules Favre on the Academy, 383—Opposition delight at English success in Abyssinia, 403—M. Thiers's speech on Anglo-French commercial treaty, 443; M. Pouyer-Quertier on protection, 462; M. Rouher's reply, 463—Difference between Marshal MacMahon and Archbishop of Algiers, 463, 483—French debt and Haussmann's extravagance, 503.

Germany:—Mr. Bancroft's treaty with North German Confederation, 303—Bismark on naturalization, 343—Uneasiness in relations of France and Prussia, 423, 4-3—Austrian treaty with Customs Parliament, 443; close of the Parliament, and banquets to members, 483.

Italy:—Deplorable condition, 3—Ratazzi's career, 23—Budget and deficit for 1868, 63—Signora Mozzoni on the woman question, 103—Cambray-Digny's financial statement, 123, 333; Opposition endeavor to abolish legal-tender paper, 183; speeches of Mamiani and Berti, and rise of Cambray-Digny in public estimation, 363; his triumph in passing three tax-bills, 483—Consul Cushman with the Papal Zouaves, 203—Infatuation of the Pope; financial condition, 223—Education in Florence, 503.

European armaments; Turkish fortifications and bonds, 43; Eastern question, 123—Greek politicians, 223; Panslavic movement, 382—Russia's financial embarrassments, 163—Cretan representatives at Athens, The Sultan's "Grand Council," 503.

Notes.

Literary—10, 30, 51, 71, 90, 110, 132, 150, 169, 193, 210, 232, 251, 273, 289, 312, 329, 351, 371, 392, 411, 431, 452, 470, 493, 511.

Scientific—112, 233, 314.

Literature.

Agassiz in Brazil, - - - - - - 153

Animals and Plants under Domestication, The Variation of, - - - 234

Anthropology, The Progress of, - - 113

Badeau's Grant, - - - - - - 152

Barnes's History of the XXXIXth Congress, - - - - - 414

Beecher's, Mr., Novel, - - - - 274

Bremer's, Fredrika, Life, - - - - 474

Browne's Sketch of the Official Life of John A. Andrew, - - - - - 472

Coffee, A History of, - - - - - 275

Confucius, - - - - - - - 52

Deaf-Mute Controversy, Probable Settlement of the, - - - - - 475

Dervishes, The, - - - - - - 172

Dyer's Kings of Rome, - - - - 423

Egypt's Place in History, - - - - 514

Gail Hamilton on Woman's Wrongs, 116

Gale's Upper Mississippi, - - - 256

German Settlers of New York, The, - 252

Goldwin Smith's Three English Statesmen, - - - - - - 136

Greece, The Political Condition of, - 33

Greene, General, - - - - - 92

Hinton's Historical Costumes, - - 92

Howells's Italian Journeys, - - - 11

Huguenots in England, The, - - - 32

Invisible Poison, - - - - - - 394

Jennings, Mr., on Republican Government in the United States, - - 133

Johnson's "Wonder-Working Providence," - - - - - - 115

Kirk's "Charles the Bold," - - - 512

Lacordaire, Father, - - - - - 53

Languages, Mastery of, - - - - 293

Light and Health, - - - - - - 174

Linda Tressel, - - - - - - 494

Magazines for January, - - - - 13

" " February, - - - - 93

" " March, - - - - - 173

" " April, - - - - - 254

" " May, - - - - - 353

" " June, - - - - - 434

" " July, - - - - - 514

Malcom's Theological Index, - - - 253

Manners of the Day," in Paris, "The, 73

Modern Street Ballads of Ireland, - 135

Moss's, Mr., Christian Commission, - 114

Motley's Netherlands, - - - - 170

Nathan the Wise, - - - - - - 12

Newport as it Was, - - - - - 213

North American Review for January, 75

" " " April, - 333

"Owen Meredith's" Chronicles and Characters, - - - - - - 393

Physiologics, - - - - - - - 315

Poodle-Prince, The, - - - - - 413

Recent Republications, 55, 76, 95, 154, 175, 456, 476, 496.

Sainte-Beuve's Portraits, - - - 454
Siege Artillery at Richmond, - - 293
South American Statesman, A, - - 291
Spiritual Exposition at Paris, The, - 413
Spiritual Wives, - - - - - 213
St. Bartholomew, The Massacre of, - 332
Taine's Italy, - - - - - 373
"Temple House," - - - - 74
Tennyson's New Poem, - - - 352
Two Thousand Miles on Horseback, 35

Books.

(The Italics indicate the lesser notices.)

Æneid of Virgil, The, - - - - 376
Agriculture, Elements of, - - - 496
Andrew, John A., Sketch of the Official Life of, - - - - - - 472
Anglo-Saxon for Beginners, A Manual of, - - - - - - - 257
Anthracite and Health, - - - - 295
Anthropologie en France, Rapport sur les Progrès de l', - - - - 113
Artist's Dream, The, - - - - 495
Bankrupt Law of the United States, The - - - - - - - - 316
Beaver and his Works, The American, 176
Brazil, A Journey in, - - - - 153
Bremer, Fredrika; Life, Letters, and Posthumous Works of, - - - 474
Butterfly Hunters, The, - - - - 496
Café, Essai sur l'Histoire de, - - - 275
Cakes and Ale at Woodbine, - - - 375
Charles the Bold, History of, - - - 512
Chemistry, A Manual of Inorganic, - 176
Childhood, The Story of my, - - - 95
Child-Pictures from Dickens, - - - 154
Chimney Corner, The, - - - - 334
Christian Commission, Annals of the United States, - - - - - 214
College, the Market, and the Court, The, - - - - - - - - 154
Comedy of Convocation in the English Church, The. - - - - - - 76
Comtesse de Châlis, La, - - - - 73
Concord and Merrimac Rivers, A Week on the, - - - - - - - 55
Confucius, The Life and Teachings of, 52
Conscience et la Foi, La, - - - - 336
Costumes, Select Historical, - - - 92
Deaf-mutes, Various works relating to the Education of, - - - - 475
Derbishes, The, - - - - - - 172
Deutschen Einwanderung in Amerika, Geschichte der, - - - - - - 15
Deutschen im Staate New York, Geschichte der, - - - - - - 252
Doctor Wilmer's Love, - - - - 36
East, The Far, - - - - - - 95
Egypt's Place in History, - - - - 514
Eighty Years of Republican Government in the United States, - - - 133
England, A Smaller History of, - - 155
Exhibition, The Great, - - - - 196
Farming for Boys, - - - - - 496
Father Tom and the Pope, - - - - 155
French Country Family, A, - - - 196
French in Mexico, With the, - - - 196
French Instruction, Condensed, - - 96
Gemma, - - - - - - - - 157
German Emigration in America, History of, - - - - - - - 253
German Language, An Elementary Grammar of the, - - - - - 116
Grammatical Diagrams, defended and improved, etc. - - - - 296
Grant, Ulysses S., Military History of, 152
Greece, - - - - - - - - 33
Greek Elements, - - - - - - 96
Greene, Nathanael, The Life of, - - 92
Hebrew Language, Practical Grammar of the, - - - - - - 455
Horseback, Two Thousand Miles on, 35
Horse Portraiture, - - - - - 37
Huguenot Family in the English Village, The, - - - - - - - 32
Huguenots, The, - - - - - - 32
Human Physiology, A Treatise on, - 315
Italian Journeys, - - - - - - 11
Italy, - - - - - - - - 373
Journal of our Life in the Highlands from 1848 to 1861, Leaves from, - 137
King Sham, - - - - - - - 455
Kings of Rome, The History of the, 433
Kitty's Class Day, - - - - - 336
Lacordaire, The inner Life of the Very Reverend Père, - - - - - 53
Lady Alice, - - - - - - - 294
Landmarks of History, - - - - 294
Law Register, The, - - - - - 296
Layman's Breviary, The, - - - - 16
Light, - - - - - - - - 174
Linda Tressel, - - - - - - 494
Lost Galleon, The, - - - - - 333
Lover's Dictionary, The, - - - - 37
Lucretius, - - - - - - - 352
Man: Where, Whence, and Whither? - 516
Mann, Horace, Life and Works of, - 55
Massacre of St. Bartholomew, The, - 332
Mastery of Languages, The, - - - 293
Mathematics, The Philosophy of, - - 355
Maximilian I., Life of, - - - - 215
Men of the Times, - - - - - 175
Merchants' and Bankers' Almanac for 1866, - - - - - - - 476
Microscope, History of the, - - - 156
Mississippi, Upper, - - - - - 296
Mots, Das Loch, - - - - - - 336
Mozart, - - - - - - - - 335
My Husband's Crime, - - - - - 375
Nathan the Wise, - - - - - - 12
Netherlands, History of the United, 393
New Poems, - - - - - - - 352
Newport, Early Recollections of, - - 213
Nile Tributaries of Abyssinia, Exploration of the, - - - - - - 476
Norwood, - - - - - - - - 275
Not Wisely but Too Well, - - - - 415
Ohio in the War, - - - - - - 256
O-Kee-pa, - - - - - - - - 98
Old Mam'selle's Secret, The, - - - 455
Paez, General José Antonio, Autobiography of, - - - - - - - 291
Poetry of Compliment and Courtship, The, - - - - - - - - 156
Portraits of Celebrated Women, - - 413
Prince Noncche, Le, - - - - - 73
Prisons, My, - - - - - - - 95
Progrès des Lettres et des Sciences en France, Recueil de Rapports sur les, - - - - - - - 413
Reading Honor, - - - - - - 216
Reconstruction Measures of the Thirty-ninth and Fortieth Congresses, History of the, - - - - - - 455
Robinson Crusoe in Words of One Syllable, - - - - - - - - 496
Roman Catholic Church and Free Thought, - - - - - - - - 95
Romance of Charity, The, - - - - 256
Salons de Paris, Les, - - - - - 33
Sazo, A Tale: Poems of, - - - - 476
Scientific Discovery, Annual of, - - 277
Scott, Poetical Works of, - - - - 476
Sermon de la Montagne, Les Origines du, - - - - - - - - 316
Siege Artillery in the Campaigns against Richmond, - - - - - 293
Sister's Bye-Hours, A, - - - - - 376
Special Operations of War, The, - - 493
Spirit of '76, The, - - - - - 277
Spiritual Wives, - - - - - - 213
Stella, - - - - - - - - - 33
Street Ballads, - - - - - - - 135
Swetchine, Madame, Life and Letters of, - - - - - - - - 14
Tam O'Shanter, - - - - - - - 16
Temple House, - - - - - - - 74
Theological Index, - - - - - - 283
Theoretical Astronomy, - - - - - 375
Thirty-ninth Congress of the United States, History of the, - - - 414
Three English Statesmen, - - - - 136
Time and Tide by Weare and Tyne, - - 296
Tom Brown at Oxford, - - - - - 296
Turk and the Greek, The, - - - - 16
Variation of Animals and Plants under Domestication, The, - 234, 456
Vathek, - - - - - - - - 456
Ventilation, Lectures on, - - - - 394
Vision, The, - - - - - - - 155
Voice in Singing, The, - - - - - 155
Völkerrecht der civilisirten Staaten, Das Moderne, - - - - - - 197
Voyage Alone in the Yawl "Rob Roy," The, - - - - - - - 476
Vulgarisms and Other Errors of Speech, - - - - - - - - 415
Waldemar Krone's Youth, The Story of, - - - - - - - - 395
Waverley Novels, - - - - - - 196
Where is the City? - - - - - - 510
Woman's Wrongs, - - - - - - 11
Wonder-working Providence of Sion's Saviour in New England, - - - 115

Editorial and Miscellaneous Articles.

Alabama Controversy, The, - - - 126
American, Literature Truly, - - - 7
American Manners, Deterioration in, 87
American Novel, The Great, - - - 27
Authors versus Readers, - - - - 147
Beauty of American Editors, The, - 346
Bondholders, The Duty of the, - - 185
Bondholders? Who are the, - - - 104
Brougham, Lord, - - - - - - 386
Chase, Chief-Justice, and the Democrats, - - - - - - - - 464
Chinese Embassy to Christendom, The, - - - - - - - - 145
Church Militant, The, - - - - - 485
Civil Service Bill, The, - - - - 425
Commercial Morality in America and in England, - - - - - - 24
Congress and the Freedmen, - - - 84
Congress and the Supreme Court, - - 44
Constitution of New York, The Proposed, - - - - - - - - 227
Constitution of the Southern States, The New, - - - - - - - 405
"Cowards!" Who are the, - - - - 64
Crisis at Washington, The, - - - - 164
Criticism of Senators, - - - - - 466
Democratic Homes, - - - - - - 128
Democratic Party Wants, What the, - 505
Democrats, The Uses of Adversity to the, - - - - - - - - 365
Diplomatic Service, The American, - 165
Dress Question, The Great, - - - 207
Duty of Doing One's Best, The, - - 409
Earth Hunger, The, - - - - - - 4
Entertaining Miscellany, An, - - - 489
Evarts, Mr., and his Traducers, - - 408
Executive, A New View of the, - - 66
Expatriation, The Right of, - - - 26
Feminism, The Latest Phase of, - - 5
Finance in Europe, - - - - - - 384
Financial Muddle, The, - - - - 484
Financial Prospect, The, - - - - 504
"Finis Poloniæ," - - - - - - 385
"Flippancy," - - - - - - - 48
France, The Condition of, - - - - 325
Garfield's, General, Speech on the Currency, - - - - - - - 445
Grant and Chase, - - - - - - 507
Heralds in Congress, - - - - - 369
"High-Toned Gentleman," The, - - 206
Humanitarianism, - - - - - - 68
Impeachment Prospect, The, - - - 184
Impeachment Trial, - - - - - - 304
" " Eloquence of the, - 366
" " Evidence in the, - 324
" " Probable Effect of the, - - - - - - 344
" " Result of the, - - 404
Impeachment? What was the, - - - 384
Inflation and the West, - - - - - 187
Inflation in its Relation to the Money Market, - - - - - - - 124
Irish Church Establishment, The Fall of the, - - - - - - - - 285
Jersey Railroad and the Dwight Accident, The, - - - - - - - 247
Jews, The Reform Movement among the, - - - - - - - - 488
Journalistic Dramshops, - - - - 428
Judge, The, - - - - - - - - 46
Judicial Independence, - - - - - 446
Judiciary under Discussion, The, - 6
"Judicials" in Journalism, The, - - 105
Life Insurance, A National Bureau of, 306
Literature of the Sanctum, - - - - 166
Magic of Constitutions, The, - - - 244
Mill, Mr. J. S., on the Irish Difficulty, 305
Mind 's the Standard of the Man, The, 448
New Field for Fanatics, A, - - - - 385
New Hampshire Election, The Situation since the, - - - - - - 224
Novel, The Decline of the, - - - - 389
Odd Story, An, - - - - - - - 87
Official Salaries, - - - - - - 508
Organization of Culture, - - - - - 486
Panslavism, - - - - - - - 388, 426
"Poems of Readings," The, - - - 269
Photography in Politics, - - - - - 248
Platform and the Nominations, The, - 424
Political Criticism, The Object of, - 228
Political Current, The, - - - - - 124
Political Prospect in Europe, The, - 65
Popular Movements, - - - - - - 427
Population, The Law of, - - - - - 286
Precious Opportunity, A, - - - - - 326
Presidential Campaign, The, - - - 444
President Test the Validity of a Law? How may the, - - - - - - 186
Press and the Rich Men, The, - - - 367
Railroad Fraternity, The, - - - - 406
Railroads are Badly Managed, One Reason why, - - - - - - - 464
Railroads, The Battle of the, - - - 245
Religious Liberty in Austria, - - - 345
Reconstruction, Good Sense about, - - 264
Reconstruction Process, The, - - - 144
Republican Party, Southern Influence on the, - - - - - - - - 24
Scandinavian Newspapers and Reviews, - - - - - - - - - 449
Senate and the People, The, - - - - 204
Simple Justice, - - - - - - - 265
Single Life Becoming more General? Why is, - - - - - - - - 190
Squandering the National Patrimony, 305
Soldier, The, - - - - - - - - 45
Supreme Court Bills, The, - - - - 85
Supreme Court to tue Union, The Use of the, - - - - - - - - 146
"Thoughtful Teetotaller," A Few Words with the, - - - - - - 327
Two Girls, - - - - - - - - - 107
Wade's, Mr., Arrangements, - - - - 364
Welle's Report, The Leading Facts of, 47
West and East—Debtor and Creditor, 225

Poetry.

Ariadne's Farewell, - - - - - - 107
Calm and Cold, - - - - - - - 8
Miserrimus, - - - - - - - - 267
Presence, - - - - - - - - - 206

Correspondence.

Anglo-Saxon Declensions, - - - - 273
Bagehot's, Mr., View of the Executive, 150
Bowdoin Pictures, The, - - - - 250
Chase and Grant, - - - - - - 510
Christian Commission, The, - - - 272
Civil Service Disgrace, The, - - - 491
Copyright and Patent Right, - - - 168
Dishonesty in Office, - - - - - 350
Dupanloup, Bishop, and Women's Education, - - - - - - - 71
Force, The late Peter, - - - - - 150
Found Out at Last, - - - - - - 470
Franklin's Court Dress, - - - - 288
Genesis of a Rumor, The, - - - - 328
Great Trees of California, The, - - 350
Greek Tables, Mr. Allen's, - - - 110
Impeachment, - - - - - - - 490
Italian Finances, - - - - - - 329
Minister's Troubles, A, - - - - 371
Money and the Ministry, - - - - 410
National Republican, - - - 209, 249
Nation's Conservatism, The, - - - 231
Nation's Radicalism, The, - - - 232
Old Book Catalogues, - - - - - 71
"Our Millionaires," - - - - - 370
President's Trial, The, - - - - - 193
"Red Tape" which is not "British," 492
Republican, The Illinois Republicans on, - - - - - - - - 391
Republican, The West and, - - - 311
" The West in Favor of, - - 350
Rose-wein, Bremen, - - - - - - 90
Smelt, The Propagation of, - - - 110
Supreme Court and Congress, The, - 150
Supreme Court Decisions, - - - - 231
Treaty-Making Power, The, - - - 349
Tribune and the Impeachment, The, 430
Tribune and "The Mistake," The, - 451
Trumbull's McFingal, - - - - - 251
Valuable Library to be Sold, A, - - 492
Wade's, Mr., Vote, - - - - - - 451
War between Heaven and Hell," "The - - - - - - - - - 101
West and Greenbacks, The, - - - 231
Western Antiquities, - - - - - 452
West in the Convention, The, - - - 431

Special Correspondence.

England—29, 69, 109, 148, 192, 230, 310, 348, 390, 429, 469, 509.
Two Debates in the House of Commons, - - - - - 270
France—Paris Gossip, - - - 8, 49, 88, 130
Italy—The Daily Press in, - - - - 129
Public Instruction in, - - 167
The Volunteers of 1867, - - 208
Italian Libraries, - - - - 287
What One Noble Family has done for, - - - - - - - 369
Russia—Russian Railroads and the Russian Press, - - - - - 271
Readings in the Russian Archives, - - - - - - - 468

Fine Arts.

Bowdoin College, Pictures at, - - - 56
National Academy of Design, Forty-Third Exhibition of the, - - 356, 376
Tickner & Fields's Lithographic Portrait of Dickens, - - - - - 56

ERRATA.

Page 1, date line, For "1867" read "1868."
" 3, second paragraph, For "Kervuegen" read "Kervéguen" wherever the name occurs.
" 389, second column, line 14, For "restorations" read "restoration." Line 25: for "Durham" read "Denham." Line 34: for "Calamella" read "Columella."
" 390, first column, line 24 from bottom, For "poem" read "form."

The Nation.

VOL. VI.—NO. 131. THURSDAY, JANUARY 2, 1867. { Five Dollars per Annum. Twelve Cents per Copy.

CONTENTS.

The Week 1

Editorial Articles:

The Earth-Hunger 4

The Latest Phase of Fenianism..... 5

The Judiciary under Discussion. ... 6

Literature Truly American..... 7

Calm and Cold: Poetry..... 8

Paris Gossip..... 8

Notes:

Literary. 10

Howells's Italian Journeys..... 11

Nathan the Wise..... 12

Magazines for January..... 13

Life and Letters of Madame Swetchine.—Geschichte der deutschen Einwanderung in Amerika.—The Layman's Breviary.—The Turk and the Greek.—Tam O'Shanter..... 14—16

Five Dollars per annum, in advance; Six months, Three Dollars; Forty Dollars to Clubs of Ten; Clergymen, Four Dollars.

The Nation is sent till positively ordered discontinued, and all arrears have been paid. Subscribers are particularly requested to note the expiration of their subscriptions, and to forward what is due for the ensuing year, with or without further reminder from this office.

George Street, 30 Cornhill, London, E. C., Agent for the Receipt of Subscriptions and Advertisements.

E. L. GODKIN & CO., PUBLISHERS, 130 NASSAU STREET, N. Y.

The Week.

The holidays have happily made political news scarce. Congressmen, being in the bosom of their families, have withdrawn their piercing gaze from the nations of the earth and their affairs. The Emperor Theodorus is apparently to be left to fight it out with the British without the help of belligerent rights; the Fenian interests are left uncared for; the national banks, the bondholders, the freedmen, and the rebels are all enjoying a respite. Mr. Johnson has said nothing of consequence for some time, and done nothing except remove Generals Ord and Pope; the reconstruction process goes on without interruption, no massacre of whites having been attempted by the blacks on Christmas day. The whites still continue to cry for the disfranchisement of the freedmen, and do appear to suffer occasional inconvenience from their voting. We wish, for our part, the freedmen were better educated; but the world turns round always in the one direction, and no crying or lamenting will make any change. The winter bids fair to be one of unusual gloom and depression everywhere. There is unquestionably great poverty and suffering in the South, which will undoubtedly complicate the political problem seriously. We know of nothing now so important for the reorganization of Southern society as a revival of industry and a rise in the price of cotton. The ballot is a great thing; but the natural man craves also beefsteak and potatoes.

Probably General Pope's radicalism is the cause of his removal. It must have been for a long time trying in the extreme to Mr. Johnson and elderly men in Georgia and Alabama. Whether General Meade will be willing to make their case any easier, or whether, with the new constitution formed and pretty sure to be ratified, he will be able to make it any easier, remains to be seen. We believe neither in his willingness nor his ability to give a different complexion to the reconstruction affairs of the Third District, but it is among the possibilities that the news of Pope's removal may, coming just at this time, affect the vote on the acceptance of the constitution. General Swayne, who, we suppose, has had in his hands the government of Alabama, and in whom General Pope must have found a sagacious counsellor and an able administrative officer, has also been removed, and there is little doubt was singled out by the President by advice of old Alabamians, who knew how powerful General Swayne had been both with Governor Patton, the Alabama legislature and convention, and with General Pope, and who knew how he had circumvented old Alabamian plans. Mr. Johnson's removal of him is a tribute to the thoroughgoing character of his Republicanism; yet he is not a Radical in any bad sense of that term. General Ord is said to have been removed at his own request. Little has been heard from his district. The Mississippi convention is elected, so is the Arkansas convention, and even if a less honest gentleman than General McDowell were going to take General Ord's place, we should have little fear that the Congressional scheme of reconstruction would be effectively interfered with. General Swayne's removal seems to be the most regrettable part of the business. Meade and McDowell do not badly replace Pope and Ord, but of all the four probably no one so well understands the duties of command in the South as General Swayne, and he might be of very much more service to the country while in Alabama than at Nashville as colonel of an infantry regiment.

The negro insurrection, which has been postponed from year to year for several years, failed of making its appearance this year also. We believe the terror on the part of the whites was not so heart-sickening on the Christmas just passed as on former occasions. The governor of Mississippi, however, got out an absurd proclamation. We do not know whether he is more to be pitied if he did or did not believe what he wrote. There was not the least disturbance in his State. In Mobile the insurrection took the form of a procession of negroes through the principal streets and an assemblage to listen to speeches—"incendiary," the Associated Press says. In another part of Alabama the rising consisted of the murder of a negro family, "said to be thieves," by four white men who were drunk at the time, and whom General Swayne has by this time arrested. In South Carolina, North Carolina, and Georgia the negro leaders seem to have advised their secret bands to keep themselves perfectly quiet; and in Florida, also, they "bide their time." At Hampton, in Virginia, a sheriff named Lattimer made a murderous assault on a negro and then locked himself into his house. This being surrounded by the colored population of the town, he ran, but was caught and severely beaten. At the intercession of three of the negroes their companions released him. The riot act was read at Hampton and apparently "the horrors of St. Domingo" came nearer being "reinaugurated" at that place than at any other. The rising is undoubtedly put off till next Christmas, by which time the negro, unaccustomed to think for himself, unwilling to labor, made insolent by the radical gang with Stevens at their head, may be depended on to rouse his brutal passions and reinaugurate, etc.

The efforts to take Grant's nomination "out of the hands of the politicians" still continue, and "Grant clubs" and "committees" are making their appearance all over the country. An organization of this kind has been got up in this city under the auspices of Mr. A. T. Stewart, and is composed entirely of leading merchants and lawyers. It seems to be Mr. Stewart's aim to have them use their business connections throughout the country to create or foster a feeling in favor of Grant's nomination which will leave the convention when it meets no choice. But it would be just as well not to rely as much as Mr. Stewart seems inclined to do on the capacity of "men of business," as "men of business," for this kind of work. "Men of business" as such, unfortunately sometimes, fortunately at others, affect public opinion very little, and New York men of business less than those of any other place of nearly its size and importance. The "politicians" know this as well as anybody, and if they are bent on mischief will not be deterred from shelving Grant by his having the endorsement of any number of merchants. Those who want Grant elected must produce something more stirring in his behalf than a mercantile testimonial to his "soundness."

Mr. Raymond has made an important contribution to the history of the Pennsylvania Convention, showing that it originated with Messrs. Johnson and Seward, that they intended it to be not the foundation of a new party but a kind of tonic for the Republicans, which was to clear their heads and brace their nerves. All the doubtful and wavering men were to be brought in by it, and the extravagant to be toned down; but it was not intended to help the Democrats in any manner or form, unless the Republicans should nominate "extreme Radicals;" in that case Mr. Johnson was to "desire the election of Democrats in their stead." Mr. Raymond was earnestly urged to go into the Convention for the purpose of writing an address, embodying the views which he had promulgated a few days previously in a speech in the House, and which had excited Mr. Johnson's highest admiration, and Mr. Raymond agreed to do so, after some hesitation, but with the understanding that if it fell under the control of the Copperheads he would "bolt." In the propriety of this stipulation Mr. Johnson cordially concurred. We know what the result was. The whole undertaking was due to a deplorable misapprehension of the state of Northern feeling—which in Mr. Johnson might be excused, but in Mr. Seward and Mr. Raymond not so readily—together with a great deficiency of sense of the humorous on the part of some of the managers, we can hardly say which—probably Mr. Doolittle. Nobody who was not fatally wanting on that side of his nature could have contained himself when it was proposed to make Messrs. Orr and Couch walk up the aisle arm-in-arm. In fact, we do not remember a better illustration in political history of the value to a politician of a ready perception of the fun of things. There is little doubt, however, that the Convention would never have worn so black a look if Mr. Johnson had not resolved to compensate himself for its failure by "swinging round the circle" immediately afterwards. The tour in the West was regarded by the country as the sequel of the meeting in Philadelphia, and people naturally enough concluded that any proceedings of which the Cleveland speech formed a part could hardly be worse than they were painted. Altogether it was one of the most singular, and at the same time drollest, incidents of the crisis. It lost the Times the position it had acquired during the war by pluck, constancy, and good sense, and enabled the Tribune to appear as if fresh from the fray with streaming wounds, battered armor, and a terrible countenance for foe. During the remainder of the year the "weak-kneed" fled from Mr. Greeley with as much trepidation as if he himself had been a man of iron.

We have frequently called attention to the exposures of Radical misconduct at the South which our Democratic contemporaries are nearly every week obliged to make. This misconduct, of course, varies greatly in its nature; but it commonly consists in the despatch of negroes, of a "brutal expression of countenance," on errands of divers degrees of atrocity, from merely fraudulent voting up to rape and massacre. A somewhat novel outbreak of Radical villany has, we learn from a "special despatch" to the Louisville Courier, occurred at a Radical nominating convention at Nashville, Tenn. On this occasion Judge Brien "hauled off and struck Senator Corry in the face," and a scene of confusion followed "which can only be rivalled by pandemonium itself." They adjourned to another building for the sake of more room, and there "the shrieks and yells could be heard for miles," and the meeting broke up in the wildest confusion. "It was," adds the reporter, though quite unnecessarily, "an exclusively Radical affair, and the proceedings were disgraceful in the extreme." "The negroes," who were two thousand in number, he tells us elsewhere, "were manipulated and controlled by about two dozen white Radicals." The latter must certainly have had a busy time of it, particularly as the negroes "at times cuffed and dragged each other while shrieking and yelling like demons." It is hard to know which to admire most—the vocal powers of the convention or the dexterity of the two dozen whites in "manipulating" two thousand blacks, who were cuffing, dragging, and yelling while in the hands of their guides, and, of course, were more or less under the influence of whiskey.

There was an incident at the New England dinner in this city last week such as is seldom witnessed in a social gathering of any kind, and least of all of the kind to which the New England celebration belongs. Mayor Hoffman assailed the Yankees in a style with which few people are familiar who have not had the privilege of listening to the light badinage by which the glowing hours are occasionally chased in the lower order of bar-rooms or on the forward deck of coasting or river steamers. There is often a good deal of fun made by what we call "live men" of attention to the smaller proprieties of life, but no close observer of human nature has ever failed to detect a very intimate connection between morals and manners, and a man in Mr. Hoffman's position who forgets himself as he forgot himself last week, does a real injury to the community, none the less real because its effect is not immediately visible. Bad manners are a sign of barbarism; and barbarism, if it means anything, means selfishness and coarseness and bluntness of the moral perceptions. A New Englander who behaves in the way in which Mr. Hoffman, at a dinner to which he was invited by New Englanders, insinuated that the New Englander is apt to behave, is certainly a very disreputable person; but it must be admitted that a Dutchman who would throw his vices in his teeth at his own board, after having dined with him, would be fit company for him. It is useless to talk of Mr. Hoffman's performance as a joke. Bad, ill-timed, unseemly jokes are amongst the most serious things in the world, and they are never so serious as when a high public functionary perpetrates them, because the discredit of them is not borne by himself alone.

Mr. Vernon Harcourt, who is better known as "Historicus," has called public attention to the question of the common law doctrine of the indissolubility of allegiance, with a view to its modification. He shows that it is of purely feudal and mediæval origin; that it had no foundation in Roman law; that it has received no countenance from modern writers on international law; that it was the product of a state of society and manners which has for ever passed away; that, in view of the enormous scale on which emigration to this country now takes place, it is absurd, inconvenient, and even dangerous, and he asks that it be overhauled by a "mixed commission," and that the English and American law of allegiance be assimilated to the French law, as laid down in the Code, on the basis of Cicero's famous dictum, that nobody should be forced against his will either to change his country or not to change it. The necessity for "a mixed commission" it is hard to see. Each country can readily determine what theory of citizenship suits its convenience, and it is quite certain that neither England nor America will go farther than France went sixty years ago in loosening the ties of "natural allegiance." Moreover, it is for Congress, we take it, to fix the exact force and meaning of American naturalization.

The Fenian "agitation" continues in England, the means employed being, as usual, assassinations, midnight assaults, infernal machines, fires, explosions, and mock funerals. This mode of expressing discontent has, so far as we remember, never before been resorted to, even when all outcry by pen or tongue was prohibited, by any civilized people however weak or outraged; the lowest raccs, when all else fails, turn and fight against any odds, but there seems to be no fight in the Fenians. If their present performances secure candid attention to Irish wrongs on the part of England, it will be the worst blot that English history has ever received. That a constitutional government should have remained for two centuries deaf to argument and entreaty, and should then surrender to Greek fire, powder barrels, explosive letters, vitriol bottles, and assassination, is something new under the sun, and as shameful as it is new. It is hard to say whether the Fenians or the English liberals will have most reason to hang their heads hereafter whenever Irish reform is spoken of.

The opening of the Mexican Congress has taken place with the proper solemnities and with a very sensible and appropriate address from President Juarez. Nobody who thinks that all a country needs to be free and well governed is a good paper constitution and a chief magistrate animated by the right kind of sentiments but must have been cheered by the spectacle. But then there is already news of rebellion in half-a-dozen places; the high roads swarm with brigands, who make travelling impossible; people are robbed or held for ransom in broad daylight in the streets of the capital, and the treasury is empty. In fact, the country is giving every possible proof, all the proof that any country has ever given, that it is not yet fit for republican government, and that the proceedings in the City of Mexico are but dissolving views. We call attention to the matter once more as an illustration of the truth that, to be free, people must not only desire but know how to be free.

It is now much more fully recognized than it was a month ago that the French people are by no means friends of Italy, and that in supporting the Pope against Italy, Napoleon has really appealed from his own nobler instincts and better judgment to the passions and prejudices of the least enlightened portion of the population. The check in Mexico and the rise of Germany have maddened them, and probably nothing said in the late debate touched the popular heart so much as M. Thiers' exclamation that no government in its senses would raise up a nation of 25,000,000 on its own border. The army bill has been again brought forward with some modifications, the principal one being the concession of greater facilities for marriage. The term of service is fixed at nine years, of which four are to be in the reserve. The Chassepot rifle rises every day in the estimation of military men—the Prussians themselves acknowledging its superiority to the needle-gun.

It was undoubtedly the general opinion both in France and throughout Europe, prior to the late debate in the French Chambers, that the Emperor had interfered somewhat unwillingly for the Pope's defence—that his opinion of the temporal power or his intentions with regard to it remained unchanged, and that he simply sent troops to Rome to prevent France from being humiliated by the open breach of the Convention of September 15. Even so acute an observer, and one so distrustful of the Emperor as M. Eugene Forçade, of the Revue des Deux Mondes, was so satisfied of this on the first of December, that he confidently anticipated the meeting of the proposed Conference, and the successful solution of the Roman difficulty by it, in a sense favorable to Italy, and with the approval of France. This theory has, however, been blown to the winds completely by M. Rouher's speech in the Corps Législatif, in which he announced with passionate, and yet deliberate earnestness, that "Italy should never have Rome." It is well known, too, that his speech was delivered after a lengthened private conference with the Emperor. This, of course, puts an end to the conference scheme. If France be determined to uphold what is called the "temporal power," in any event, of course there is nothing to confer about, and that such is her determination M. Rouher emphatically declared. This admission has, of course, taken everybody by surprise—both Napoleon's friends and enemies—and it is looked on as a decided indication that his recent reverses have alarmed him so seriously that he has thrown himself into the arms of the clerical party. The clergy are of course jubilant. The two French cardinals demand, if necessary for the Pope's security, the destruction of the Italian Kingdom. One of them compared Mentana to Thermopylæ, and the other has discovered that Garibaldi is a coward. The Univers, in an account of a visit to the battle-field, describes a dead Pontifical Zouave as wearing a radiant smile on his face, while a dead Garibaldian beside him "looked damnation." There was a rumor by the Cable on Tuesday that the Conference would yet meet, but it does not deserve credit.

In the meantime the condition of Italy is deplorable. The southern provinces are threatened with insurrectionary movements; the Parliament is so split up, parties so pulverized, that no ministry seems able to count on a working majority. Ratazzi's vacillation and tergiversation have demoralized everybody. General Menabrea has been defeated, and proposes to dissolve, and appeal to the country; the finances are in an alarming condition, and trade and commerce languishing under the prevailing uncertainty and anxiety. Moreover, there is not much sign of either pluck or audacity amongst the politicians, and the people while waiting for a leader, are settling down to hate the French with that silent, steady Italian hate which for so many centuries has been Italy's only weapon. Garibaldi is back in Caprera a sadder and we hope a wiser man. His latest exploit gives singular point to Cavour's witty saying, that Giuseppe was only a sham Garibaldi, that the real Garibaldi was the king; meaning that Garibaldi without the government and the nation at his back was a mere simulacrum.

The long-bruited charges of corruption against the French press were brought out into broad day in a recent debate in the French Chamber by M. de Kervuegen, a Breton count, and of course a partisan of the Papacy, who alleged, on the strength of information received from Berlin, that 1,500,000 francs had been divided amongst the five leading French liberal journals by the Prüssian Government to get them to advocate a peace policy. M. de Kervuegen made his charge in detail but without mentioning the names of the papers, but before he had done, the excitement of the opposition became intense, and M. Guéroult, the editor of the Opinion Nationale, a liberal paper of the Prince Napoleon hue, advanced upon him in what the reporters call a "threatening manner," which, we suppose, means that he gave signs of an intention to pummel him with his fists—whereupon there was a terrible uproar such as we used to have at Washington in the old days of Barksdale and Roger A. Pryor, and after the adjournment the outraged editors proposed a court of honor to hear and sift the charges, and M. de Kervuegen accepted the proposal. The enquiry will be interesting, as it will be the first application of the laws of evidence to a kind of suspicion which has long floated about both in Paris and London with regard to all the leading newspapers, though we doubt if the public faith in their corruptibility has ever been so strong as that of the public here is in the corruption of American newspapers. We doubt very much, however, whether there has ever been a journal bought up by anybody either here or in Europe without the fact being tolerably well known and without a decided distinction being made in popular estimation between it and its fellows. We believe the cases are very rare indeed in which the course of a great newspaper in either France, England, or America has been determined by the cash it had received. Puffing in return for advertising patronage is not uncommon, but we doubt if any paper has ever preached war or peace for a bribe without the fact getting abroad and its losing all character by it, and we doubt if any prosperous paper has ever done it on any terms. When governments or cliques want an "organ" to advocate base interests from base motives, they generally are forced to buy up some old jade whose praise or censure has long had difficulty in finding a market. In the present day no sovereign or individual can afford to pay a great paper for being dishonest what it gets from the public for being tolerably honest.

One of the most singular manifestations of the hostility of the priests to modern ideas is the opposition of the French clergy, headed by the now famous Bishop of Orleans, M. Dupanloup, to the movement for the higher education of women. All attempts to teach women to think, to give them any other education than what is called "the education of the heart," and which is supplied by the priests, they treat, and rightly, as a blow struck at the supremacy of the Church. If the hold of the clergy on the Frenchwomen of the middle class were loosened, the Church would have lost all foothold in the towns, as the men have long abandoned it. The worst of all movements towards religious reform, both amongst the French and Italian Catholics, is, however, that they pass from Catholicism into pure materialism, from absolute credulity into absolute negation. It is the fear of this which makes Protestants like M. Guizot strong supporters of the Pope. As we said last week, the ideal side of the French character seems just now under an eclipse, and plays a much less prominent part both in their politics and literature than it has done for forty years. The rapid exhaustion of the expedients by which the Imperial régime has been thus far sustained, the increasing financial complications, and the growing distrust of "personal government," no longer amongst the cultivated Liberals only, but amongst the body of the people, seem to promise before many years another convulsion, out of which, perhaps, something better may come.

Articles on any of the subjects usually discussed in this journal will be received from any quarter. If used, they will be liberally paid for; if rejected, they will be returned to the writers on the receipt of the requisite amount of postage stamps.

All Communications which pertain to the literary management of THE NATION should be addressed to the Editor.

THE EARTH-HUNGER.

THE purchase of Russian America has produced symptoms of a revival of that craving for more soil which was such a marked incident in politics in the old days of the anti-slavery agitation. The Southern leaders managed in this as in other matters, with considerable dexterity, to use one of the national aspirations or weaknesses for the benefit of the peculiar institution, and, under pretence of gratifying a healthy appetite for expansion, were successful in adding thousands of square miles to the area of slave territory. With more patience, more forbearance, and more caution they would have come much nearer than they ever did to the realization of their dream of a vast collection of slave states along the shore of the Gulf, supplying the Union with cotton, sugar, and statesmen, and submitting in return to as much of its rule as the slaveowners found convenient. Their over-eagerness proved their ruin. It made expansion repulsive to the North by associating it with the extension of slavery, and caused slavery at last to be treated territorially, and to be repressed rather by denying it room than by waging direct war on it as a moral or political evil.

Now that slavery has passed away, and that extension of territory means in reality the enlargement of the area of freedom, Mr. Seward has evidently come to the conclusion that the public taste for it can readily be revived, and that in the gratification of it lies a sure road to popularity. Whether he is right or wrong, time only will tell. We suspect, for our part, that the increasing soberness of the national judgment and the increasing confidence of the people in the value and solidity of other titles to distinction than mere extent of superficial area, have done much to block up this avenue to the popular heart. We doubt very much whether a nation which has gone through successfully the ordeal of the last six years can readily be persuaded by such orations as Caleb Cushing and Franklin Pierce used to deliver that it has received an enormous accession of power and dignity from the annexation of such a patch of the earth's surface as Aliaska; or that all it needs to put the finishing touch to its fame and importance is the acquisition of the Dominion of Canada; or that, unless it can secure such a port as that of St. Thomas in the West Indies, it will fall an easy prey in the next war to British and French cruisers. The reports, messages, resolutions, and other state papers that appear on these subjects are of course interesting reading. Aliaska has value; so has Canada, and so has St. Thomas; but nobody who has ever seriously considered in what the sources of American greatness consist, or by what circumstances the future of this country is to be shaped, can help feeling that there is something very youthful—almost amusingly youthful—in the solemn disquisitions on the importance of annexing them with which our statesmen and admirals occasionally favor us. Admiral Porter's picture of the naval value of St. Thomas, for instance, though doubtless perfectly accurate, was written apparently in boyish forgetfulness that value is a relative term, and that what might be of the last importance to Holland or Denmark or Belgium is, after all, to the United States only a bagatelle.

The fact is, that the figure the United States is to cut in the world hereafter, the part it is to play in the family of nations, and the influence it is to have on civilization, religion, or politics, depend no more on the extent of its territory than on the color of the people's hair or the length of their noses. There was a period in the national history when the extent of the national area was of great moment; but that has passed away. This Government has for over half a century possessed every material advantage necessary to produce the greatest power ever seen in the world or ever dreamed of by poet or philosopher—a power whose natural growth alone will probably half a century hence not only render it unnecessary to buy naval stations in the West Indies or give hundreds of millions for Cuba or Canada, but make every and any hostile nation in the world afraid to come near the West Indies or acknowledge that it had any interest in any spot of soil on this continent. Moreover, it is not the extent of our territory that is winning the race for America or "giving the battle to her hands." There are tracts of land in Eastern Europe nearly as fertile as ours, of easier access, of enormous extent, but European emigrants avoid them as if they were plague-stricken, and seek homes beyond the ocean, under a more rigorous climate and amidst stranger social conditions. The magnet which draws them is not that America is the biggest country in the world, but the freest, the best-governed, the least taxed and policed and vexed by "authority." The moral and political atmosphere makes even the fever-haunted swamp or forest a more attractive home than the alluvial plains of the Danube or the breezy steppes of Southern Russia.

There can hardly be a question that the too rapid spread of population is prejudicial to good government. More than this—we believe few careful observers will deny that although the opening up of the West by steam has added enormously to our material wealth, it has not added in the same ratio, or anything like the same ratio, to our moral and political strength. A certain denseness in population is well known to be necessary to steady growth in civilization, to the preservation and strength of popular reverence for law, for property, for human life. A sparsely settled country is pretty sure to be a semi-barbarous one. The scattering of population over wide areas, which slavery made necessary, was one feature of Southern society which did much to degrade it below the Northern level in civilization, more than anything else except slavery itself; and until the South is more thickly settled than it is now, we do not anticipate for it any rapid moral or material advance. The minister, the schoolmaster, the newspaper, the bookseller and the post-office, and all other civilizing agents, work at an enormous disadvantage when they have to deal with families living five or ten miles apart from each other. Moreover, the habit of self-defence, of trusting for little or nothing to the organized force of the community at large, and for nearly everything to individual courage and energy, though it produces some valuable traits of character, produces also a ferocity of temper, an impatience of the slow processes of law, which are a curse to society. This temper is developed from the necessity of the case in all colonial settlements. But our colonies—for the whole of our Western settlements are colonies—differ from those of all other nations and ages in this, that they are never cut loose from the parent community. They continue to form part of it morally as well as materially, and instead of being governed by it, or being left entirely to govern themselves, help to govern it, and, by constant intercourse, help to influence its manners and ideas. Consequently, the civilization which prevails in New Mexico and Colorado influences our civilization. Their political and moral ideas and their manners act upon and modify our political and moral ideas and manners. We cannot reach any very great height of refinement or cultivation as long as we have communities fastened to us in which, as the other day in New Mexico, the chief-justice is murdered by a member of the Legislature, and the Legislature itself is largely made up of the scamps and vagabonds of the district. We have no hesitation in saying that much of the decline in moral and political tone at Washington and elsewhere during the last fifty years, of which intelligent observers complain, is due to the enormous preponderance in government and society given by the railroads and steamboats to communities scattered over immense areas, and slenderly influenced either by church or school or social intercourse.

There is in this, too, no imputation cast on the far West under which it need wince. It has done wonders under the circumstances; but the circumstances have been such that more than wonders, impossibilities, were necessary to prevent deterioration. We are constantly talking of the immense force of New England character and manners; but what kind of manners and character would they be, of what value to religion or civilization, does any one suppose, if New Englanders, instead of being cooped up along the sea-coast in dense communities for a hundred and fifty years, in strict subjection to a mental and moral discipline the like of which for strengthening purposes the world has never seen, had scattered through the forest as soon as they landed, and left every family to become a law unto itself?

We are suffering just now from political corruption—a corruption which is eating its way into nearly every State Legislature, and which, unhappily, is also reaching the courts; we are suffering from drunkenness; from crimes of violence; from growing indifference to law; from widespread contempt for training and study; from a clumsy, corrupt, inefficient civil service, whose agents, instead of serving the country, defile and disgrace it through their dishonesty and incapacity. We have before us the tremendous problem of reconciling to each other the white and black races at the South—of reducing the whites to civilized subjection to the law, and of teaching the blacks to use the law temperately and intelligently for their comfort and security, and not for vengeance or proscription. We have to make head against the great tide of barbarism which our vast frontier is ever rolling back on us, and at the same time to raise up to the American level the vast horde of immigrants which are every year deposited on our shores without any other preparation for their new life than discontent with their old one. We have, too, to strengthen the national conscience to resist the assaults of the crop of demagogues whom every political trouble brings to the surface, who seem to seek the national dishonor with almost satanic eagerness, and to find their highest happiness in persuading the community to do things which no individual would like to confess to his son that he had a share in. To ask us to pay large sums of money for new patches of territory and new naval stations under these circumstances, under pretence of assuring the national future, is very like the remedy which old topers prescribe for the headache following on a debauch. If the national future be in peril at all, it is not for want of territory but from excess of it—not because we have not soil enough, but because we are unable to cover what we have with law, order, religion, and education.

THE LATEST PHASE OF FENIANISM.

THERE is, probably, no question of foreign politics which interests the United States at this moment so much as the Irish question. In all other questions the interest of Americans may be said to be speculative or sentimental or humanitarian merely. But the Irish question is almost as much a question of American as of British politics. There are nearly as many Irishmen in America who are only nominally Americans and bestow their hearts and allegiance elsewhere as there are Irishmen in Ireland who are only nominally Britons. Moreover, the growing power of the Irish element in American politics, combined with the growing determination of Irishmen to make the United States assist, by some means or other, in the solution of the Irish difficulty, opens up nearly as troublous a prospect, though happily less clouded with moral responsibility, for the American Government as for the British. The United States occupies towards Ireland now a position very similar to that which France occupied in the last century. After the Revolution of 1688, and the final overthrow of James II., the Irish flocked in nearly as great numbers in proportion to population to France as they have during the present century flocked to the United States, with this difference, however, that the Irish emigrants to France were recruits for the French army, while the Irish emigrants to the United States include women and children, and are in search of better food and better clothing and a better future for their descendants. But the participation of the mass of the Irish voters in American politics is due to very much the same feeling as the participation of the Irish troops in the wars of Louis XIV.—the desire of annoying and damaging the English. Of interest in France or her affairs, the famous "Irish Brigade" made little pretence, although it is calculated that in the first half of the eighteenth century nearly half a million of Irishmen died in the French service.

With the French Revolution as an uprising against Church and King the Irish had not a particle of sympathy, any more than they had with the late war of the North against the slaveholders. The Irish in France probably all stood by the old régime, just as the Irish here in the main sympathized with the Confederacy; whatever sympathy the popular cause in France received from the Irish at home, was due to the fact that England was opposed to it. But there was one feature common to both the French Revolution and the late war here which caused them to exert a powerful influence on Irish affairs — each brought a first-class power into an attitude of hostility to England, and each threw out of employment a large number of Irishmen, possessing more or less knowledge of the military art, and eager to use it against Great Britain. Each also—and perhaps this is the more important of their effects—sent a strong tide of democratic feeling into Ireland, though in Ireland the democratic wave, whenever it passes over the island, takes a local hue unknown either to Frenchmen or Americans. The French Revolution accordingly produced the "United Irishmen" and the rising of 1798, just as the late war has, we do not say produced Fenianism, but lifted Fenianism from the position of a little whiskey-stained conspiracy in a Chatham Street grog-shop into the rank of a formidable association, aping the airs, and exercising some of the powers, of a regular government. The United Irishmen had, however, a maddened population at their back who rose and fought like furies, though without a trace of military spirit or of military skill, while the Fenians have only a discontented and hopeless peasantry, who will do nothing for them but keep their secret. The regular Fenian "army" in Ireland, who plunder the gunmakers and hold midnight drills, are generally young clerks and artisans from the towns, whose imaginations have been fired by Fenian literature and oratory. In campaigning they have proved the most harmless and best-natured men in the world, and will hardly fight as long as any other means of exhibiting their dislike to English rule is left open to them. The immense popularity of the mock funeral rites which have been celebrated so extensively for the men who were hanged in Manchester has been undoubtedly due to the strong dislike to more "active operations" which most of the Brotherhood contracted during the brief campaign against the police last spring; and the blowing-up of the jails and assassination of single policemen is probably partly a revival of the traditions of "Whiteboyism," which have never wholly died out, and partly a copy of the Confederate operations at the North during the closing year of the war.

The hope of the Fenian leaders now is beyond question that England will get into a war somehow, with somebody, and that they will then at last find both an ally and a purchaser for their services. Ireland, in its present state of discontent, would be a very formidable auxiliary to a foreign enemy if England ever lost the control of the sea. It was her complete command of the sea which deprived Napoleon of the aid of the Irish malcontents, and made the expedition which landed in 1797 under Humbert, at Killala, such a complete failure, and prevented the Emperor from ever again attempting to operate against England on this her vulnerable side. In any future war, also, no enemy will ever be able to use Ireland against England which is not able to beat England in a fair stand-up fight at sea, and keep the Irish ports open. A foreign army in Ireland which did not also hold the sea would find itself in a cul de sac. Whether England is still the mistress of the seas, even of her own seas—whether the sceptre has not departed from her with the application of steam and iron-plating to war vessels, is one of those momentous problems which nothing but a great war, with France or the United States opposed to her, will solve; and the solution is so doubtful that we think most Englishmen shrink instinctively—perhaps unconsciously—from seeking it, just as a man who feels poorly shrinks from having his heart or lungs examined, though persuaded in his own mind that they are sound. There can, we think, hardly be a question that this vague misgiving has had much to do with the firm adhesion of the English public of late to a peace policy, and the strange indifference they have of late displayed to any loss of prestige which is not caused by positive reverses in the field.

Foreign interference in Ireland she would have little difficulty in crushing if she was able to hold the ports; and the bigger the invading army was, the more rapidly would its fate come upon it. Armies need stores and arsenals; Ireland would furnish neither one nor the other, and the help the Fenian chiefs would supply would be of a kind that would in three weeks either drive a French general mad or cause him to try his Chassepot rifles upon them. An American general would be more patient, partly from his greater experience of volunteers and raw levies, and partly from his greater sympathy for the Irish, and partly because his army would be largely made up, under such circumstances, of Irishmen; but his patience would simply bring his destruction on him somewhat sooner. England, too, has her sympathizers in Ireland. One-fourth of the population are on her side, heart and soul, and they happen, unfortunately for the Fenians, to be the fourth which possesses nearly all the education, money, and organizing power to be found in the island. If they were properly let loose at this moment, a very large portion of the country would become far more unsafe for the Fenian leaders than any district in England.

Nevertheless, the present state of things cannot and ought not to last. It may be quite true, and we believe is true, that one cause of Irish trouble over and above English misgovernment is, that the Irish have not moved on in the general stream of European progress, that they have not yet emerged from the clan condition, and that they are, therefore, still unable to grasp and comprehend the great political ideas by which the other constitutional nations of the world are guided. English rule has undoubtedly done much to check their development, and fix certain archaic ideas in their minds, by presenting civilization, liberty, and progress to them in the guise of foreign oppression. The danger now is that this stoppage in their growth has lasted so long that it cannot be immediately cured. There is hardly a question that the political condition of the country during the last three or four hundred years has not simply made the people poor, discontented, and hostile to England, but has formed a type of character which it will take three or four generations of good government to change; and without this change the country can hardly hope for prosperity.

The Church Establishment is unquestionably doomed. The great body of the Catholic gentry, who have hitherto taken but little part in political agitation, have just signed a solemn protest against it, which is doubtless but the opening of a vigorous contest in the House of Commons; and we should feel tolerably confident of a speedy and satisfactory issue if it were not that nobody is able to suggest any good mode of disposing of the church property, worth about $100,000,000. A considerable portion of it would be absorbed in compensating the present holders of benefices, but enough will still remain to furnish the finest bone of contention over which parties ever fought. The priests say they will not have it, and if they will not have it, or any part of it, what is to be done with it? Until this is settled, everybody is afraid to move; but movement there will unquestionably be. So, also, the land question will doubtless soon receive the only solution which we fear Englishmen will ever accept, by making the good-will of farms legally salable, as it is now customarily salable in the province of Ulster. The adoption of the Stein system is talked of, but we are satisfied the "landed interest" in Parliament must be totally overthrown before it will be more than talked of. When all this is done, however, we do not see that any immediate change in the condition or feelings of the people is likely to follow. The Church Establishment now hurts nobody, except in his feelings; its abolition would produce no effect on the physical condition of the people. The change in the land tenure will doubtless be a substantial boon, but it is a boon by which this generation would profit very little. The proximate cause of the Irish farmer's misery is his ignorance, his want of capital, his want of enterprise, and the badness of the climate. For all these things, except the last, bad legislation is to blame; but not one of them can good legislation at once remove.

Moreover, the dream of national independence has taken fast hold of all that portion of the population which is now active in its demonstrations of hostility to England. That it is a wild dream; that it can never be realized for even a month except by the overthrow of the British Empire, and that the overthrow of the British Empire would be speedily, if not immediately, followed by the absorption of the British Isles by some Continental power, either France or Germany, every sensible politician knows perfectly well. But there is no politician either in England or Ireland who is capable of convincing the Irish Fenians of this. Their knowledge of the world is too slight, their political experience too limited in range, and their political judgment too feeble, to make it of any use to argue with them on the subject. How little political discussion there is amongst them, in the sense in which the more advanced nations of the world understand the term—that is, balancing of advantages and disadvantages, counting of chances, calculation of means, enumeration of facts, of moral and physical and political forces, any one may satisfy himself by dipping into the Fenian periodical literature of this country or listening to the Fenian speeches at the meetings here. He will find that neither orators nor writers ever attempt argument at all, that they appeal incessantly to the imagination and passions of their hearers, and invariably dwell upon the wrongs inflicted by the English on Ireland, and on the desirableness of getting the English out of Ireland, as if these things furnished the means of achieving Irish independence. Six hundred years of wrongs are talked of as if they were equivalent to six hundred thousand men or six hundred millions of dollars. England is spoken of as if she were simply a great tyrant and oppressor, and were not also a first-class power, upheld by nearly thirty millions of one of the most martial races in the world—with a great fleet, a great army, boundless treasure, and had not behind her a history which, numerous as its stains may be, has perhaps matchless power of inspiration. In a word, one never sees a Fenian speech or article which takes any more account of the facts of the case, or makes the Fenian future any clearer, than a street ballad might do.

This indifference to facts and insensibility to the ordinary political argumentation, while it makes the Irish, perhaps, the least formidable rebels that have ever existed, renders them the most troublesome malcontents. We doubt if any statesman has ever had a problem of greater difficulty presented him than their pacification. What the war in this country has done for them is to make the immediate solution of this difficulty imperative. The good-for-nothing adventurers who go over from America to raise the standard of revolt are simply a new species of Jeremy Diddlers. They do not perform anything they undertake to perform, but they excite hopes amongst the Irish which make them tenfold more troublesome to England than if they took the field under General Burke or General Sweeny or James Stephens. Of the Fenian armies a battalion of police is fully able to dispose; but the spectacle which Ireland now presents of a whole people lavishing its ingenuity in inventing expressions of hatred and discontent, is one before which the most subtle, the most experienced and far-seeing of English statesmen may well stand puzzled and appalled. In one sense, it is a most instructive spectacle. It furnishes, next after the Southern rebellion, the most awful warning of modern history against wrong and oppression—yes, more than this, against compassing even good ends by cruel or unjust means. It says as plainly as if it were written, that you must not seek to civilize men or to convert them or even to enlighten them with the sword or the whip; that so surely as you do, you will sooner or later learn through confusion and failure that God has reserved to himself the fashioning of the great channels of progress and civilization.

THE JUDICIARY UNDER DISCUSSION.

The Constitutional Convention now sitting at Albany has spent a good deal of time in discussing the judicial system of the State with considerable advantage to its own members, and we trust not without benefit to the public. There is no subject of greater importance to the welfare of the State; and we regret, not that so much, but that so little time has been devoted to its consideration, and that so little attention has been given to it by the people and the press.

In the course of the debate, Judge Daly, of this city, justly urged that the courts ought to be so thoroughly upright and independent that no one could even suspect them of corruption or favoritism; and without discussing the truth or probability of the charges made against the courts, he referred to the North American Review of last July as an example of grave and sweeping imputations upon the administration of justice in New York, proceeding from a quarter of high respectability and remaining entirely unanswered. He claimed that such an event was never known under the old judicial system, and that the mere fact of widespread doubt as to the probity of any of the judges was strong evidence not of the want of integrity in the particular persons who might be suspected, but of the defects of a system which left room for suspicion.

A Mr. Schumacher violently resented this allusion to the article in the North American Review, which he declared was a foul libel concocted "by a notorious corruptionist and an English ticket-of-leave man"—the former epithet referring, we understand, to an eminent lawyer whose worst enemies do not suspect him of the slightest use of corrupt influences, and the latter to a well-known literary man of perfectly respectable character, who, we have good reason to believe, had no more to do with the article in question than Mr. Schumacher himself. This personal abuse was the staple of the argument in defence of the judiciary of this city. A general assertion that the article in question was false and scandalous was certainly made; but as some of the charges contained in the article are notoriously true beyond doubt or controversy, such a general denial is evidently made in bad faith. A man who swears that the sun does not shine cannot expect to be believed upon any other point; and a lawyer, addressing his brother lawyers of the city of New York, might just as well say that the sun does not shine as deny the truth of all the accusations brought against the judges.

We have referred to this debate because it affords an apt illustration of the line of argument pursued by all who attempt to vindicate the existing order of things in this city. There is absolutely no reply possible to the charges freely made against the administration of justice except personal abuse. If it be said that the charges thus met are themselves attacks on personal character, still that does not constitute any apology for this mode of defence. Charges of corruption must necessarily be personal. Of course, they may proceed from sources utterly unworthy of respect, as where they are made by men out of their right mind or of notorious propensities to falsehood. But this defence, if relied upon, must be very clearly made out. It will not do to argue that the accuser is unworthy of belief because he makes such charges. That is reasoning in a circle of the worst kind. Yet it is constantly resorted to in dealing with this subject.

The fact is, that the rumors affecting the integrity of the courts, which are now so widespread, have originated among the most reputable members of the bar, and are most firmly believed by the best classes of citizens. The deterioration of the courts in this city is so universally admitted by all who deal with them that it is impossible to find a respectable lawyer who doubts it. Indeed, there has not thus far been found any man, respectable or otherwise, who will publicly assert the contrary. It cannot be said that this is a mere result of a lawyer's habitual reverence for the past, for there is no want of commendation of the new system in those portions of the State where it has worked well. The lawyers of those sections are so zealous in their support of the elective system as to constitute the greatest obstacle to any change in the mode of selecting judges. Why is it that the bar of New York city presents an almost solid front in favor of a life-tenure, and that the great majority of that bar, without reference to party lines, are in favor of an appointed rather than an elected judiciary? Obviously because their experience has taught them that a steady and uniform administration of justice is not to be had under the present system. Even those men who make a profit out of the corruption and favoritism which are now rife feel that their hold is uncertain, that some new power may come in susceptible to new and adverse influences. They are not, therefore, so unwilling to consent to reform as might be expected, especially if they are men who could command a good practice under a better system. The great obstacle to reform at present lies among the lawyers and farmers of the rural districts, among whom justice is satisfactorily administered, and who do not come in contact with the abominations which sicken the city practitioner. But they will surely suffer in time from the taint of maladministration in so important a part of the State as the city of New York. Indeed, it is well known that the same influences which have degraded justice there are working gradually into the rural districts, and although there is at present no reason to suspect that anything more than favoritism has obtained a foothold in the courts outside of the city, yet that is an entering wedge which may yet lead to worse results.

We believe that the Convention has not yet made a final decision against a long tenure of judicial office. We hope that it will yet decide in favor of it. For bad as affairs are in the city, they must steadily grow worse for many years to come under a system of frequent elections. The immense tide of immigration must and will carry the moral tone of the city lower and lower during the next twenty or more years. Some improvement takes place amongst the settled population, but not enough to counterbalance the effect of the flood of ignorance that is annually poured in. Weak as are the courts now, they will be filled with weaker or worse judges at every succeeding decade, and the bar would far rather let the courts stand exactly as they are than have new judges introduced from time to time during the next twenty years under the elective system.

We cannot close without saying that several judicial officers in the Convention deserve credit for the stand which they have taken upon this question. Judge Monell, we know, and Judge Garvin, we believe, voted for Mr. Evarts's proposition of a life-tenure for judges. But to Judge Daly especial credit is due for the courage with which he acknowledged the defects of a system of which he constitutes a part, and the earnestness with which he strove to accomplish a thorough reform. The fact that such a man is able to retain his place upon the bench is about the best argument that can be made for the present system. If all our judges were as able and as upright, we should be well satisfied with an elective judiciary.

LITERATURE TRULY AMERICAN.

It is very common to hear it said that a magazine or newspaper, or other periodical published in this country, ought to be "truly American;" that this or that poem is truly American; that somebody ought to write a truly American novel; and Mr. Eugene Benson and Mr. Walt Whitman are so far from being the only persons who declare that they crave a literature that shall be truly American, that perhaps half of us who have turned our thoughts in that direction would admit that we are of Mr. Whitman's and Mr. Benson's mind. We, for our own part, confess that we do not know with exactness just what is meant by these words so often heard. It is not to be doubted that there is some idea, more or less clear, of what it is that he wants in every man's mind who says that our literature ought to be truly national. But we may as well acknowledge that in our belief this idea is oftener very vague than at all well defined. We seriously doubt if the man who is in the habit of saying that he would like his family paper or his magazine to be American from the very first line to the last, would not be obliged to sit mute if called on suddenly to state accurately what he means by a magazine American from the first line to the last. Yet there must be something at the bottom of so common an expression; and we have given the subject some consideration, with intent to fix, if possible, upon the meaning of it—some of the meanings of it, rather; for when we constantly see that phrases of precise definition have all sorts of various meanings given them, it is not to be hoped that a phrase which extremely often is used without any thought will not be found to have very various senses.

If Mr. A. B. Street should say that he wanted our literature to be purely American, we should know what he desired. He would want, we suppose, descriptive prose and poetry devoted to the panther or American lion, to the soaring of the bald-headed eagle, to the Palisades, to Washington and Lafayette, to Mount Hood, Weehawken, and Communipaw, to the rush of the indigenous buffalo beside the north fork of the Platte River, to the Red man and his canoe, to the Falls of Niagara—though the Mammoth Cave of our own Kentucky, as not being partly in a British province, might appear to be a better theme for patriotic bards. We all know very well what constitutes a truly American literature in the opinion of those persons of whom we have chosen to make Mr. Street the exemplar. They seem to think America is square miles of natural scenery, and a fauna and flora entirely different from the fauna and flora of certain despotic countries that we might name.

Then akin to these are the people who, in the plenitude of a genuine love of country, and, it is true, in the plenitude of a lack of knowledge on almost all subjects, seem to have a notion that Columbus's discovery of America necessitated the invention of a new world of literature. Not very long ago the people of Utica, in this State, laughed with derision at an Irishman who, when a certain Mr. Price set up an opposition band, remarked that, "Now there was a new band, there 'd be new music entirely," as if the blessed Saint Cecilia were about to descend in the interest of Mr. Price and his new sax-horns. But our Irish fellow-citizen, even under the misconstruction of the Sassenach, was certainly not more foolish than many of his unnaturalized compatriots. It is not improbable that if Utica had on one of those old days been polled on the question, Shall we have a purely American science of pure mathematics? a large minority of the legal voters would have thought upon the national emblem and voted in the affirmative. But there is little need of speaking about these classes of friends of an American literature, for they now have little influence and are disappearing with rapidity, and their works follow them with even pace.

Then there are men among us who, when they demand that our literature shall be national, seem to have in mind, as distinctively American literature, literature printed on a Hoe press in four or five editions daily. They give a great and honest admiration to the Washington correspondents of our enterprising journals. Anything more moderate in tone or more polished in style than the ordinary reckless newspaper writing seems to them somehow foreign and aristocratic, and to be distrusted, if not denounced, as "un-American." Trying literary performance by this standard, the only standard which they use, they have serious doubts if it is desirable that a prospective editor should go to college. Generally they think that the best training for men who are to supply their fellow-citizens with opinions morally and intellectually sound, who are to wield the influence of several thousand ordinary men as regards most political and social questions—the best training for the editor, in short, is to go into a printing-office when he is twelve years old, get thoroughly grounded in Mr. Greeley's tabulated election returns, and, generally, feed his mind on newspaper cuttings, party platforms, orations, lives and speeches of "little giants," "prominent statesmen," "first men," and "grand public men, and things of that kind. Many men have been trained in this way, some to honor, many to honors, none, so far as we know, to dishonor, as men count dishonor, but none either, so far as we know, to be of any service to literature, unless one thinks literature is made fresh every night and delivered by carriers every morning. People who do conceive of it so, when they talk of un-American literature mean most literature—all which their peculiar training has unfitted them to estimate aright.

Then there are many men, more than one not familiar with the rural districts would imagine, who remember very well the time when no foreigner had anything but insolence and contempt to bestow upon the American government and people, and who, being not so much wider-minded than the calumniators of America, got themselves into a condition of bitter hostility to the country's enemies and have hardly yet begun to get out of it, but are still painfully patriotic in all the relations of life. It is of one of these that the story is told that, presiding in a justice's court in the West, he indignantly rebuked a young attorney for citing English decisions on a common law point in the court of a man whose father had fought in the Revolutionary war, and who himself had been present at the battle of New Orleans. The sort of literature which would seem truly American to Americans of this kind is well known. Not to mention too many branches of literature, it is for them the poetry is fearfully and wonderfully made which describes the making of the national colors with "the milky baldric of the skies," the flush of aurora, and the azure of the mid-day heavens. The books of travel are written for them which describe Pompeii and call to mind the highly creditable record of our native land in the matter of volcanoes; which compute in dollars and cents the enormous annual expenses of the British royal family, and compare them with the cost to this country of the establishments of President Polk or President Taylor; and, in general, books are written for them which not only set forth a justifiable pride in the United States, but a more or less unjustifiable contempt for all things not American. Of course much of this contempt is due to the spirit of uncorrected brag which infests the hearts of most men, American or otherwise; we would not say that it all has so creditable an origin as a natural wish to resist and offset foreign calumny and misconception. But whether born of uninstructed patriotism or of ignorance, it exists—most of it existed—and what would be a truly American literature, tried by this standard, it is easy to see.

Disregarding the notions of those who entertain so inadequate a conception of what America is as to suppose that all is said when one gives its boundaries on the map; or when one thinks of it as a democracy, and of a democracy as ignorance and vulgarity; when one has celebrated our peculiar autumn foliage, and vindicated the superiority of the Hudson to the Rhine, and substituted as poetical properties the mocking-bird for the nightingale and Tecumseh for Sir Lancelot; or when one has sufficiently hated the Queen's birth-day and exalted the twenty-second of February—disregarding these and similar ideas of the true American and the truly American in literature, we come to an idea of which Mr. Whitman may as well be made the representative, and which, if not overwise, is not altogether foolish, and is to be spoken of with some respect.

Although, as men and women have for some centuries agreed to talk to each other, orally and in print, Mr. Whitman is to be called indecent in speech; and although, as able men have for all these centuries been talking to us for the common benefit, one would say that he lacks a pinch or so of brains; and although it may be said that in his poems he as an artist leads a very intermittent life, and is generally non-existent, still there is this to be said of him, that he has so heartily and honestly, with such belief in it and such love for it, "sounded his barbaric yawp," as he happily phrases it, in behalf of the greatness of mere manhood and the consequent perfect equality of every man with every other, that he may very well be honored as a preacher of democracy—democracy in its wider, humanitarian sense—as it is perhaps to exist in "these States." For the poet of democracy we, for our own part, feel as if we should have to wait, and, thinking of what poetry is, we feel as if we should wait willingly. What Mr. Whitman wants when he speaks of an American literature we can easily understand, and to a certain extent we can join with him in the desire for its coming. That every power of the mind of man may be allowed free activity, that no laws or institutions of human invention may be suffered to trammel man's faculties in any field of human endeavor, that men may believe in themselves, respecting each other democratically, and neither feudally oppressing nor pitying any one, that the feeling of brotherhood may become the basis of society—all this is good. We like to believe that in America, sooner than elsewhere, and better than elsewhere, it may all come to pass, and there is a reason why a literature that should reflect Mr. Whitman's hope in this regard, might, with no great impropriety, be styled distinctively an American literature.

Not to take up more time in considering special traits that it may be desirable our literature should or should not possess, it is safe to say that American literature, to use figurative language, ought to express America. But it is safe, too, to say that it will; that it cannot help doing just that, whatever that may be. Literature, as somebody says, all literature whatsoever, is the thought of thinking souls. And whatever it is that souls in America are thinking, whether concerning democracy, or the color of the leaves in the fall, or wild-fowl on Seneca lake, or what not, is perfectly sure to get itself expressed. We may be absolutely confident that just so far as America is American, the literature of America will be American, and whosoever wants more than this is not wise, and, for another thing, will certainly be disappointed; and people who are anxious that our literature should be American may rest assured that it cannot be anything else.

CALM AND COLD.

BREAK into spray and fly and fill the air
With ghastly mist that freezes ere it falls,
O struggling waves! whom not the wind appalls,
Nor all the wrestling tempests overbear,
But secret fear lest, pausing weary there,
Instead of peace renewing whom it calls,
The subtle cold that levels and enthralls
Should creep and find and bind you unaware.
And what were worse than, smoothly calm and cold,
Wrapped in false peace, to fancy strife is o'er,
Forget the woes that all the winds deplore,
Forget the cares that all the clouds enfold,
Watch not nor wait for changes as of old,
And feel the movement of the world no more?

ROBERT WEEKS.

PARIS GOSSIP.

PARIS, December 13, 1867.

THE revival of "Linda" at the Théâtre des Italiens has been the occasion of a new triumph to Mdlle. Patti. Brilliant as was her performance in this rôle two years ago, not even her warmest admirers were prepared for the pathos and passion of her present wonderful rendering of the part. In the mad scene especially she surpassed all her former triumphs, throwing an intensity of tenderness and anguish into the famous air of that scene that fairly carried away her hearers, and left not a dry eye in the house.

The other principal dramatic event of the week has been the bringing out, at the Gaîté, of an amended translation of "Hamlet," done into most un-Shakespearian French verse by the younger Dumas and Paul Meurice. As formerly given here, this translation took a good many liberties with the text; among others, the suppression of most of the deaths at the end of the play, which were considered too sanguinary. It seems that the translators, feeling that they had taken a heavy responsibility on themselves in changing the dénoûment of so great a work, were debating the propriety of restoring the situation as "the divine Williams" had left it, when the elder Dumas turned the scale in favor of fidelity to the first translation.

One of the great theatrical "attractions" of the moment is the new piece by Messrs. Anicet and Bourget, brought out with splendid scenery a few days ago at the Ambigu, and entitled "The Knights of the Fog." On its first performance the scene in which the hut of the Vieille-Masure is set fire to by order of the sheriff created such a panic among the audience, who fancied the stage had caught fire in earnest, that it was with the greatest difficulty they were restrained from rushing out of the theatre en masse.

George Sand's brilliant but unsatisfactory son-in-law, Clésinger, an excellent sculptor and an execrable husband, has just lost a suit he brought a short time since against Barbédienne, the great dealer in bronzes and similar objects of artistic adornment, for multiplying casts of statuettes, etc., sold by him to the latter for the purpose of being reproduced in bronze. Clésinger claimed that Barbédienne, by making too many casts of a given work, rendered that work common and vulgar, thus injuring him in his artistic reputation; and that, moreover, by using the same mould too often he disseminated imperfect copies of his works, calculated to give the public an unworthy idea of the originals, and thus still further injured his reputation. He therefore demanded damages for the injuries already received and an injunction restraining the multiplication of his works complained of. The court, however, after due investigation, decided that both these charges were devoid of foundation, refused the demand for damages on the ground that no injury had been inflicted, and sentenced the vain and quarrelsome artist to pay the cost of the suit.

The initiative of the Minister of Public Instruction in regard to the providing of improved opportunities of instruction for girls is being actively followed up, despite the opposition of the leaders of the clerical party. A group of authors and savans, assisted by a committee of lady patronesses composed entirely of women known and esteemed in the literary world, are about to open a course of superior instruction for women and girls in the handsome and convenient concert-room of M. Adolphe Sax, the well-known inventor and perfector of brass instruments of music. This course will be continued from the 15th December to the 15th June; the meetings will be held thrice a week, from 1 to 3 P.M., when two lectures, of an hour each, will be given. The department of natural history will be represented by M. Henry Berthoud, chemistry by M. Hersch, ancient literature by M. Edouard Herué, thoroughbass by M. Gevaert, drawing and painting by M. J. Grangedor, physics by M. Paschal Grousset, astronomy by M. Amedée Guillemin. These lectures are to be amply illustrated by means of charts, diagrams, and experiments, and arrangements will be made in connection with the course for facilitating the studies of those who may be disposed to follow up by individual effort the pursuit of the various branches of study thus brought within their reach. The price of admission for the six months of the course is fixed at 120 francs.

Similar courses are being got up in many of the principal towns of France, and will, no doubt, do much to turn towards something more serious than dress and coquetry the minds of a few of the mothers of the next generation of Frenchmen. It must, however, be admitted that the efforts hitherto made in this country to enlist the sympathies and interest of le beau sexe in literary and scientific pursuits have had but very limited success. Mlle. Daubié, who has completed a full university education, has taken all the regular academic "honors," and has even been admitted to lecture at the Sorbonne, has already had one or two emulators, and her example may possibly be followed by others; but the ignorance of the great majority of lively and brilliant Frenchwomen in everything relating to science and literature is deplorable, although the excellent lectures delivered gratis, on almost every subject of study, throughout the academic year, at the Sorbonne and the Collége de France, by the most accomplished professors, are open equally to both sexes. It was thought that the courses of evening lectures, opened with so loud a flourish of trumpets three years ago in the Rue de la Paix, would do something towards effecting a diversion of feminine forces from the field of dissipation. But the attempt can hardly be said to have succeeded, the lectures having generally been voted "dry" and the lecture-room disagreeable.

The gayest dames of the capital flock to the séances at the Institute on the rare occasions when the doors of that palace of eloquence are thrown open for the reception of a new member; but the interest felt by this portion of the brilliant auditory then assembled springs much more from the fact of the gathering, with its opportunities of displaying an elegant toilette, of showing off the wearer's acquaintance with a greater or less number of the forty "immortals," and of evidencing her sympathy with one or other of the speakers, than from any special interest in science or literature per se.

The evening lectures delivered at the Sorbonne are more popular among the ladies of Paris than any of the others, partly because the hall in which they are given is exceedingly magnificent, splendidly lighted, and delightfully warmed, and also because its form and arrangement, with its comfortable seats, allow of the diagrams and experiments by which the lectures are so lavishly illustrated being well seen by all present. So popular, indeed, were the lectures delivered there last winter, especially those on electricity, that between three and four thousand applications for tickets were refused for want of room, and of those who were fortunate enough to obtain cards a great number waited every lecture-night at the doors of the Sorbonne for hours together, standing in the cold, and often in rain or snow, in order to secure good places on the opening of the doors.

The other principal course of lectures, that at the Observatory, is less popular. The Observatory itself is a very fine, commodious, handsome building, though, having been rebuilt and enlarged at various times and under the auspices of various directors, it is deficient in unity of plan; but the room in which the evening lectures are given is so ill-adapted to the purposes of a lecture-room that only a very small portion of the audience can see or hear anything of what is going on. The seats are narrow, hard, and without backs, and furious draughts render it next to impossible to pass an evening there without taking cold. Add to these heavy drawbacks the fact that, although the magnificent telescopes—to get a look through which is the delusive hope that brings most people to the lectures—are duly "placed at the disposal of the public" on the noble terrace of the building, the absence of the employees, who alone could direct the unlearned visitor in the business of getting them to the proper focus, renders it utterly impossible for the public to obtain a glimpse of any of the skyey marvels it would be so glad to see.

For this constant disappointment the ill-tempered obstinacy of the renowned discoverer of asteroids, M. Le Verrier, is directly responsible. Placed at the head of the Paris Observatory, he not only rules the whole establishment from garret to cellar in a manner so tyrannous as to provoke perpetual insurrections among the rest of its personnel, but seems to take pleasure in thwarting the wishes of all who are brought, even occasionally, within reach of his autocracy. If the Observatory instruments remain inaccessible to those who go to the lectures mainly in the hope of being enabled to take a look through them, it is simply because the director of the establishment does not think it worth his while to gratify them.

M. Le Verrier is rather tall, rather large, of strong but ungraceful build, with yellow hair, pink complexion, glassy blue eyes, and heavy mouth. His smile is frequent but disagreeable, and his general expression the reverse of sympathetic. Of humble parentage, he has been fortunate in finding, on his road from obscurity to his present brilliant position, influential friends, to whom, it is said, he has not always shown himself grateful. The pupils of the Polytechnic School subscribed among themselves the cost of his studies in that eminent establishment; and he subsequently found effectual aid and support in the kindness of Arago, de Lionville, and others.

Though not a man of genius, Le Verrier possesses very great talent, boldness, ingenuity, and indefatigable industry. He is especially skilful in all that relates to calculation; but is weak and inexact as an observer. His rivals are perpetually holding up to criticism the mistakes he makes whenever he attempts to fix the relative situations of the celestial bodies; but all admit the admirable talent with which he has discussed, completed, and set in order the sidereal observations conducted during the directorship of Arago, and published by him in several volumes, constituting a contribution of great importance and value to the archives of astronomic science. But he manages, nevertheless, to keep the establishment in a state of intestine feud, and to deprive it of the services of those who should be its most valuable aids. During two years he arbitrarily kept M. Foucault, a member of the Institute, and one of the most learned physicists of France, from fulfilling his functions at the Observatory, and this in the teeth of the reiterated orders of the Minister of Public Instruction, in whom is vested the supreme control of the Observatory, and who regularly paid to M. Foucault the salary of which M. Le Verrier endeavored to deprive him. During five months he shut M. Lucas out of his cabinet, and deprived him of his salary, which the Minister paid to him, as he had done in the case of M. Foucault. M. Lepissier had the same fate. He has suppressed, in similar style, the salaries of twenty-eight of his subordinates in the space of fifteen months; seven of these suspensions having been inflicted by him in the course of a single month. Being annoyed at the brilliant success of M. Marié-Davy, who has created the Meteorologic Board of the Observatory and rendered immense service to the French marine, M. Le Verrier first of all arbitrarily deprived the rising young savant of his aids and secretaries, and then, three years ago, caused to be built up the door by which his cabinet communicated with the interior of the Observatory, so as to compel M. Marié-Davy to go out of doors, and make the round of a good part of the extensive edifice, every time he needs to pass from his cabinet to his private rooms, and vice versâ. The director has also absolutely forbidden all the servants of the establishment to make a fire or to carry wood for M. Davy; so that this gentleman, whose official rank corresponds to that of chef de division, is compelled, all through the winter, to carry wood to his cabinet with his own hands and to make his own fire! Since 1854, when M. Le Verrier was made director of the Paris Observatory, he has either summarily dismissed, or driven away by continued persecutions, no fewer than one hundred and two of the functionaries, of various ranks, placed under his orders. Several others consider themselves as marked for ejectment, and expect to find themselves turned out at a moment's warning.

Very ugly stories are also rife in relation to M. Le Verrier's management of the funds of the Observatory, of alterations made, apparently, for the sake of pocketing a large part of the sum demanded for the same, and of additions to the building for which exorbitant estimates have been accepted by the director, and which have been so badly constructed that they threaten to fall on the heads of the inmates.

The Government has at last determined to put a stop to the scandals resulting from the maladministration of this important establishment, and has appointed a committee, consisting of MM. Delaunay de Lionville, Serret, Balard, all members of the Institute and men of high mark in the scientific world, to enquire into the stewardship of the director, and report accordingly.

Notes.

LITERARY.

HOFFMANN & CAMPE, of Hamburg, Germany, will publish this month the first volume of "Märchen und Sagen der nordamerikanischen Indianer" ("Tales and Legends of the North American Indians"), by Carl Knortz, editor of the German Family Paper, published at Detroit. The volume will contain ninety-seven of the tales, with explanatory notes and an introduction, giving a comparative sketch of the religious views of the Indians and of certain Asiatic nations, which may, perhaps, throw some light on the origin of the former.

—It is said by the Publishers' Circular that experience has taught the English publishers the lesson that it is not well to put forth at Christmas the greater number of their most important or, at any rate, most attractive books. The show of gorgeous volumes dependent for their interest upon the artist rather than the author, is much smaller this year than it was last. The same thing is true of our American publishers, and to nobody's regret, we presume, unless that of the designers and engravers. We suppose the publishers never found the highly ornamented holiday books a very profitable part of their stock, and the reader surely seldom took up one without firmly resolving never to take up another. They are almost always books to look at and not to read, and this even when their contents are of importance, for they are made too pretentious to be comfortable to handle, and, withal, are generally ugly. As for their value as gifts, no one who really cares for books ever presents one of these illustrated things to anybody else who cares for books. It is matter for congratulation that so few of them were issued by our publishers this year; persons of limited imagination who buy highly ornamented books for Christmas gifts because of inability to select something else had their task made easier by reason of the fewness of them, and doubtless the sale of real books was considerably larger than it would have been otherwise.

—Mr. Spofford, in his report to the Joint Committee on the Library of Congress, says that the collection was never more prosperous in all its interests than at present. Exclusive of unbound pamphlets, periodicals, etc., the whole number of volumes now on the shelves is 165,467. The library has been just doubled in size during the last two years. The acquisitions of the past year have been particularly numerous. The Peter Force collection, purchased now nearly a year since, has been removed to the Capitol, and will, we suppose, make the Congressional Library, as it ought to be, the richest in the country in works belonging to the political and historical literature of America. Besides the Force collection, the library of the Smithsonian Institute has been united with the old Congressional Library, and by means of its exchanges there have been added to the total number of books 1,432 volumes, 4,417 pamphlets and parts of volumes, and 187 maps. Aside from the two special additions above-mentioned, 9,474 volumes have been added by purchase, by gift, by the exchanges of the Smithsonian Institute, and by the operation of the copyright law. From this latter source a stricter enforcement of the law has caused a very decided increase in the number of books received. In 1866, Congress provided for the free transmission through the mails of the publishers' tribute to the library and imposed a penalty on non-compliance; so we have this year 1,493 volumes sent in, as against 836 last year; 1,340 periodicals and pamphlets, as against 572 last year; 1,256 pieces of music, against 386 in 1866; 319 engravings and photographs, against 170 last year; and 91 maps, against 32.

—The execution of the Fenians Allen, Larkin, and Gould, at Manchester the other day, will doubtless be often celebrated in song; for whatever else an Irish patriot wants, the sacer vates is never wanting to him, and the fate of these men has evidently stirred the feelings of their countrymen as deeply as any event in recent Irish history. The first-fruits of the coming harvest is "A Lamentation on Allen, Larkin, and Goold," which on the day of the execution was hawked about the streets of Dublin. We print verbatim four of the eight stanzas:

> "Good people all, both great and small, that hears my case bewail,
> This day now terminates our fate before Manchester gaol,
> For the foul deed of murder we are condemned to die,
> And pay the penalty of that crime upon the gallows high.
>
> "John Allen, Gould, and Larkin, to Ireland did belong,
> Their friends all did wish them well, and saw they did no wrong.
> For the shooting Constable Sergeant Brett our lives were took away,
> And for the breaking of the van and demanding of the key.
>
> "November the 23rd will be remembered well,
> When Larkin's wife and children came to take their last farewell,
> It would grieve your heart to see that sight, in grief you would deplore,
> When they bade farewell in the dead cell, to part and meet no more.
>
> * * * * * * * * *
>
> "The Marchioness of Queensbury three hundred pound has sent,
> To help these suffering families it is her full intent,
> Should a subscription now be raised, as we expect will be,
> To keep their wives and families from want and misery."

The author confounds persons and tenses in a helpless way, and throughout displays a profound contempt or a heedless disregard of all the unities; but there is a sort of gallows pathos about it too, and for the rest, although it is guarded in its language and escapes being seditious—unless "Erin Go Bragh" at the head of the slip is seditious—still it is not a poem that an Englishman would very much like to read.

—The subject of one of the essays in Müller's first volume (and the only one which bears upon the religions of aboriginal America) is "The Popol Vuh," that relic of Central American literature for our knowledge of which we are indebted to the Abbé Brasseur de Bourbourg. It is also especially dwelt upon as one of that gentleman's most important works in the review of his life and labors given in Lippincott's Magazine, as recently noticed by us. In Müller's pages, as in those of the Philadelphia critic, are clearly to be seen both the strength and the weakness of the Abbé—on the one hand, his immense enthusiasm, faith, and enterprise; on the other hand, his rashness, credulity, and philological unsoundness, combined with something of the complacency and swell which are apt to characterize the French explorer in new fields. He is a man whose researches are of the highest value, and whose name is not to be spoken without admiration and gratitude by any one who loves the study of American antiquity; while, notwithstanding, his results call for the most careful and enlightened criticism before they are accepted as authoritative and turned to use. Of such criticism, unfortunately, we can hardly hope that they will receive a great deal among us, who have no school of American archæology, no living and active society, even, charged with its promotion, but only a few scattered workers (some of them, to be sure, of very high character) who follow the study in intervals of leisure won from other engrossing occupations. The chief seats of American learning are outside the borders of our own country. Buschmann, at Berlin, has during the past twenty years published researches both comprehensive and profound into the languages of the North. The veteran botanist, Von Martius, has just put forth at Munich two stout volumes on the ethnology and linguistics of Brazil. At Paris there was formed, some ten years ago, a "Society of American and Oriental Ethnography," the two sections of which have since, we believe, become separate though closely connected organizations. M. Aubin, to whom the writer in Lippincott's also does justice, has been one of the conspicuous members of this society, and its publications deserve to be far more widely circulated and better known among us than they are. We are thankful to the Philadelphia magazine for contributing its quota towards awakening and enlightening the public interest in such matters, and hope that it will follow up the good beginning it has made. How bare our country is of true American archæologists may be seen in the fact that the professorship in this department founded a year ago by Mr. Peabody at Cambridge still remains unfilled. There is room to fear that, as the object of the Peabody gift was to found a museum, as well as a chair, of American archæology and ethnology, the general American tendency to building and collecting will be suffered to have its way, to the comparative neglect of the study of our aboriginal languages and literatures, as if these, when they are to be had, were not by far the most important and trustworthy sources of archæological and ethnological knowledge. Let us have in Harvard a school of American study, sustained by one who understands the spirit of antiquity, who is versed in the religions and literatures of primitive peoples, and thoroughly trained in historical and philological research, and there need be no fear that the museum will not rapidly fill with objects illustrative of the deeds and ways of our aboriginal races. And, perhaps, as the importance of the subject is better comprehended, men will be found to emulate Mr. Peabody's noble liberality, and enrich other institutions with similar endowments.

—Max Müller has just collected, in two handsome octavo volumes (Longmans & Co., London), a portion of his occasional essays and criticisms. The work bears the name "Chips from a German Workshop"—a quaint title, suggested, as the preface informs us, by a remark of the author's early patron in England, the celebrated Bunsen. Two more volumes, of essays on literature and on the science of language, are announced as in preparation. Of those before us, the first is specifically designated as made up of "Essays on the Science of Religion," the second of "Essays on Mythology, Traditions, and Customs;" but the contents of both are very similar in character, hardly requiring to be separately classified; and, indeed, the special title of the former is, to a certain extent, misleading, as it might lead us to suppose the author's attempt to have been the laying out and establishing of a "science of religion," rather than, as is the case, the furnishing of contributions to a knowledge of the world's religions—materials for a science, if such a science there is to be. He tells us himself that his aim is to "succeed in attracting more general attention towards an independent yet reverent study of the ancient religions of the world, and in dispelling some of the prejudices with which so many have regarded the yearnings after truth embodied in the sacred writings of the Brahmins, the Zoroastrians, and the Buddhists, in the mythology of the Greeks and Romans, nay, even in the wild traditions and degraded customs of Polynesian savages." His view of a science of religion is clearly to be gathered from this statement; it contemplates a study and comparison of all the creeds and forms of worship, ancient and modern, of the human race, regarded as outgrowths of the religious spirit common to all men, as the efforts of different races and communities, with what light and insight each was possessed of, to arrive at a knowledge of the unseen Creator and a communion with him. Truly a grand idea, catholic in the highest sense of the word; and an idea which is so in accordance with the spirit of investigation of our time that though thus far chiefly confined to a few more enlightened minds, it is destined yet to become generally apprehended and adopted. We heartily admire Professor Müller's design and the spirit in which he carries it out. None of his other works shows his fine qualities of mind and heart in a more favorable light or does more credit to his widely varied learning. We rejoice in the thought that his wonderful popularity will draw to these essays and their theme the attention of great numbers whom they would not reach if put forth under the auspices of a less famous name. Into any detailed criticism of them we do not care at present to enter; it will be time enough for that when they are made more accessible to the American public by a reprint—as, we are informed, will soon be the case, Messrs. Scribner & Co., Müller's authorized publishers in this country, having already taken them in hand for that purpose.

HOWELLS'S ITALIAN JOURNEYS.*

Clough having spent an evening with Thackeray when they both were in this country, said of him, in one of his letters home: "Thackeray does n't sneer; he is really very sentimental; but he sees the silliness sentiment runs into, and so always tempers it with a little banter or ridicule." In this remark, which we believe Clough was the first to make, there seems to be a great deal of the truth about Thackeray, and about a great number of his literary contemporaries—a number that bids fair to be larger before it is less. For it is true we suppose, beyond a doubt, although it has been said so often, that this is not the age of faith; probably we do live in a century even morbidly critical; probably the men of to-day do find it very hard to yield themselves with abandonment to belief in anything, whether outside of themselves or inside; it seems to be a fact that they do habitually exercise the criticising spirit, and to all things indifferently give nothing more earnest than contemplation tinged sometimes with ridicule, sometimes with discontent or contempt or wrath. Ever since "Werther" everybody has been saying that this is so; the loudness and constancy of the complaints against it are proof enough, if any were wanting, of the existence of the tendency. There are people by the hundred who are almost as much worried about it as if really it were profitable to quarrel with facts, and they did well to be angry with the revolving world. Mr. Carlyle, notoriously, has been for many years in great concern about it; the uncomfortable cold iron of it has entered deep into Charles Kingsley's soul—not hot enough to fuse it; Matthew Arnold—who is by no means the least complete exemplar of it—indeed, whose anachronistic "Empedocles on Etna" is, in a sense, the poem of the present—is tormented by this enquiring, introspective, continually baffled spirit, which, however, he is not the man to pronounce a spirit of evil; Clough himself was incessant and relentless in critical inspection and introspection, though he was not of a nature to rest content in discontent, despised himself and the rest of things, if he at all despised anything, in such a way as if it might eventually turn out that he and they were, after all, not to be despised. Hundreds of other names might be mentioned; Roman Catholic writers are fond of making lists of such critics and doubters, from Byron and Heine to Guérin, and thereupon urging all unserene mariners to drive on shore from the troublesome waves into the peace of the church. But there is no need of borrowing examples—frightful examples. It is, as we have said, universally admitted that we are all nowadays apt to be disbelievers and critical; that some of us are obtrusively unhappy in our scepticism; that others of us secretly cherish what we much more than half believe to be delusions, and then take vengeance on ourselves for the confessed folly of this course by laughing at ourselves for cherishing them, as well as at everybody else who cherishes them. The sentimental character is of no particular age; no more is the satirical; but the union of the two in a sentimentalist satirized by himself is, we suppose, almost peculiar to our own time—at any rate, is commoner now than ever before. Not so very long ago, it would hardly have been Thackeray who would have seen the silliness into which his sentiment ran; it would have required another person to do him that office of doubtful kindness. He did it for himself, and is, therefore, called cynical by that large and respectable class of people who can only believe that one is in pain if one roars with a sufficient larynx, that one is kindly if one sobs audibly where four ways meet, and, generally, can never have anything made too plain for them, and some things never plain enough.

With such people the author of "Italian Journeys" will not be so much of a favorite as he deserves to be. The thing which chiefly struck us in reading his book, or rather one of the things which struck us, was that he, better than any other American writer, illustrates the tendency of which we have been speaking. He was certainly a sentimentalist before he was a satirical humorist; in these "Italian Journeys," as well as in his "Venetian Life," he talks of Italy so that one sees he had dreamt of it before going there, and, also, as if he had done not a little dreaming after he went. Both books finally leave on the reader's mind the same sort of impression left by the Italy of story and song. But though Mr. Howells's books are pervaded by sentiment, it is sentiment satirized—satirized not with the least bitterness; on the contrary, with unfailing good nature and cheerfulness, but still so treated that the reader thinks of the writer as a man who, knowing that he has enthusiasms, knowing the delusiveness of enthusiasms, deliberately moderates, habitually restrains them and banters them. One thinks that as a poet he might make the same kind of vers de société as Praed made—and Praed would have been a sentimental lyrist of considerable name but that in him the lyrical ardor was "sicklied o'er" with an over-sensitive reserve, and balked by a delicacy and severity of judgment born of the spirit of self-criticism. Mr. Howells has the same good taste, the same love of high finish or incapacity for slovenly execution, the same knowledge of the extent of his powers, some well-proved ability as a versifier if not an equal facility, at least equal sense and wit if not equal acquirements, and a felicitous subtlety of humor, in which he has the advantage of Praed—in which, in fact, so far as we know, he has not his equal among living writers in English, and decidedly has no superior among American-born writers, living or dead.

But to leave talking about the sort of man which this delightful book and its predecessor reveal to us, and to come to the volume in hand. Of a great deal of it there is no need that we should speak to readers of the Nation, for much of it was first published in these columns. The reader makes pilgrimage in Mr. Howells's company to Padua and Ferrara and Genoa and Naples, to Pompeii and Herculaneum, to Capri under the guidance of the scoundrelly Antonino, to Rome, which Mr. Howells, like Clough, was glad and sorry, or sorry and glad, to find "rubbishy"—to Petrarch's house, to Canova's birthplace at Arquà, to Cimbric Bassano, to Como and Bologna, and many places more, all of which are treated with a sort of loving disparagement, which belongs partly to Mr. Howells in Italy and, if we may so speak, partly to the nineteenth century in Italy.

* "Italian Journeys. By W. D. Howells." New York: Hurd & Houghton. 1867.

We would not be understood as saying that very much of our author's humor does not refuse subjection to the description of it that we have given. He overflows with pure fun and humor of a delightfully quiet sort. Exclude the first sentence of the following quotation, and the passage is humor of any century—and all centuries—as well as of this century of ours:

"I hardly expected him to turn out so red-hot a democrat as he did on better acquaintance, but being a warm friend of man myself, I was not sorry. Garibaldi was the beginning and ending of his political faith, as he is with every enthusiastic Italian. The honest soul's conception of all concrete evil was brought forth in two words, of odd enough application. In Europe, and Italy more particularly, true men have suffered chiefly from this form of evil, and the captain evidently could conceive of no other cause of suffering anywhere. We were talking of the American war, and when the captain had asked the usual question, 'Quando finirà mai questa guerra?' and I responded as usual, 'Ah, ci vuol pazienza!' the captain gave a heavy sigh, and turning his head pensively aside, plucked his grapes from the cluster a moment in silence.

"Then he said: 'You Americans are in the habit of attributing this war to slavery. The cause is not sufficient.'

"I ventured to demur and explain. 'No,' said the captain, 'the cause is not sufficient. We Italians know the only cause which could produce a war like this.'

"I was naturally anxious to be instructed in the Italian theory, hoping it might be profounder than the English notion that we were fighting about tariffs.

"The captain frowned, looked at me carefully, and then said:

"'In this world there is but one cause of mischief—the Jesuits.'"

We should never have done quoting if we were to quote all of this volume that has given us great pleasure. From the beginning to the end it is a proof that in Mr. Howells we have a new writer with a peculiar gift of value sufficient to ensure him a place by himself, and a very honorable place, in American literature—in English literature. He has yet to prove that, except for his humor and his taste, he is to be of mark; we do not know that when men shall be purely rational animals and do not any more delight in being pleased, he will be of importance; but, speaking for the present, we should say that as a humorist he is the superior of all other American writers. The "Biglow Papers" will be enduringly famous for their character-painting and wit, if we do not misjudge, rather than for their humor. Mr. Howells is master of so elaborately finished a style—finished almost to finicalness in places—his taste is so exquisite, his humor so refined, that perhaps he may as well look for only a part of his audience in this generation. Some authors are wise in their generation, and for some authors there are other generations, but, if we do not rely too much on our own judgment, a constant audience Mr. Howells is sure of having. It is true that he might be still surer of it if he had it in his power to display his humor on themes of more universal interest; and that he has this in his power and will so display it, we and his other readers will believe and hope, and meantime will be thankful for anything he may choose to give us.

"NATHAN THE WISE."*

This volume forms the third in the valuable series of translations now publishing by Messrs. Leypoldt & Holt, and is accompanied with the promise of others of equal interest in literature. We are glad to be able to speak favorably of Miss Frothingham's work, which satisfies in a high degree the requirements of a good translation. In clearness of expression, in ready command of idiomatic English, and in a sufficient familiarity with the original, the translator is rarely wanting, and gives evidence of power which would be competent to deal successfully with a more difficult subject. The temperate, not to say prosaic, character of the work, the comparative uniformity of its tone and simplicity of language, give scope for little more than the most ordinary qualities of a translator, but even these are rare enough to deserve high commendation. The poem has hitherto been known to American readers chiefly through the translation of Dr. Reich, published in London in 1860. We originally intended to make a somewhat extended comparison of these translations, but an examination of the two satisfied us that, however gratifying such a comparison might be to the present translator, it would be of little value to our readers. We would not be understood as speaking too disrespectfully of Dr. Reich's translation, which is, in some respects, a meritorious one. It follows the letter of the original with perhaps greater fidelity than the American version, and shows for the most part a thorough understanding of the author's meaning and a genuine sympathy with his spirit. Its chief defects result from the translator's inadequate knowledge of English, which is shown by repeated and sometimes flagrant violations of idiom, and from his ignorance of the laws of the verse which he employs. These defects are sufficiently radical to vitiate the whole translation, and leave the present one quite by itself as a subject of criticism. We think it fair to say, however, that we have observed several passages where Miss Frothingham's understanding of the original would have been helped by a careful examination of Dr. Reich's work. An instance occurs in the second scene of the first act, where the present version gives "One roof is o'er us both;" Dr. Reich more literally and forcibly renders "You're breathing side by side with her." Dr. Reich, to be sure, in this single passage, if our text is correct, makes two needless departures from the letter of the original, but he preserves its spirit; the American translation ignores both. In Act II., Scene 2, page 59 of the volume before us, we read, "Sometimes we'll be jealous;" Dr. Reich, "Maybe he's somewhat envious." The first, to say nothing of its inaccuracy, seems to us to miss entirely the point. We have not space to allude to others which, though not generally important, are enough so to justify our remark. In a more important passage in Act I., Scene 2, one of the finest in the poem, where Nathan, addressing Daja, protests against spiritual pride, both translators spoil the effect by failing to give the true force of the climax, "Allein ein Mensch." The intensity of Nathan's feeling, rising progressively through his speech, finds concentrated expression in these words, and to render them with our version, "But think him human now," or with Dr. Reich's, "But different 'tis with man," is simply to emasculate the passage. We are tempted to suggest here what seems to us to be the chief defect in the present translation, and that is a deficiency of energy and heartiness; too much tendency to retreat behind the bulwark of dictionaries and authorized versions, and too little readiness to yield wholly to the spirit of the work, and, by being penetrated by it, to reproduce it. The ideal translator, if the book to be rendered have any original power, needs the daring, if not the genius, of the author. He should feel at least as much as he thinks.

Notwithstanding the faults we have suggested, and others of a similar character, Miss Frothingham's translation is, upon the whole, an excellent one, and by all odds the best in English. Her version, like that of Dr. Reich, is in the metre of the original, and her versification is not infrequently superior to that of her author. We have space for but a single extract, which will serve to illustrate the quality of her translation. It is taken from the speech of Saladin in the eighth scene of the fifth act:

> "Come, darling, come; be not too strict with him.
> Were he aught else, were he less hot and proud,
> He might not have preserved you. Let the one
> Excuse the other. Come; put him to shame:
> Do that which should be his—confess your love—
> Give him your hand; and if he should disdain you,
> Should he forget how infinitely more
> You did for him by this than he for you—
> What did he then for you? get singed a little!
> But what was that? Then has he naught of Assad,
> Naught of my brother, wears his likeness only,
> And not his heart. Come, love!"

We quote this passage not because it is remarkable in itself, but because it seems to us to give a fair idea of the translator's power. We can only wish that her labor had been expended upon a work of more general interest, and, if it be not too heterodox to say so, of more intrinsic merit. We have no doubt that the want of vigor which we suggested above is in some measure due to the character of the poem. We have never been able to understand fully the grounds of the reputation which "Nathan" has enjoyed among critics. It would of course be out of place to subject the poem to the ordinary tests of dramatic composition, as Lessing expressly disclaims the design of a drama. He calls it a "dramatic poem." It is dramatic in form only, not in substance. The events are connected feebly or unnaturally; the last resorts of exhausted invention appear in the characters themselves, to say nothing of the action. What, for example, could be less probable in the course of human events than the meeting in such relations of three characters like Saladin, Nathan, and the Templar? We have a Mohammedan, a Jew, and a Christian, each of virtue so angelic, so beyond the ordinary reach of human nature, that our sympathy moves from one to another in the vain hope of finding something akin to ourselves whereon to rest, and at last turns with satisfaction to Daja, or perhaps the Patriarch, as a familiar though weak and commonplace, type of human nature.

This poem, then, lacks some of the most essential elements of dramatic interest. There is not sufficient scope for the conflict of human passions and interests. Minds of so noble a type, or so thoroughly disciplined as to have made self-renunciation the law of their lives, are similar in too essential a particular to afford the degree of opposition necessary for the display of dramatic effect. The author evidently felt this defect, and has endeavored to heighten the interest by making the leading incidents of the play turn upon certain remarkable phenomena, especially the recognition of the

* "Nathan the Wise: A Dramatic Poem. By Gotthold Ephraim Lessing. Translated by Ellen Frothingham." New York: Leypoldt & Holt. 1868.

Templar by Saladin and Nathan, and of Recha by Saladin and Sittah. The failure of such an attempt is inevitable.

But if it be neither capable of producing dramatic effect in any proper sense nor true to nature in its delineation of character, wherein does its merit consist? It consists mainly, it seems to us, in the conception of the characters. However improbable in fact, there is something truly grand in the idea of three minds, each subjected to peculiar and most powerful influences of bigotry and superstition, rising superior to them all, and recognizing, each in the other, that true nobility of character which makes good men everywhere alike before God. It is something to have conceived characters like these; it is more to have shown that they are almost possible; to have made us feel assured that they were possible would have been more than we had a right to expect. We read this poem in earlier days, awed by its reputation and that of its author, and laid it aside with reverence only to forget it. We returned to it when this translation was laid before us with the same reverence, tempered somewhat, it may be, by experience. We are now satisfied that it is not a great dramatic poem, nor a really great poem of any kind; and that it will hold its reputation partly from its association with the later years of Lessing, and partly and more justly for the beauty and value of many of its detached thoughts.

We submit these views with less hesitation, from our conviction that Lessing's true strength lay in the direction of criticism and not in that of original composition. In his own field what rival has he? We sincerely hope that the present translator may be tempted to turn next to the "Laocoon," and give American readers an opportunity to become acquainted with what is, beyond comparison, the masterpiece in critical literature.

The publisher has appended to the poem Fischer's critical essay, and prefixed to it a little essay, biographical in its nature, which, with much cleverness, tells the reader who does not know Lessing all that it is necessary for him to know before reading the poem.

MAGAZINES FOR JANUARY.

THE Atlantic of this month opens with Mr. Whittier's idyllic piece, "The Wife," a rather pretty little courting scene, with accessories of New England hills, mowing, golden-rod by the roadside, and so forth. The love-making takes a Clara Vere-de-Verish turn for a little while, but comes to a good end, and the verses are as pure and kind and pleasant as all Mr. Whittier's later works. The landlord might as well, we should say, have been dispensed with; for the station in life to which he was called he is, perhaps, the least bit too sentimental, and we do not know how he should know so much of Miss Mary's courtship. "Flotsam and Jetsam" follows "The Wife," and is a story more than commonly well written, and showing in the writer some study of figures and some, though less, study of character. In "Pittsburg" we come upon Mr. Parton, and get a good description of a Pittsburg day, and a readable account of several branches of Pittsburg business, as, for instance, coal-mining and the making of great guns. We see that the Transcript, of Boston, finds some fault with us in its gentle way for our too irreverent treatment of Mr. Parton's article in the December Atlantic—the article on the electrotyping company at Providence. The editor suggests that if we ourselves would, instead of doing some other things, publish such essays as that one of Mr. Parton's, we might readily increase our present circulation to a circulation of two hundred thousand copies. He turns against us our own little joke, and declares that a series of papers descriptive of the making of "Plantation Bitters" and other such manufactures would sensibly help us in conferring benefits on the reading public. Perhaps he is a little too sanguine as to the degree of prosperity we could reach; or perhaps he says two hundred thousand when he means twenty thousand; to get into a wild way of talking is easy; but we suppose he is substantially correct. Doubtless we might add ten thousand or even twenty thousand to our circulation by publishing exhaustive treatises on various branches of American industry—such treatises, say, as it would pay the manufacturers to scatter broadcast throughout the country as advertisements. And to get a man to prepare them would not be very hard. It is altogether probable that a "graphic, readable, thoroughly magaziny" account of the "Platform Scale" business or the rise and glory of Mr. "Helmbold's Buchu" would put the Nation, if it should print them, in the proud position of commanding still more of the admiration and envy of "our enterprising publishers" In fact, sometimes, with the example before us of many of our newspapers and periodicals, when we think of all the money we might make by all the puffing we might do, we feel like crying out, in the language of Clive, who —when gentlemen insinuated that he had degraded himself by accepting money for rendering such good offices as his high position gave him power to render—is reported to have said, with profanity, which we omit: "Mr. Chairman, at this moment I stand astonished at my own moderation." By some fault of ours, we suppose, the Transcript has missed—apparently it missed—the real meaning of our remarks. It is to be regretted that we spoke no more plainly. But it is hardly worth while now to explain. We may say, though, before leaving the subject, that when we begin to increase the circulation of the Nation by the means which the Transcript points out we shall be troubled by this fear—that other journals, seduced by our example and not so well knowing when to stop, may be led into puffing all sorts of enterprises, the bad not less than the good. We therefore refrain our feet. And it would give us some considerable pleasure to see the Atlantic—which we have always more or less respected as a chief pillar of American literature—and the Transcript, between which and the Atlantic there is a certain connection, and all other good journals and magazines—it would give us not a little pleasure, we say, to see them all setting the highest possible example; all doing nothing to cause even the weakest brethren to offend.

Dr. Hayes's "Dr. Molke's Friends" is really interesting; we do not know of better descriptions of Arctic scenery, and he gives a dramatic interest to his story. The "Combat of Diomed and Mars" gives Mr. Bryant's name to the Atlantic for January; he translates the end of the fifth book of the "Iliad." "Our Second Girl" is by Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe, and is a short love story, in the composition of which, we fear, Mrs. Stowe had interested motives. It looks as if she intended to entice young women of breeding, but of small means, into the position of table-girls. But if that was what she meant, she would have done well to have made Mr. Tom fall in love with Mary while she yet was a servant in Beacon Street. To let her wait till he happens upon her in Newport, where she is a segment of one of our upper circles, is not the way to bring free and cultivated American young ladies out of the paper-box factories and laundries and printing-offices, and other places where they escape rulers of their own sex and get more or less independence, to the relief of the much-perplexed American housekeeper. Neither as a story merely is "Our Second Girl" very clever.

"Byways of Europe," by Bayard Taylor, "The Late President Wayland," by an anonymous author, and "The Old Masters in the Louvre," we have read—except a part of the article first mentioned—and we do not recommend them for perusal. We are not competent to set aside any of Mr. Benson's judgments on particular works of art, but it is pretty safe to disregard entirely a person who writes with so much heat as he evidently puts into his writing. There is a gushingness about him that reminds one of "slopping over," as A. Ward said, and most slopping over is due to unsteadiness rather than over-fulness. Mr. Higginson's "Oldport Wharves" we began to read with expectations of pleasure; and there is something good about the hulk of the pirate ship and the American boy and the old Newport pilots. Mr. Howells, concerning "Mrs. Johnson," his negro cook, is delightful for his humorous fancy, and besides him there are among this month's contributors Emerson, Lowell, Hawthorne, and Dickens. Certainly the magazine does not lack distinguished names. Whittier, Mrs. Stowe, Mr. Parton, Bayard Taylor, Dr. Bushnell—we suppose, in the notice of Professor Stowe's book—Howells, Bryant, Lowell, Dickens, Emerson, and Hawthorne are on the list, and most of the writers named have sent something well worth reading.

As for Mr. Dickens, he is apparently going to publish in the Atlantic one of his briefer and less important tales. The first chapters of it describe sketchily a boy who grows shy under the harsh treatment of his father and mother, and—when these die in a London cellar, of fever and starvation—under the influence of a dreary old farm-house in the country. A hypocritical dissenter is also introduced. The story promises pretty well.

"Hawthorne in the Boston Custom-House" consists of letters which Hawthorne, while an officer of the customs, wrote to some of his friends. He was then, perhaps, twenty-five years old, or thereabouts; the style in which he writes is not just such as he would perhaps have written years afterwards; but the man himself is to be seen in them—not only the young man, but the man who is to be always young. There is no thought here so deep but many as beautiful as any he ever gave us, and some as subtle. He had long before that time been a writer, and we can see him here as watchful and studious of everything likely to be of use to him as we know he was afterwards. We suppose that no other American author has left behind him so much material for the biographer who shall write the history of the growth of his genius as Hawthorne has left in his journal and letters. At any rate, considered from this point of view, they are instructive and delightful reading.

Mr. Emerson's "Aspects of Culture" is full of nobly beautiful thought. It opens with a glorification of our material prosperity which would please Mr. Parton, and then ascends to a point from which the chief use of Mr.

Parton's natural sciences is seen to be metaphysical and to a praise of the ideal, entirely in Mr. Emerson's manner, reducing "All that 's made to a green thought in a green shade," as thus: "Spiritual is stronger than any material force"—"Nature is mute but as the soul quickens it"—"The mind of man is the key to the whole"—"Nature always the effect, mind the flowing cause"—"The moral sentiment is the fountain of power"—"Mind carries the law; history is its slow and atomic unfolding"—"There is no use in Copernicus if the robust periodicity of the solar system does not show its equal perfection in the mental sphere"—"I shall never believe that centrifugence and centripetence balance unless mind heats and meliorates as well as the surface and soil of the globe."

Mr. Lowell writes "In the Twilight," a poem whose title tells what it is. Musings by the fireside, at the hour when the night, before she sends the day to join its innumerable predecessors, shows us some of them belonging to the past which we hold in memory, some of them vague as if belonging to a previous existence. The opening image is finely appropriate, and the whole poem is beautiful. Some of the verses are very successfully onomatopoetic, but we are not able to make all the stanzas read musically.

The poetry in the Galaxy consists of some verses by Doctor T. W. Parsons, who compliments highly, rather than elegantly or neatly, a lady to whom he sends a book of his poems. There are also some verses by Mr. Edgar Fawcett, not bad of their kind. Mr. William L. Stone, who has recently translated Madame Riedesel's "Letters and Journals," writes an article putting "Burgoyne in a New Light"—not so very new either—and showing the entire incompetency of that finished gentleman—of the time of George the Third—to command his army of invasion. As an aid to getting a proper view of our Revolutionary generals—a view quite different from that one which exalts them into demigods—Mr. Stone's article is worthy of perusal. Teachers of district schools, widows of members of the Society of Cincinnati, Southern statesmen, Fourth of July orators, could hardly do a better thing than read it. They will see that it was not so miraculous a thing for our national bird to "catawampously chaw up" the British beast as some of us have been apt to think; and that it will be good for some of us to have this truth presented to us, no one will doubt who is familiar with the legal voter. Sound views on his part in regard to repudiation are, just at this moment, of more importance than a dispassionate estimate of Sir George Provost's defeat at Plattsburgh; but still all truth is good, and Mr. Stone does the state some service in correcting the school history and showing what it was exactly that Gates and Schuyler fought against. A better article, however, is Mr. E. E. Hale's clever but, apparently, hastily prepared article on "The Same Christmas in Old England and New." In Old England, on Christmas, 1620, Marshal Cadenet landed at Dover, having come as ambassador to James the First, proposing the marriage of Prince Charles with Henrietta. In New England, on that day, the Puritans began to cut timber for the first house in Plymouth, seemingly desecrating the day with malice prepense. This contrast is sufficiently striking, we suppose. To make it more so, Mr. Hale finds in Cadenet's despatch-bag the civil war, the Commonwealth, the execution of Charles the First, the abdication of James the Second, the descent of the Pretender and of the Young Pretender. But they were not there; as for all those things, the marshal had as much to do with them as if he had been non-existent, and Christmas, 1620, is the wrong day from which to date the Jacobite woes, however it may be as regards the glories of our Puritans. Mr. Hale's virile force as a writer, and his humor, are seen to very good advantage in this little essay. The Galaxy appears in a new cover—yellow—with a design printed upon it in black, much more seemly than either of its two former outsides, and perhaps as pretty as any of the pictorial magazine covers. The proprietors are wise to print their cover in only one color hereafter, and so save money, while their magazine presents a much more respectable appearance.

The Broadway has an article, by Sala, descriptive of "New Year's Day in New York," with only one blunder in it, so far as we have observed, but not very readable. We mention the article—and the magazine for that matter—to say that Mr. Nast, who is no respecter of persons, in illustrating it has produced a comic effect by representing, among the New Year's callers at an up-town front door, Mr. Johnson, Mr. Horace Greeley, Mr. Raymond, and other men of fame.

Harper's is as good as usual. The author of "John Halifax" has begun a novel in this number, and we read with pleasure an article entitled "Among the Wheat-fields of Minnesota," and another called "German Newspapers." As to this latter, the author's philosophizing we thought not valuable enough to repay the pains it must have cost him; but he states clearly a great many interesting facts about the life of German journalists. The "Easy Chair" we always read, and we believe we never read it without liking it—sometimes well, sometimes better than well. We praise also the paper, "In the Five Points," which is more than tolerably well done. For the rest, the magazine "contains the usual variety of matter, and is a feast," as they say.

In Hours at Home Dr. Bushnell writes of the moral uses of "Physical Danger," and finds it easy to make out his case. The sixth of Professor Tyler's "Representative Cities" is Rome—not, as one might suppose, so well done as Damascus and the others. Mr. Alfred B. Street contributes one of the most unsuccessful poems—"The Titan"—which we have seen for a long time. Mr. Sherwood's "Magenta" is, however, too bad altogether. The editor will surely be getting a round-robin from the other contributors if he publishes a third production of Mr. Sherwood's muse. Miss Yonge's "Chaplet of Pearls" goes on in this number of the magazine, and will be found readable. So, perhaps, will Mr. E. D. Neill's "Old Virginia Schools and Early Ministers," which is laborious and careful; but Mr. Neill ought to have told us whether all the money and all the work expended for schools in Virginia produced any schools or colleges, and this he unaccountably fails to do, though he probably knows. The article on "Deaf Mute Instruction" seems to us to owe too much to Mr. F. B. Sanborn's article in a late North American. Not that we charge the writer with borrowing his facts from a source so little recondite; as to that we have no opinion whatever; but the editor ought not to have republished matter so nearly identical with what has been published before.

Whoever would like a sample of the eloquence of the famous Père Hyacinthe may find it in the January Catholic World. He addressed the Congress at Malines on "The Labor Question," and there is literally nothing in what he said—nothing that touches the labor question. Aubrey de Vere has some fine verses, "Mater Filii," ending with this characteristically ingenious and Roman Catholic turn of thought:

> "'If I but touch his vesture's hem,
> I shall be healed, and strong, and free—'
> Thou wert his vesture, Mary; them
> His virtue heals that cling to thee."

It seems a pity that Mr. de Vere should be the laureate of the immaculate conception—to dogma give up what was meant for mankind; but it is not to be denied that it is worth while to take for a little time the Catholic point of view for the sake of more fully appreciating his strains, which are unfailingly delightful. "Matin," also, by R. S. Willis, is pleasing poetry. We do not know when we have read anything with more pleasure than "The Comedy of Convocation," which is the title alike of the fifteenth article in the Catholic World and of an English pamphlet which the Catholic Publication House is about to reprint. The article is wholly composed of extracts from the pamphlet, which, for its wit and fun and acuteness, is really admirable. We heartily recommend all our readers, of whatever shade of religious belief, to give themselves the pleasure of reading it, and we advise the Catholic Publication House to print a very large edition of it. The work is said to be from the pen of Father Newman, and is every way worthy of the imputed authorship.

The Riverside Magazine for Young People (Hurd & Houghton) has added to its attractions for older people by giving two pictures of a certain value, full page wood-cuts after drawings by Mr. La Farge. In the December number of the magazine was "The Wolf Charmer," with some explanatory text translated from the French of George Sand; in the current number is "The Pied Piper of Hamelin," drawn to illustrate Robert Browning's well-known poem which accompanies it here. The style of wood-engraving employed for the pages of the Riverside is almost uniformly bad, and these pictures are not excepted from the rule. The complete wiping out of all expression of face from all the childish party following the Pied Piper, except the baby and the bullet-headed little boy behind the Piper's back, is the best instance of what we mean that we can give. The drawing must have been rich in expression. There is an active and fruitful fancy, and perhaps something better than that, in these pictures. Mr. La Farge seems to us to have great qualities as a book illustrator.

Our Young Folks for January also shows improved illustrations. Mr. Dickens begins a children's story, and his portrait in steel is made the frontispiece of the number.

Life and Letters of Madame Swetchine. By Count de Falloux, of the French Academy. Translated by H. W. Preston. (Boston: Roberts Brothers. 1867.)—These memoirs are valuable chiefly as an interesting contribution to purely Catholic literature, but gain a somewhat more general human interest from the graceful manner in which they are written, and the insight they give us into a character not only religious, but at the same time intellectual and highly cultivated. The letters of Eugénie de Guérin revealed a nature somewhat similar, but in her there was the glow of imaginative and poetic feeling, and the raptures and rewards, the despondencies also, of the religious life were clothed by genius with a seductive charm of expression for which we look in vain in these letters. If we say that Madame Swetchine was neither a genius nor a saint, we wish neither to insinuate a doubt as to the value of her literary remains nor the depth and sincerity of her religious faith; but simply to imply that her religious emotions are not so ecstatic as to excite enthusiasm, and that her letters, though they abound in fine and well-expressed thoughts, and always indicate a clear, forcible, well-regulated, and well-trained mind, are lacking in that sympathetic quality which inevitably converts readers into friends.

Madame Swetchine was born in Moscow in the year 1782, during the reign of Catharine II., in whose court her father, M. Soymonof, held a prominent position. She died in Paris in 1857. Her life embraces, therefore, a long and very stormy period in European politics; but, though some little stress is occasionally laid by her biographer on external events, and her correspondence is full of allusions to them, no part of the interest which attaches to her is due to her surroundings. Her life was singularly uneventful. She was married at seventeen to a man of forty-two, who was selected for her by her father. "Sophia acquiesced in this choice," says her biographer, "as in all which emanated from her father, with loving deference. She had lost her mother several years before; and what specially attracted her in this union was the certainty that she would not be separated from her little sister."

General Swetchine seems to have been a kind husband, but is said not to have been his wife's equal in mind, and apparently took little interest in her favorite pursuits. She had no children, and on the death of her father, to whom she was profoundly attached, she threw herself into religion with a zeal which seems to us to intimate that her heart was unoccupied. She entered the Greek Church, and for years remained a communicant with it. She was not, however, one of those saintly natures in which religious fervor and works of charity leave no room for other aspirations. She was a hard student and a catholic reader—rejecting no book because its sentiments differed from her own, and never laying aside a work of value without analyzing it, making copious notes, and in some cases copying it entire. This portion of her life, ranging from her nineteenth to her thirty-third year, seems to us the most suggestive and valuable. In the voluminous correspondence with Mlle. Stourdza which forms the principal record of it, she shows herself to be a loving and steadfast friend, and manifests a rare capacity of withholding her judgment until she had sufficient grounds for forming it, and, generally, of acting according to reason instead of impulse. During this period also she contracted an intimate friendship with the celebrated Count de Maistre, who exercised a great, though for a long while a successfully combated, influence in converting her to Catholicism. There were no great obstacles in the way of such a conversion. Though her reading had included Kant and Fichte and Hegel, she was troubled by no metaphysical doubts as to the truth of the fundamental religious dogmas, and had no prejudices against that form of faith which she finally adopted. The manner of her conversion was in this wise. In June, 1815, she secluded herself with a library full of ecclesiastical histories. "She ascended," says Count de Falloux, "to the sources of history; she compared dates; she studied languages; over and above all she gave her soul to prayer. The Princess Alexis Galitzin, already a Catholic, had composed an invocation to God, in which she interceded for the conversion of her friend; and this prayer she had repeated daily, ever since the 10th of January, 1810." As usual, Madame Swetchine read with pen in hand. "From the 1st to the 25th of November she composed and wrote three hundred pages of enormous size. In two days, from the 25th to the 27th of November, she wrote twenty-six." We are at liberty to conjecture which of these agencies proved most efficacious in producing the desired result—whether the study of languages, the books of manuscripts, or the prayer of the Princess Alexis; but by the 31st of August Madame Swetchine had decided the Greek Church to be in error, the Papal supremacy to be an unquestionable fact, and was ready to make her profession of faith as a Catholic.

Father Newman tells us that since he entered the Church he has been perfectly happy and free from all religious doubts; and Madame Swetchine seems to have been in much the same condition—a condition which, though it may seem to be desirable, is not, on the whole, particularly interesting to the outside world. Madame Swetchine lived a long life which was filled with devotion and good works; she attracted to her numerous friends, some of whom are well known in literature, and was regarded by them with the greatest respect and affection. Her mind was essentially womanly and non-creative, but she exerted a powerful influence on some of the best minds of her time. There are a few letters from M. de Tocqueville which show in how high esteem he held her, and are, besides, more provocative of thought than anything else in the book; which, like most religious lives, is chiefly interesting to the members of a particular religious sect. One makes exceptions, of course, as in the case of the "Apologia pro Vitâ Suâ," in which the style and spirit of the work are so admirable that readers of all shades of thought are attracted by it. But this life, though gracefully written, is not particularly suggestive; and Madame Swetchine, though she was doubtless a lovely, accomplished, and devout woman, is not a woman in whom one can be profoundly interested.

Geschichte der deutschen Einwanderung in Amerika. Von Friedrich Kapp. Erster Band. Die Deutschen im Staate New York bis zum Anfange des neunzehnten Jahrhunderts. Mit einer Karte. (New York: E. Steiger, 17 North William Street. 1867.)—The reason assigned by Tacitus for believing the Germans to be natives of their soil is favorable to the notion that they would readily abandon it for a better. "Who would live in Germany," he cries, "rather than in Asia, Africa, or Italy, unless it were his fatherland? In Germany, unsightly of region, rough of climate, savage even in its civilization." And, accordingly, poor Divitiacus, in soliciting the aid of Cæsar against the men that "fought mit Ariovistus," said with a shudder, "In a few years we shall all be driven out of Gaul, and all the Germans will have crossed the Rhine—for our land and our style of living are infinitely better than theirs." So early, and nobody knows how much earlier, began that emigration from Germany the latest form of which is here described by Mr. Kapp. In these nineteen centuries the restless Germans have possessed themselves of many lands by migration, or by conquest, and from all we know of Bismark, it is not probable that they are yet ready to give up their inveterate habit. It is well, therefore, for Mr Kapp to show us exactly what they have done and are doing in America, where already their direct influence is so great, and where it is destined to be greater.

But this is not his only purpose, as he declares in his preface. With that constancy to his fatherland which was the more remarkable when Germany resembled the fragments of Medea's dissection more than the rejuvenated Æson who now gives the law to Central Europe, Mr. Kapp desires to console Germany for her past disruption and weakness by holding up to her the spectacle of a vast colony sent forth from her bosom and speedily arrived at material greatness and political freedom on this side the Atlantic. "Nil desperandum Tuiscone duce, et auspice Tuiscone."

To this work our author brings unusual powers and facilities. Having long lived in America and been so placed as to learn much not only of the recent emigration from Germany, but of those incidents of our Revolutionary period in which his countrymen were deeply concerned, he has diligently availed himself of these opportunities. His "Life of Steuben," "Life of De Kalb," and "German Mercenaries in America," are contributions of great value to American history; while the studies which they required in preparation have given him access to many details of earlier and later annals. These will chiefly appear, we should judge, in the first volume of the work before us. Although announced to be published entire in five numbers before the first of October, 1867, we have received only the first number, of 88 pages, bringing the history down to the middle of the fifth chapter and to the year 1709.

Of the four complete chapters here given, two, the first and the fourth, relate to the general character of the German emigration and to the special causes which induced it in the last two centuries; while the other two are occupied with Peter Minnewit and Jacob Leisler, Germans of eminence in the first century of the history of New York. It seems that Minnewit, or, as he is generally called in our histories, Minuit, was a deacon of the Reformed Church at Wesel on the Rhine before he filled a similar office at New York in 1627–1636. He was an important man in the Dutch colony, and afterwards in the Swedish colony at Fort Christina on the Delaware, where he died in 1641. Leisler is better known. Mr. Kapp calls him "the second and last German governor of New York." He was from Frankfort-on-the-Main, and came to New York as a private soldier in 1660. Before 1688 he became wealthy and conspicuous, so as to be readily accepted as a leader in the colonial troubles which followed the downfall of James II., and which led to his own downfall and execution in 1691.

We cannot promise our readers that they will find the history of Minnewit and Leisler of a very absorbing interest. The generalizations of Mr. Kapp are of more value to most readers and serve as a good introduction to his book. He writes in a serious and, for a German, a clear and lively style; not so fascinating as Heine, nor so sententious as Tacitus, but, on the whole, more adapted than either to the taste of his countrymen, in whose language he has written, and for whom, no doubt, his book is chiefly intended. A translation of the work, when complete, would find many readers among those who are unacquainted with the German tongue.

The Layman's Breviary; or, Meditations for Every Day in the Year. From the German of Leopold Schefer. By C. T. Brooks. (Boston: Roberts Brothers. 1867.)—Of the many volumes of devotion which have recently appeared, this volume seems to us the best. That it is translated by Rev. C. T. Brooks, of Newport, is sufficient proof that the work is done well, for his skill has been amply vindicated in the past by his translation of Jean Paul's "Titan" and Goethe's "Faust," and many German lyrics. But there was no lack of translations of "Faust," and "Titan" appeals to but few readers, while this book, most excellently translated by Mr. Brooks, is sure to be extensively and permanently popular. It is simple in its structure as it is deep in meaning and hopeful in spirit. No one can read it without being helped and comforted and cheered. Its views of life are healthy, fresh, and strong. There is here no theology and no pietism, but plenty of religion. It is easy to understand why it has been so popular in Germany. It first appeared there in 1834, and Mr. Brooks's translation is from the twelfth edition. He has seen fit, and wisely we think, to supply headings to the various meditations. It would seem that the plan of the work, "meditations for every day in the year," could not be favorable to inspiration; but these poems are as spontaneous as if they had not been written with reference to any such plan.

The Turk and the Greek; or, Creeds, Races, Society, and Scenery in Turkey, Greece, and the Isles of Greece. By S. G. W. Benjamin. (New York: Hurd & Houghton. 1867.)—For a book of two hundred and seventy pages the title-page here promises a great deal. And the promise is kept only after a fashion. All of the above-named subjects do manage to have something said about them, though sometimes it is very little. But what is said is said in a very easy, graceful manner; and a man whose time hangs heavy on his hands could spend an hour with Mr. Benjamin with much pleasure and some profit. There is this to say in favor of the book, and it is not a little, namely, that its author has had first-rate opportunities for studying the various aspects of Eastern life. For he is no hasty traveller, but the son of a missionary born and reared in the East, and returning after a few years of absence in America. But for the very reason that he has had such splendid opportunities he should have given us something vastly more substantial than the present work. His Eastern life does not seem to have Orientalized his tastes and character; he is very sturdily American in every page. We trust that he will one day tell us more of his experience, and tell it better.

Tam O'Shanter. By Robert Burns. With illustrations by E. H. Miller, photographed by Gardner. (New York: W. J. Widdleton. 1868.)—In a good-sized quarto, not so exaggerated in width of margin as "St. Gwendoline," reviewed two weeks ago, but, like that book, with the text printed on one side only of the leaf, the inimitable and immortal poem of "Tam O'Shanter" is presented again to the world. The type is large and clear, the pages not badly proportioned, and very few of them are disfigured by notes. The copy sent to us is very badly sewed, and the pages do not lie flat; but this may be exceptional. The photographs are tolerably well made from rough drawings in ink or in sepia. These drawings have been dreadfully slighted in all matters of execution, and there is some extraordinarily bad drawings of horses and of men; but they contain some not badly studied cottage interiors, and there are faces of considerable expression. Thus, in the picture of the bacchanalian jollification by the "ingle, bleezing finely," the figure and face of the Souter, his attitude and action, are well imagined, and the landlord's laughing face, although of rather a conventional type, is not an inappropriate one; there is more "local color," too, than is usual in the furniture and accessories. But the picture is badly composed and coarse, the lights and darks harshly contrasted, the handling inartistic and unrefined. There is a touch of nature, quite clever if it was intentional, in the change from the great quart mugs of this picture to the diminutive goblets of the next; in the latter the stirrup cup is being served, which the landlord pays for.

GIFTS FOR THE HOLIDAYS.

Standard and Historical Works,

IN FINE BINDINGS,

Publications of

LITTLE, BROWN & CO.,

110 Washington Street, Boston.

White's Shakespeare, 12 vols. crown 8vo or 16mo.
Bancroft's History of the United States, 9 vols. 8vo.
The British Essayists, 38 vols. 16mo.
The Works of Edmund Burke, 12 vols. crown 8vo.
Parkman's Historical Works, 3 vols. small 8vo.
Palfrey's New England, 3 vols. 8vo.
The Life of Joseph Warren, 8vo.
Sparks's American Biography, 15 vols. 16mo.
Sparks's Life and Writings of Washington, 12 vols. 8vo.
Life and Works of John Adams, 10 vols. 8vo.
Life and Public Services of Samuel Adams, 3 vols. 8vo.
Rives's Life and Times of Madison, Vols. I. and II., 8vo.
Life of Timothy Pickering, Vol. I., 8vo.
Oliver's Puritan Commonwealth, 8vo.
Sabine's American Loyalists, 2 vols. 8vo.
Savage's Genealogical Dictionary, 4 vols. 8vo.
Webster's Life and Works, 6 vols. 8vo.
Everett's Orations and Speeches, 3 vols. 8vo.
Winthrop's Speeches and Addresses, 2 vols. 8vo.
Boutwell's Speeches, 12mo.
Brazil and the Brazilians, 8vo.
Works of Epictetus, crown 8vo.
Dr. Bigelow's Modern Enquiries, crown 8vo.
Grimm's Michael Angelo, 2 vols. crown 8vo.
The Science of Wealth, 8vo.
Walton's Angler, Major's edition, 16mo.
Familiar Quotations, 16mo.

LIBRARY AGENCY.

G. P. PUTNAM & SON, 661 BROADWAY, N. Y.,

Are Commission Agents to purchase books by the thousand or single—English or American—for public libraries or individuals, on the most favorable terms, according to the quantity ordered.

FOUR NEW BOOKS.

CIVILIZATION IN THE FIFTH CENTURY. History of Civilization in the Fifth Century. Translated, by permission, from the French of A. Fred. Ozanam, late Professor of French Literature in the Faculty of Letters at Paris. By A. C. GLYN, B.A. 2 vols. 12mo, cloth, $3 50.

HODGSON'S REFORMERS AND MARTYRS. The Lives, Sentiments, and Sufferings of some of the Reformers and Martyrs before, since, and independent of the Lutheran Reformation. By WM. HODGSON. 1 vol. 12mo, fine cloth, price $2.

ECCE DEUS HOMO; or, the Work and Kingdom of the Christ of Scripture. 12mo, tinted paper, extra cloth, price $1 50.

WALDEMAR KRONE. The Story of Waldemar Krone's Youth. By H. F. EWALD, author of "The Nordby Family," "Johannes Falk," etc. Translated from the Danish. 1 vol. 12mo, neat cloth, price $1 75.

For sale by Booksellers generally, or will be sent by mail, postage free, on receipt of price by

J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO.,

PUBLISHERS,

PHILADELPHIA.

RARE AND CURIOUS BOOKS.

CATALOGUE of a CHOICE COLLECTION of RARE, CURIOUS, and VALUABLE BOOKS, in various languages and departments of literature. Sent gratis to any address on application to the publishers—GEO. P. PHILES & Co., 172 Fulton St., N. Y.

THE POEMS

OF

Elizabeth Barrett Browning.

A new and beautiful edition, printed on fine tinted paper, elegantly bound in bevelled boards. Complete in 3 vols., corrected by the last London edition, price $7 50.

POEMS OF CHILDHOOD. By ELIZABETH BARRETT BROWNING. Printed on fine tinted paper, and beautifully illustrated by Hennessey and Thwaites. Bound in bevelled boards, price $3 50.

THE COOPER GALLERY; OR, PAGES AND PICTURES FROM THE WRITINGS OF JAMES FENIMORE COOPER, with Notes. With numerous Illustrations on steel and wood by eminent artists. Handsomely bound in morocco, price $15.

THE AMERICAN BOY'S LIFE OF WASHINGTON. By Mrs. ANNA M. HYDE. With illustrations. Price $1 25.

THRILLING INCIDENTS IN AMERICAN HISTORY; being a Selection of the most Important and Interesting Events, compiled from the most approved authorities. By J. W. BARBER. Illustrated. Price $1 50.

AUNT CARRIE'S STORY BOOK. For Good Boys and Girls. Illustrated. Price $1 25.

THE CHILD'S HOME STORY BOOK. A Selection by AGNES STRICKLAND. Illustrated. Price $1 50.

MY NEW PICTURE BOOK. With Ninety Colored Illustrations. $1 50.

MILLER'S NURSERY PICTURE BOOKS. With One Hundred Colored Illustrations, by Bennett and others. $1 50.

THE CHILD'S NEW PICTURE PLAY BOOK. With Fifty Colored Illustrations by Harrison Weir and others. $1 50.

TRUE STORIES; OR, PICTURES FROM THE HISTORY OF THE SWISS. Illustrated. $1 25.

TRUE STORIES; OR, PICTURES FROM THE HISTORY OF SPAIN. Illustrated. $1 25.

Sent free on receipt of price.

JAMES MILLER, Publisher,

522 Broadway.

THE NATION.—"Probably the ablest and most scholarly weekly ever issued in this country."—N. Y. Observer.

The Nation.

VOL. VI.—NO. 132. THURSDAY, JANUARY 9, 1868. { FIVE DOLLARS PER ANNUM. TWELVE CENTS PER COPY.

CONTENTS.

THE WEEK 21

EDITORIAL ARTICLES:
Southern Influence on the Republican Party 24
Commercial Morality in America and in England 24
The Right of Expatriation 26
The Great American Novel 27
England 29

NOTES:
Literary 30
The Huguenots in England 32
The Political Condition of Greece 33
Two Thousand Miles on Horseback 35
Dr Wilmer's Love.—The Lover's Dictionary.—Horse Portraiture ..... 36—37

Five Dollars per annum, in advance; Six months, Three Dollars; Forty Dollars to Clubs of Ten; Clergymen, Four Dollars.

THE NATION is sent till positively ordered discontinued, and all arrears have been paid. Subscribers are particularly requested to note the expiration of their subscriptions, and to forward what is due for the ensuing year, with or without further reminder from this office.

GEORGE STREET, 30 CORNHILL, LONDON, E. C., AGENT FOR THE RECEIPT OF SUBSCRIPTIONS AND ADVERTISEMENTS.

E. L. GODKIN & CO., PUBLISHERS, 130 NASSAU STREET, N. Y.

The Week.

CONGRESS assembled again on Monday. The first day was not a very busy one. In the Senate, Mr. Reverdy Johnson brought up the question of the admission of Mr. Thomas as senator from Maryland; and there was some good debate by Mr. Edmunds, Mr. Howe, Mr. Johnson, Mr. Howard, and Mr. Trumbull, but nothing done. In the House, there was the regular Monday morning call of States for bills and joint resolutions, the most important bill offered being one by Mr. Broomall, of Pennsylvania, providing for the gradual contraction of the currency by the redemption of legal-tender notes, when presented in sums of less than $100, at 140 during the first month, 139½ the second, and so on till gold and legal-tenders are of equal value, which would be the case, Mr. Broomall thinks, in six years and eight months. Then the House referred to the Reconstruction Committee a scheme of Mr. Boutwell's, of which the main point is that all the military districts are to be thrown into one, and put under command of the General of the Army. Next, by a strict party vote, General Hancock was refused a vote of thanks, and, on the other hand, the Republicans thanked Grant for his resistance to the removal of Sheridan. The House did nothing else of importance, except that, at the instance of Mr. Banks, it passed with great despatch a bill making eight hours a legal day's work in all Government shops and yards. Ostensibly, this is done that the number of men employed may be increased during the present hard times; but we suppose the working-men in Mr. Banks's and other districts will hear of it pretty often during the next Presidential and Congressional canvass. On Tuesday nothing of moment occurred in the House. The Senate repealed the Internal Revenue tax on cotton, but provided for levying it again in 1869.

The charge brought against Mr. Thomas, senator elect from Maryland, by the New York bankers, of having aided Cobb in putting the Government credit in peril in 1860, appears to have been successfully met by evidence; but the charge of disloyal conduct in Maryland, and particularly of having advanced money to his son to enable him to join the Confederate army, still resists all solvents that have been applied to it. The discussion on this last matter became somewhat nice and metaphysical, the point being raised, whether a man who gave one hundred dollars to a son who was going, in spite of him, to run away and join the rebels, should be held to have given it him as pocket-money for his relief in sickness or trouble, or as travelling expenses to enable him to reach his destination. Without pretending to throw any light on so knotty a question, we take leave to say, that we think the Senate is hardly in such a state of mental composure as to be fit to hold the scales while a father's motives, under such circumstances, are being weighed. Mr. Thomas's loyalty ought to be tested, and in this rough world can only be tested fairly, by a review of his conduct in matters purely political. In domestic life, we all act from mixed motives, and few of us are equal to playing the part of Brutus, let our loyalty or love of justice be ever so great.

Mr. Upson has introduced a resolution, to which Mr. Boutwell has added another, setting the Reconstruction Committee to work to find out whether it would not be a good thing to give the constitutional conventions at the South the appointment of all civil officers in the various States of the South, and also—this is Mr. Boutwell's suggestion—whether it would not be well to "constitute" the whole of the said States a vast military district, and to declare the governments set up by order of the President to be no governments at all, by act of Congress. It must be remembered that these suggestions come from gentlemen who, with their friends, have had the work of reconstruction completely in their hands for two years at least, and have enjoyed during the whole of that period the support and forbearance of the public. They have passed what bills they pleased, with as little discussion as they pleased, which was very little indeed. The Reconstruction bill which they produced at the end of this period was found after it was enacted to be, owing to their haste, carelessness, and impatience of criticism, singularly defective, and Congress had to be summoned in the middle of summer to amend it; it has had more recently to be amended again; and it has been put into operation and has nearly done its work—the country waiting in great anxiety for the result. At this point one of the authors of the bill himself steps forward and asks us gravely to make an entirely new arrangement, and treat the law as if it had never been passed, and as if no such thing as reconstruction had ever been contemplated. We take it for granted that the Republican party sees that it has borne with as much of this sort of "statesmanship" as it can well stand. We hope it does, at all events.

The New York Tribune of Monday contained a letter from Washington, giving an account of the condition of the political world there, which was decidedly the ablest piece of writing—ablest, we mean, from an artistic point of view—we remember to have seen in a newspaper for a long while. The writer—who might be Wendell Phillips, greatly sobered down and writing under personal intimidation; or "Warrington," of the Springfield Republican, shorn of everything in him that the Anti-Slavery Standard or Boston Commonwealth thinks able or "witty;" or Horace Greeley, in a state of considerable depression, after having passed a night with the Jockey Club; but who wields a keener blade and has a more supple wrist than any of them—discusses, with great show of philosophy, the coming Presidential campaign. He enumerates, as possible candidates, Chase, Grant, Colfax, Butler, and Morton, but the only one whose chances he seriously discusses is Grant, of whom he thinks badly. He sets forth with great force and feeling the objections to soldier-candidates, but many of them are of a kind that lead us to suspect him of having passed most of his life in Paris. He divides the Republican party into three classes: 1, The dissatisfied Republicans in the South; 2, The Butler Republicans in the West, who want to pay the national bonds in currency; 3, The Anti-National-Bank

Republicans. We do not ourselves think very much of all this as a bit of classification, but as the work of an acute observer it is worth attention. He sketches in mere outline, however, and in charcoal, the best man for the Presidency under all the circumstances. The head he does not produce, but, unless we are greatly mistaken, the remainder of the person is that of the Chief-Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, clarum et venerabile nomen. On reading over the writer's list of objections to military candidates, we thought seriously of putting down the objections that suggest themselves to candidates who are already on the judicial bench, and we found on running through them that they were far weightier and graver than those under which the soldiers labor, but too numerous to mention this week. Soldiers die, and they need great wars to raise them to eminence. A court of justice never dies, and the conversion of its bench into a platform from which men may step into the Presidency we should look upon as one of the greatest misfortunes that could befall the country—a stab in its vitals.

The Washington correspondent of the Boston Post is the author of a story, which, as he tells it, we do not credit, of Mr. Delmar, the head of the Statistical Bureau, having furnished certain "interesting financial statistics" in reply to a communication from General Butler, showing that "the civilization of the world depends in a great measure on the character and quantity of its circulating medium;" and that "the long monetary dearth" which prevailed after the fall of the Roman Empire "led to the social degradation which marked the dark ages, and which culminated in the system of feudal laws from which even modern civilization has failed to entirely free itself," etc. We trust Mr. Delmar has not been doing anything so ill-advised as furnishing General Butler with loose statistics, as that gentleman would be pretty sure to injure himself or those around him with them. In any case, we feel pretty confident that the foregoing theory of the part played in civilization by "the circulating medium" is largely the composition of our learned friend, "Our Washington Correspondent" himself. It bears all the marks of his ingenious and original mind. The quantity of the circulating medium depends on the state of civilization, and not the state of civilization on the quantity of the circulating medium. Money was plenty in the Augustan age for the same reason that paved roads were plenty, it diminished in quantity during the Middle Ages for the same reason that the Roman roads disappeared, and this diminution had, of course, about as much to do with producing "the social degradation" of the "dark ages" as with causing the rise of Gothic architecture. Pocket-handkerchiefs are another thing which multiply or diminish in number as nations advance or recede in civilization, and are undoubtedly a help to it; but then neither moral nor material progress can be said to "depend" on the number of pocket-handkerchiefs.

General Sherman's report in regard to the Indians will soon be laid before Congress, and it will be a wonder if it is not a sensible, practical document. From a brief synopsis that has got into print, we should say that it will be of a character to please the Western people, and will reflect very well the opinions of those of them who best know the Indians—of Kit Carson, say. The synopsis above mentioned makes General Sherman say that the interests of the peaceable Indians, of the settlers, and the whites demand that a decided change should be made in the administration of the Indian Bureau. Like most of the military men, he wishes the Bureau transferred bodily to the War Department. If, however, Congress will not do that, he would have a division of duties made, would have the wild Indians turned over to the military arm, while to the Bureau with a civil head he would give charge of those tribes and parts of tribes which are on reservations and becoming civilized. The army, he says, is held responsible for all troubles with the Indians, yet is for ever hampered in its action by the civilian officials. This latter statement we suppose to be true, but we doubt if many people hold the army responsible for the disgraceful condition of our relations with the tribes. The policy of the Government has always been hesitating, weak, almost resultless—except that new treaties resulted in new wars pretty regularly—cruel to the Indians and cruel to the whites. That these are barbarously cruel to each other is true enough, and too true, and the Government has had no easy task; but much blame belongs to it.

We are informed, on what we consider good authority, that the Judge Erskine whom Mr. Toombs abused with such violence the other day, is so far from being what Mr. Toombs called him that he is an honorable man, a Christian, a sound lawyer, and an upright judge. But he was an undisguised Unionist during the war; and then, as for Mr. Toombs, there are times, our correspondent adds, when his abuse is to be listened to and let pass: "His friends well know what weakness of Mr. Toombs it was that cost him his election to the Presidency of the Confederate States." This we print in justice to Judge Erskine. We may add that the judge did not refuse Mr. Stephens and Mr. Toombs permission to practise because they were unable to take the test oath, but because neither of them has obtained the President's pardon. Ability to take the test oath cannot supply the want of the pardon; having this latter, they would be at once admitted to practice.

There are two movements begun and prospering in Europe, one in France and one in England, which promise, if they continue to be successful, social results of the greatest value. The one in France is the higher or, as it is called there, "the secondary education" of women, of which we have already spoken several times, to the credit of which M. Duruy, the Minister of Public Instruction, is entitled, and on account of which he has been vigorously denounced by M. Dupanloup, the famous Bishop of Orleans, as a man "the cup of whose iniquity is full." The courses of lectures at the Sorbonne are already a great success; and what is most remarkable is, that girls belonging to the most distinguished families in Paris, including two nieces of the Empress, are attending them—showing that the "education of the heart" by the priests, "under the mother's eye," is no longer considered, even in the most priest-ridden circles, all that girls need to qualify them for the duties of life. When one remembers what kind of personage the French jeune fille is, and then sees the ability, the force, and the acuteness which French married women bring to bear on the affairs of life, in spite of their defects of education, one cannot help hoping for some very remarkable effects on French society from the increased mental training, and consequent mental emancipation before marriage, which the new system promises. Who knows but out of it may come a reaction against the refined materialism, or rather paganism, which has of late years been taking possession of French society?

The movement in England is the establishment of a system of arbitration between masters and workmen, or rather between the trades-unions; for it is through, or rather under, the trades-unions that the workmen act. It has begun at Nottingham, which was until 1860 as great a hotbed of strife, and strife in its most repulsive forms, between labor and capital as Sheffield. In that year the evil was felt to have reached the limits of the endurable, and threatened the ruin of the trade of the town. A board of arbitration was consequently established, consisting of six masters and six workmen, the latter chosen by the votes of the members of the trades-unions. The number has since been increased to nine on each side; but most questions in dispute are now decided by a committee of four, the right of appeal to the whole board being seldom exercised. The result has been that for seven years there have been neither strikes nor "lock-outs" in Nottingham. Amicable discussion settles everything; the workmen learn round the board table what are the real profits, risks, and difficulties of the masters, and the masters learn what are the real hardships, requirements, and expectations of the workmen. The plan has worked so successfully that it has spread to all the great manufacturing towns of Nottinghamshire, and there is a prospect of its being introduced into Sheffield itself.

The one subject of thought and talk in England is still the Fenians and Fenianism. Nothing very serious has occurred since the Clerkenwell tragedy, which was doubtless atrocious, but which the London Times has been trying very absurdly to prove so terribly atrocious that nobody could possibly have planned or executed it except Irishmen, as if Fieschi and Orsini had never thrown bombs into the midst of an innocent crowd; or as if Guy Fawkes had never made arrangements to blow up "the three estates of the realm" at one blast; or as if the trades-union outrages had never been heard of; or as if the troops of his present Majesty the Emperor of the French had not swept the Boulevards and the houses along them with musketry, when there was no enemy near, in his own capital, merely to strike terror, killing and wounding peaceful men and women by the hundred; and as if many towns had not been bombarded in our time by "lawful governments" in order to drive out rebels. The fact is that the ends of political conspirators and fanatics of every race and station are apt to assume such enormous proportions in their eyes that the means, no matter of what nature, seem dwarfed and insignificant. It is not the Irish only who in political struggles are unskilful in the use of moral weights and measures. Some of the help they get in putting a good face on their performances from cool bystanders, however, is curious. There is a large band of sophists both in England and this country who are now trying to persuade us that the killing of Policeman Brett was a comparatively harmless because a "political" act. This, if it means anything, means that as long as the object you have in view is a political one, and you entertain no personal animosity to your victims, or will derive no personal gain from their death, you may kill as many people as you please—kill them suddenly, treacherously, in the midst of peace and fancied security. On this theory, the assassination of Mr. Lincoln was a venial crime; so was the St. Alban's raid; and so was the attempt to throw the night trains off the track on the New York Central, for which a "Virginian gentleman" was most righteously hanged by General Dix in this harbor, in 1864, in spite of the fact that he had been regularly detailed for "special service" by his masters in Richmond.

Mr. Gladstone has been making a batch of speeches to his constituents, one of which was mainly devoted to the Irish question, and was full of wisdom, of just, humane, and comprehensive views of the situation expressed in terse and vigorous English. He comes out boldly for the abolition of the Church Establishment; for the concession to Catholics of a charter for their University, which has hitherto been denied them; for the legalization all over Ireland of the Ulster custom of "tenant right"—that is, the abrogation of the common law rule which makes all improvements made on land the property of the owner in fee; and for the government of Ireland in all things whatsoever according to Irish and not English ideas, just as Scotland is governed according to Scotch ideas. Englishmen have not, and have never had since 1688, a policy with regard to Scotland. They have left it its own church, its own law, and whenever any Scotch question comes up in Parliament it is almost invariably left to the decision of Scotch members. Mr. Gladstone pointed out also that the success of the American Fenians amongst the Irish at home was the natural result of the hopelessness into which the latter had fallen with regard to the results of peaceful agitation—a hopelessness which the past too fully justified. At the same time he denounced in as strong terms as he could muster both the principles and practices of the Fenians proper, and rightly put the Canadian expedition of last summer, the Manchester tragedy, and the Clerkenwell outrage on the same moral level—as acts of murder and brigandage, all the more detestable for the scale on which they were perpetrated and the helplessness and innocence of their victims.

Ratazzi's political career has been a singular one. For several years, in fact ever since 1859, he has passed in Italy for a French partisan—almost, in fact, an agent of the French Emperor—and his advent to power was always taken as an indication that a policy of greater subservience to France was about to be pursued. It now turns out—such is the value of rumor—that he was nothing of the kind, that he has been singularly hostile to France, and that he was the only public man in Italy who had the courage to brave the Imperial Government on the Roman question. Late Cable despatches inform us that General Menabrea is publishing correspondence which shows that Ratazzi was really in league with the Garibaldians; knew of and winked at their preparations, and was ready to avail himself of their victories, and to cover, if need were, their defeat. This most people believed already, however; the obscure point in the imbroglio is to what extent France signified her acquiescence in what was on foot. It appears that up to a certain point the Emperor, though warned by the Italian minister, gave no sign of displeasure, which led the Italian cabinet to count on his approval, or at least on non-interference. He then suddenly became alarmed for the Convention, and just then Ratazzi resigned, but what passed between the two governments at this point we only know from M. Rouher's version in the French Chamber, and this is hardly trustworthy. The Italian blue or yellow or green book, we forget which, is silent on this the most obscure and most interesting part of the affair. Meanwhile, there are signs that the King is growing restive under the pelting of the radical storm, and is inclined to throw himself into the arms of the Garibaldians and brave the worst. A new election will probably make the radicals stronger than ever. The Menabrea cabinet has at last been formed.

What is perhaps most singular and most puzzling about this imbroglio is the course of the French Government. It was noticed that the declarations of the Marquis de Moustier, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, in the French Senate were very guarded, and left the ground open for an arrangement, or what the French call a "transaction," which is something more than an arrangement, with Italy. M. Rouher's declarations, on the other hand, in the Corps Législatif were frank almost to violence, and he asserted with considerable vehemence, and after a pause, that Italy should "never have Rome." M. Rouher, moreover, was known to have come direct from the palace, where he had had a two-hours' conference with the Emperor before he made his speech, and the speech was naturally enough considered fatal to the proposed conference. If Italy was never to have Rome, there was no need of a conference, for a conference could only meet to debate open questions, and not to register French decrees. Now it appears the Government feels it has gone too far. The Moniteur publishes letters from Florence showing that things are going on beautifully in Italy, and the semi-official journals are trying to explain away M. Rouher's speech by asserting that what he said was, that Italy should never seize on Rome (s'emparer), not that she should never have Rome. This will hardly satisfy the clerical party, nor the Thiers party, but the Emperor probably begins to feel that it is easier to brave them than to brave the radicals of all Europe, by assuming in Italy the position vacated by Austria. M. Thiers will apparently reap the reward of his late speech in the detestation of the Liberals and at least the distrust of the Conservatives. The Liberals are disgusted by his revival at this day of theories of international relations against which France has fought and argued for half a century, and which were the groundwork of all that was worst in the treaties of 1815; while the friends of the Papacy are not disposed to be grateful for the adhesion of a philosopher who lets it plainly be seen that he befriends the Pope merely as a means of harassing Victor Emanuel. It was not in this spirit that the wonderful Zouaves fought, who, the clergy assure us, outdid at Mentana Thermopylæ and Lepanto and divers other historic fights. Unfortunately for the parallel Leonidas received no reinforcement of Gauls armed with breech-loaders, and Don John, if he looked at all, looked in vain for the help of iron-clad rams.

In France the political world is entirely occupied with the army bill, the Italian question having been for the present disposed of. As eighty-two deputies have put down their names as about to deliver speeches on it, the debate will last as long as the patience of the Chamber and the country. The bill is very unpopular, as it enormously increases the army, extends the term of service in and out of garrison to nine years, and does not allow marriage till the seventh year. The Government is preparing gradually to shoulder the burden of the Mexican bonds,—the reason being, say its enemies, that its officials in the provinces bamboozled 800,000 persons into investing in them, who will vote against the official candidates at the coming general election unless their mouths are stopped.

Articles on any of the subjects usually discussed in this journal will be received from any quarter. If used, they will be liberally paid for; if rejected, they will be returned to the writers on the receipt of the requisite amount of postage stamps.

All Communications which pertain to the literary management of THE NATION should be addressed to the Editor.

SOUTHERN INFLUENCE ON THE REPUBLICAN PARTY.

THE elections of 1867 have, of course, had a powerful influence upon the minds of the Southern people, and have materially changed the political prospect in the South. A repetition of the Republican victories of 1866 would have ensured the process of reconstruction against every danger, except the extremest folly of its friends. Mr. Johnson would not have dared to interfere, and the most discontented Southerner would not have dared to talk of resistance. As it is, Mr. Johnson succeeds in putting serious obstacles in the way, and by holding out to the dissatisfied portion of the Southern people hopes of their final escape from the conditions imposed by Congress, he encourages them to a bitter resistance, which may yet lead to the worst results.

The colored people of the South, and the many thousands of white men who have co-operated with them during the past year, are, of course, affected in a different way by the Northern reaction. Feeling that all which makes life desirable is at stake in this great contest, they will undoubtedly insist more strenuously than ever that no party which claims their support shall occupy an uncertain ground in respect to the questions which are to them of more vital importance than any others. It is, therefore, perfectly natural that the mass of Southern Republicans should be urgent for the nomination of some such man as Chief-Justice Chase, whose record upon the chief political question of the day is so unmistakable. Such a man would undoubtedly not only command the votes of the entire South in a Republican Convention, but would receive more votes in the election at the South than any more conservative or doubtful candidate of the party. For no one who understands Southern feeling imagines that Grant will receive more votes from white men than Chase would, while every one knows that the name of Chase would excite a far greater enthusiasm among the colored voters than would that of any other possible candidate. Southern Republicans, therefore, advocate the claims of their favorite on grounds of expediency, as far as the South is concerned; but they are also actuated by more important considerations. They cannot afford to risk any uncertainty. Whether the next administration calls itself Republican or Democratic, if it destroys the governments created under the auspices of Congress and disfranchises the colored race, it will be fatal to the Republicans of the South as a party, and to many of them as individuals.

It is a mistake to suppose that the evils of a reactionary course would fall exclusively upon the colored people. The white men who, to the number of thirty thousand in North Carolina, as many more in Georgia, and half as many in Virginia, have identified themselves with the Republican party by voting in favor of reconstruction upon the basis of equal suffrage, have more to lose than the negroes, and are as likely to lose it. The negro can at most suffer degradation into a condition out of which he has not long escaped, and which he knows from experience how to endure. It is not, indeed, probable that he could be put back into precisely the same plight in which the war found him. But the white man who has dared to associate politically with him has risked the loss of a social standing, such as it was, which he has never been without. A reaction would put every such white man beneath the feet of his enemies. No mark of contempt would be spared him. He would be treated just as in India they treat those who break the laws of caste. The highest Brahmin, upon violating those laws, falls instantly to the lowest depth. So if the law of political caste is restored in the South, every white Republican will be put lower in the social scale than his negro neighbor, will have less favor shown him, and probably will be less able to get justice from the courts.

If, therefore, the Southern States are represented in the approaching Republican Convention, it will be by men thoroughly in earnest, who will listen to no proposition for compromise upon questions pertaining to reconstruction. If the majority of the Northern delegates should wish to evade those issues, it would have to be done by shutting out the South. With a full Southern delegation, it would be impossible to make the convention a conservative body. The nominee for the Presidency will probably be the same in any event, but the platform will be considerably modified by the influence of Southern delegates.

There are hints from some quarters of the possibility of a radical secession from the convention, but we do not apprehend any such occurrence. There will be no revolt against the nomination of Grant upon a clear declaration of principles accepted by him. If, by some extraordinary combination of events, the ultra-conservatives were to gain control of the convention, to shut out the Southern delegates, and to adopt a reactionary platform, or none at all, there would be serious danger of a division of the party; but this we can scarcely deem possible. The Republican party, North as well as South, is not at all inclined to divest itself of principles, to abandon the road upon which it has entered, or to betray the allies whom it has invited to its support. Moreover, count must be taken, in estimating the danger of a split, of the power a nominating convention in great crises possesses, of doing as it pleases within certain wide limits. The dissatisfaction of large sections of the Republican party with its two last nominations was very deep, and there was plenty of disposition to set up a second candidate, but the game was felt to be too dangerous. The Southern loyalists may feel very little enthusiasm for Grant and a great deal for Chase; but then, after Grant has been nominated, they will probably see that the chance of choosing between them is gone, and that, if they wish to try their luck again, they must take the chance of getting Pendleton or Seymour.

COMMERCIAL MORALITY IN AMERICA AND IN ENGLAND.

AN "awful exposure" of the moral condition of the mercantile classes in England, as illustrated by the trade frauds and banking frauds and railroad frauds which have been so numerous of late, appeared recently in the London Spectator. It was a frightful picture, but it was a picture of a kind which the condensation required by periodical writing has of late made very common, in which all mention of modifying and redeeming facts, or counteracting agencies, is omitted. The mere enumeration of the repulsive phenomena of any society or of any crisis—such, for instance, as Dr. Mackay used to present to the readers of the London Times during the late war—may be in every respect accurate, and yet may suggest very false inferences. To make out a list of the frauds in the commissariat or quartermaster's department, for example, and of all the desertions which were revealed in any one year of the war, and yet say nothing of the sacrifices made during the same period by individual towns to fill their quotas, or of the operations of the Sanitary Commission, or of the magnitude of the temptations to which contractors or employees were exposed, or of the difficulties of organization and accountability in a service organized as ours was, would be to present a very false notion of the condition of American society during the war. So also—although every word said by the Spectator of the dishonesty of the English business-world might doubtless be supported by fifty hard facts—the whole picture of English society presented by it is nevertheless, we think, misleading, inasmuch as we are told nothing of the agencies which are working against this dishonesty, or of the condition of that large portion of the community which necessarily has no share in the great mercantile frauds.

The picture, however, derives a large portion of its interest from the fact that on the surface it seems applicable to all the great commercial communities of the world as well as to England—to all of them, at least, in which trade is based on the principle of competition. Nevertheless, there are certain reasons why it is more nearly true of England than of any other country, or perhaps we should say than of this country—for this is the only country in the world with which England, commercially considered, can be fairly compared. In France and in Germany and Italy the principle of competition is not nearly so active, which is another way of saying that the men are less enterprising and more contented, though perhaps less honest at bottom than Englishmen or Americans; that is, they may cheat more readily, but they cheat spasmodically and on a small scale, rarely generally and systematically. Such frauds as have been revealed in England of late, in which the management of railroads and other joint-stock enterprises has been, year after year, a kind of juggling process, skilfully conducted for the spoliation of stockholders, are things from which most Frenchmen or Italians would recoil, as from taking the command of a seventy-four or charge of an astronomical observatory. If such gigantic swindles are less frequent in this country than in England, it is not from want of enterprise or ability. The necessary skill and courage abound here; in fact, abound here far more than in England. Moreover, the moral basis of American society is very similar to that of England. If the state of religious and moral ideas by which life in either country is regulated be carefully overhauled, it will be found very similar on both sides of the water. The religious and moral training of men and women in the two countries is nearly the same in all classes; amongst the classes who, in England, do most of the swindling, they are almost exactly the same. Yet there is no question whatever that the state of things which has been revealed in England by the exposures of the last two years not only does not exist here, but cannot exist, even supposing the commercial morality of Americans to be no higher than that of Englishmen.

Foremost amongst our reasons for coming to this conclusion is one which will probably be questioned by seven readers out of ten on the other side of the water at least, and that is, that wealth does not stand so high amongst the prizes of life in America as it does in England, and therefore the pursuit of it is not so eager, and the mass of men engaged in the pursuit of it are not so unscrupulous. It is quite true that a far larger proportion of the population is engaged in the pursuit of wealth here than in England, and a far larger proportion think and talk of nothing else. But on the other hand—and it is from this point of view that we must look at the matter in order to get at the moral results of wealth-seeking—the number of persons absorbed in the pursuit of wealth in America is very much smaller in proportion to the number and variety of ways in which wealth is to be won than it is in England. The resources of this country and the number of its fields of industry are far greater than those of England—great enough to employ and reward the energies of tenfold the population now employed upon them, putting aside altogether any increase of resources or fields of industry from new discoveries or inventions. This naturally, while stimulating people to the highest pitch of exertion, makes the acquisition of a fortune seem very much less of an achievement here than it does in England or anywhere in Europe. We have no statistics on hand bearing on this subject, and we doubt if any exist that can be depended on. The income-tax returns are very fallacious, for various reasons. There is one test, however, which is of considerable value, particularly as it is not a prepared one, and that is the number of American travellers in Europe. There are very few of them who are not possessors of accumulated property, and, taking distance and expense into account, we think it is fair to estimate their number as bearing the proportion to the number of the English travellers of three to two. Wherever money is easily made, not only is a fortune of itself a comparatively small prize, but hope is very strong. These two facts of themselves are a constant check on unscrupulousness—that is, on systematic and combined unscrupulousness on the part of organized bodies of men, such as has been revealed in the management of English joint-stock companies. Great frauds, like highway robbery, are the phenomena of a society in which the struggle is very desperate, and in which ease and luxury and social consideration are very hard to win.

Not only, however, is wealth a greater prize in England than in America, owing to the greater difficulty of acquiring it, but it there puts within the reach of its possessors certain social distinctions which here are unknown. Everybody knows that in England the ambition of the successful trader or speculator is not simply to acquire wealth, but by means of his wealth to escape from the class in which he was born and enter that of the landed aristocracy. He, therefore, as soon as he can retire from business, either gets into Parliament or buys a landed estate, or both, and sends his sons to Eton or Harrow, and tries to marry his daughters to men of family or rank. In nine cases out of ten this game is not very successful; but the one case in which it is successful is amply sufficient to cause it to be tried in the other nine. Now it would be difficult to give an American an idea of the attractions the position of a country gentleman with the entrée of "London society" has for the British trader and his family. It contains for them all the happiness that can be had on this side of the grave, and some, perhaps, which they often despair of finding on the other side. Therefore, when an English commercial man is running the race for wealth, he is not striving, as the American is, simply for a journey in Europe, a large house, fast horses, and plenty of fine furniture, snug fortunes for his daughters, the means of setting his sons up in business, a place on bank boards and charitable committees, and a little extra consideration amongst other business men; he is trying to lift himself into a completely new world, to surround himself with new associations, to enrol his name and that of his remote descendants in another order of society, and to acquire for himself a portion of the deference which is paid to those who wear famous names or can boast of long descent. This is naturally a tremendous prize; it affects the imagination as few prizes have ever done, and it is only in England that it is offered. On the Continent, there is nothing like it. There the nobility is either a close corporation, which cannot be opened with a golden key, or else there is nothing inside of it answering in social and political weight and dignity to the English county family.

The moral effect upon English society of the state of things we have been describing is, of course, execrably bad. It gives money an importance in England such as it possesses in no other country on the globe, and inflicts on poverty a stigma such as nowhere else attaches to it. It makes all distinction of little or no value, certainly of no permanent value, without that of wealth. The successful author or artist or orator may shine for a season, but unless he has a fortune at his back he may count confidently on obscurity or on loss of real consideration, or on having all social or political advancement denied him or made very difficult for him. It is the common belief in Europe that it is the custom of Americans to estimate everything in money, and it is a belief for which there is, unfortunately, too much foundation. But there is, perhaps, no country in which men are less esteemed merely for the possession of wealth and in which other sorts of distinction exact so much respect—not even France. We doubt if any country can produce as long a list of poor popular idols, orators, poets, historians, essayists, lecturers, and politicians. Many of them may be very sorry idols, it is true, but this is due simply to defects of mental culture and not of moral tone. The idols owe the worship they receive to the popular respect for talent or genius; and it is a worship on which the "social position" of the idol exercises no influence whatever.

One other cause of the prevalence of systematic swindling in England—we are not now talking of the small frauds of the shopkeepers—is the want of what is called "knowledge of business" on the part of the great mass of the population. There is in England, as in every aristocratic country in which there is at the same time a large mass of accumulated capital, a very large body of persons belonging to what may be called the "gentle class," but to which there is here nothing to correspond—daughters and younger sons of good families, half-pay officers, professional men with small fortunes independent of their professional incomes; people such as those whom Hawthorne describes as forming so large a proportion of the inhabitants of Leamington. They all have money to invest, and are entirely dependent on their investments for their means of livelihood, but they are brought up in an ignorance of "business," properly so called, of its processes, conditions, and of everything relating to accounts, not only rare in America, but of which few Americans can form any idea, and it is an ignorance which, instead of feeling ashamed of, they hug and glory in, as the mark of a certain social position. In this class there are, moreover, thousands of women not only ignorant of business themselves, but having no male relative who is much, if any, less ignorant. Their incomes are apt to be small, but they rarely attempt to increase them, and when they do, as in seasons of great speculation like the last three or four years, are pretty sure to fall among thieves. The investments of this class in railroads and joint-stock companies of various kinds—particularly banks—are enormous, and they furnish a prey to fraudulent directors and operators such as no rogues probably ever lighted on before, and such as rogues in this country never meet with. It is only in their simplicity and helplessness that we can find the explanation of the fact that the directors of large numbers of the English railroads have been able to go on, year after year, submitting "cooked" statements and accounts, which the public and the stockholders felt satisfied were cooked, without knowing how to bring the knaves to justice. The Economist mentioned recently the case of one road the directors of which mean to be honest, but who, knowing well that the public will not believe a word they say, have been forced to solicit a determined enemy, Lord Cranbourne, to become their chairman. We need hardly say that no directors could play a prolonged game of fraud here. When one of our great industrial Bedouins wants to perpetrate railroad or other joint-stock jobs, he has to begin by buying up the stock himself; after that he can, of course, play what tricks he pleases. If he left it in the hands of the community, he would find himself, as soon as his combinations began to work, followed up by a thousand eyes as keen as his own. Half the widows even, amongst his intended victims, would know enough to expose him, and not one but would have a son or brother or friend whom no balance-sheet or report could deceive.

The moral value of the wide diffusion of "business knowledge," of familiarity with its conditions, requisites, and tests, and of the habits of mind which successful business men possess, cannot, we think, be overrated. The rarity of them in English society we look upon as one great cause of the apparent rottenness of the English mercantile world. The very great diffusion of them here we look on as one of the greatest safeguards of American society, as the great cause of what we believe to be a fact, that there is no country in the world in which the amount of fraud bears so small a proportion to the amount of trust. Rogues abound only where dupes abound, and ignorance is the soil out of which dupes grow. The weak point of American society is the indisposition to visit knaves with heavy social penalties—but of this we have no space to speak now.

THE RIGHT OF EXPATRIATION.

Since Mr. Banks brought in, and carried through the House of Representatives, his great bill for defining afresh the American doctrine of neutrality, he appears to have done nothing in his favorite field. The Neutrality bill was a remarkable piece of legislation—so remarkable that even those members of the House who confessed they had never seen the like of it voted for it, we suppose, out of sheer wonderment. Its principal peculiarity was, as Mr. Bemis, of Boston, pointed out at the time, that it not only disregarded all precedents, but it treated all the facts of the case as if they did not exist, and all principles as if they had no force, and began at the beginning—that point being situated, as well as we could make out, in Mr. Banks's own brain. The Senate, however, being composed mainly of elderly men, in whom the faculty of wonder had doubtless become enfeebled, received the measure with considerable coldness, and in fact appear to have smothered it, for nobody out of doors has heard anything of it since it left the House.

We have been curious ever since to know on what Mr. Banks was engaged during the summer. We knew, of course, he was not idle, or even occupying himself with desultory reading, as nobody who did not "exhaust" any subject he took up could possibly produce such treatises as his "reports," and light up the future of the United States with such flashes of prescience as he let fly in his great speech of last year, in which he made the locomotive "wend its slow foot" over the Rocky Mountains, and exhibited the American Republic in the proud position of prescribing the cut of their clothes to the male inhabitants of the whole Western hemisphere, instead of allowing its ministers to wear court dress in the tawdry drawing-rooms of the worn-out European monarchs. When we saw him placed by Mr. Colfax in his old position as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, we knew, of course, that it was foreign affairs that were absorbing, or would absorb, his attention; about the precise "question" in foreign affairs, however, we felt uncertain. Foreign affairs, in general, open up a wide field to an enterprising and courageous man. There are just now half a dozen "questions" in it which it takes an ordinary person the experience of a lifetime to understand thoroughly, and considerable study to be able to offer even an opinion upon that will be worth printing. But the advantage of being a member of the House, and, above all, chairman of its Committee on Foreign Affairs, is that one can give his opinions a certain value without either knowledge, experience, or study, and Mr. Banks is not the man to neglect his opportunities.

We are bound to say, however, that he has shown great modesty in his selection. The subject on which he is, if report speaks truly, preparing his next "great speech," is the effect of the naturalization laws of the United States upon the European, and particularly the English, doctrine of perpetual allegiance. When we remember that he might if he chose have spoken and "reported" with great acceptance on the present complications in Afghanistan, or on the Pan-Slavic propagandism now going on amongst the Bulgarians, and have even indulged in a digression on Servian poetry, we must admit that he has not been over-presumptuous. Our readers will therefore join us in offering him our cordial sympathy touching the recent deplorable intelligence from Great Britain that nobody in that besotted country cares two straws about the doctrine of perpetual allegiance and is ready to give it up on demand. There will be a good many members of Congress besides Mr. Banks plunged in mourning by this news, as, if England had only held out, the subject promised to be one of the most attractive of the session, and would have suited the peculiar powers of several orators in the House and of at least one in the Senate.

In the first place, it had a good, solid foundation. The doctrine of perpetual allegiance is an absurd doctrine in the present condition of the world, and it is not often that a politician of the Banks school gets a genuine absurdity to rail at. He is apt to attack really valuable or really harmless objects, like the terriers one occasionally sees which eschew rat-catching and devote themselves to killing sheep and chickens. In the next place, it was highly and justly obnoxious to an immense body of voters, especially to Fenians. It was worth as it stood, or was supposed to stand, almost any amount of money to the Fenian Republic. Fenians, of course, have a general right to be outraged by England's delay in paying Alabama damages, but then Fenian indignation on this point had to be "got up" more or less. When they and Mr. Banks got together to amend the neutrality law by throwing overboard the musty laws of poor old Washington and Hamilton and Madison and the like in order to punish Great Britain for her bad behavior during the late war, they had to laugh and wink a little—not much, but enough to let each other know that they were not such fools as they seemed. But then the English disregard of the American naturalization laws was really a subject on which neither Mr. Banks nor the Brotherhood needed to simulate indignation. It was a bonâ fide grievance, which a man might feel equally deeply both in his character of Fenian brother and of American citizen. In the one character it touched his person—body, blood, and bones—and in the other it touched his pride. Moreover, it came home to the Germans fully as much as to the Irish, and, in fact, far more so. The doctrine only threatened an Irishman with inconvenience if he happened to seek distraction during a visit to his parents in getting up a rebellion, or attacking a magazine or fort, while it menaced the poor German with impressment for the army the minute he set foot on his native soil, though his only object in going home was to see his friends, and though he passed his time while there in drinking beer and listening to music. Altogether, we do not remember a worse case of disappointment in the history even of royal or aristocratic perfidy.

The truth is that England practically abandoned her perpetual-allegiance doctrine during the last war. Her sayings and doings in 1812, and before it, of course possess historical value, but they have no practical value, except to light up the speeches at an indignation meeting. Her denial of all aid or assistance during the late rebellion to thousands of naturalized and semi-naturalized Irishmen who besieged the consulates and the embassy in Washington for protection against conscription, was a virtual acknowledgment of the right of all British subjects to throw off their allegiance by formally declaring their wish to do so, and fixing their domicile in another country. There is not the shadow of foundation for suspecting her of flattering herself that she possesses the smallest hold, either legal or moral, on the fealty or obedience of any man, or the children of any man, who has taken up his residence in this country and assumed American citizenship in legal form. We see no reason therefore why Congress should not take this for granted, and without any negotiation whatever pass a declaratory act, making the effect of naturalization tantamount in all respects to birth on American soil.

The only place in which the old English doctrine of allegiance still presents itself is in the English courts, and here, we admit, the treatment of American citizens as if they were still subjects of the crown may sometimes be productive of considerable inconvenience. But then there is no conscription or impressment in Great Britain. The Government makes no claim on any man living within its jurisdiction for anything but taxes and peaceable behavior. The idea the Fenians have been trying to spread abroad, that those who have been tried in England and Ireland have suffered in some way by not having the transfer of their allegiance to the United States recognized as valid, has no foundation in fact. A foreigner who takes part in a rebellion against an established government runs just the same risk as a native. If he cannot be convicted as a traitor he can as a filibuster, and it makes very little difference to a man in what character he is sent to the gallows or the treadmill as long as he has to go. The valuable privilege of being tried by a mixed jury, on which Warren insisted so loudly, and the denial of which some of the Fenian papers pronounced a casus belli, cannot be secured to American citizens accused of offences in England by any legislation or declaration on this side of the Atlantic. It is not a right under the law of nations; it is a privilege under the municipal law, which the municipal law can extend or withhold at pleasure. So that it is, we believe, not possible to show that anything done here to give force or validity to our naturalization laws would have placed Fenians tried before British courts in any position one whit better than the one they have occupied. It is necessary to put this before the public as plainly as possible, inasmuch as there is a vague idea floating amongst the more ignorant Irish, and encouraged by politicians, that an American citizen is not liable to trial before British courts at all, under any circumstances.

The case of the Germans is different. We believe all Continental nations acknowledge the right of the citizen to expatriate himself, if he pleases, on arriving at years of discretion. But the right is deprived of a large portion of its value by making the exercise of it dependent on the fulfilment of the obligation which every man incurs, between the ages of twenty and thirty, to do military service of greater or less length, and under the Prussian law no length of absence wears this obligation out. The theory on which this obligation is imposed is, that a man incurs a debt to a government by being merely born and bred under it, which he is bound to discharge in any reasonable way it may fix upon. As regards the abstract right of the matter, however, there is as much to be said on one side as the other. There is no earthly means of deciding whether or not a man is morally bound to sacrifice the best years of his life in soldiering for the benefit of a political organization under which he was accidentally born, and which he means to quit as soon as possible. This is, no doubt, an unsentimental view of a man's relation to his native land; but the affair is not one of sentiment, but of political rights and duties, and, like all similar questions, has in the last resort to be solved by the principle of expediency. However little inconvenience the rule may have once occasioned, in these days of steam and telegraphy and emigration by the million, it occasions a great deal. It is a vexation and more than a vexation to great bodies of men living on American soil, owing allegiance to the American Government, and having ties and pursuits which carry them every year to all parts of the world. It has long been a subject of controversy between the American Government and the Prussian, and every year the reasons why the controversy should end grow stronger. It may have been easy enough for this Government to follow the European precedent when there were but few who were affected by it; but with millions demanding its abrogation, it is not easy, and not right. The European rule works against civilization, against progress, and against commerce and social intercourse; it works for nothing except the military system of the great military monarchies, which, it is safe to say, is the cause of half the troubles by which Europe is afflicted. Anything which helps to break it up will be a gain to humanity. But, as we have said once before, nothing should be done to break it up without creating the completest possible guarantees against the abuse of our naturalization laws by foreign knaves and adventurers.

THE GREAT AMERICAN NOVEL.

A FRIEND of ours, a fairly clever person, and by no means lacking in common sense on common subjects, has the craze in his head that he will some day write a great American novel.

"If I can do it," he says, "I shall perform a national service, and be hailed as a national benefactor. It will be acknowledged that I have broken another of the bonds which make us spiritually colonists and provinciale. Who does not like to have his portrait taken? If I ever can give expression to the idea which is in my brain, the American people will say, 'That is my picture,' and will lavish heart and pocket in remuneration. It is a feat worthy of vast labor and suffering."

During eight or ten years he has struggled for his prize. He has published two or three experiments which have been more or less well spoken of by the critics, and rather more than less neglected by the purchasing public. Now and then, collared by the material necessities of life, or by some national enthusiasm even stronger than his own, he has turned aside into other pursuits, has fought at the front, has aided in the work of reconstruction, has written articles and other things which he calls trivialities. But at every leisure moment he returns to his idea of producing "the Great American Novel."

Will he produce it? Will any one of this generation produce it? It is very doubtful, for the obstacles are immense. To write a great American poem is at present impossible, for the reason that the nation has not yet lived a great poem. It cost unknown centuries of Greek faiths and fightings to produce the "Iliad." It cost all the Roman kings and all the Roman republic to produce the "Æneid." The "Divina Commedia" is the result of a thousand years of the Papal Church. Europe had to live politically through the crusades and the feudal system before it could earn the "Gierusalemme Liberata" and the "Orlando Furioso." "Paradise Lost" is the summary of all gnosticism and Protestantism. We may be confident that the Great American Poem will not be written, no matter what genius attempts it, until democracy, the idea of our day and nation and race, has agonized and conquered through centuries, and made its work secure.

But the Great American Novel—the picture of the ordinary emotions and manners of American existence—the American "Newcomes" or "Misérables" will, we suppose, be possible earlier. "Is it time?" the benighted people in the earthen jars of commonplace life are asking. And with no intention of being disagreeable, but rather with sympathetic sorrow, we answer, "Wait." At least we fear that such ought to be our answer. This task of painting the American soul within the framework of a novel has seldom been attempted, and has never been accomplished further than very partially—in the production of a few outlines. Washington Irving was too cautious to make the trial; he went back to fictions of Knickerbockers and Rip Van Winkles and Ichabod Cranes; these he did well, and we may thank him for not attempting more and failing in the attempt. With the same consciousness of incapacity Cooper shirked the experiment; he devoted himself to Indians, of whom he knew next to nothing, and to backwoodsmen and sailors, whom he idealized; or where he attempted civilized groups, he produced something less natural than the wax figures of Barnum's old museum. If all Americans were like the heroes and heroines of Cooper, Carlyle might well enough call us "eighteen millions of bores." As for a tableau of American society, as for anything resembling the tableaux of English society by Thackeray and Trollope, or the tableaux of French society by Balzac and George Sand, we had better not trouble ourselves with looking for it in Cooper.

There come to us from the deserts of the past certain voices which "syllable men's names"—names that seem to sound like "Paulding," "Brown," "Kennedy"—and we catch nothing further. These are ghosts, and they wrote about ghosts, and the ghosts have vanished utterly. Another of these shadowy mediums, still living, if we are not misinformed, is W. Gilmore Simms, of whom the best and worst thing to be said is this—that he is nearly as good as Cooper, and deserves fame nearly as much.

Thus do we arrive, without frequent stoppage, at our own times. Hawthorne, the greatest of American imaginations, staggered under the load of the American novel. In "The Scarlet Letter," "The House of the Seven Gables," and "The Blithedale Romance" we have three delightful romances, full of acute spiritual analysis, of the light of other worlds, but also characterized by only a vague consciousness of this life, and by graspings that catch little but the subjective of humanity. Such personages as Hawthorne creates belong to the wide realm of art rather than to our nationality. They are as probably natives of the furthest mountains of Cathay or of the moon as of the United States of America. They are what Yankees might come to be who should shut themselves up for life to meditate in old manses. They have no sympathy with this eager and laborious people, which takes so many newspapers, builds so many railroads, does the most business on a given capital, wages the biggest war in proportion to its population, believes in the physically impossible and does some of it. Hawthorne's characters cannot talk? Certainly not in the style of this western world; rather in the language of men who never expressed themselves but on paper, and on paper in dreams. There is a curious lack of natural dialogue in Hawthorne's books, and with this, of course, a lack of almost all other signs of the dramatic faculty. Besides, his company is so limited. New Englanders they profess to be: to be sure, they are of the queerest; men and women of the oddest, shyest, most recluse nature, and often creatures purely ideal; but they never profess to be other than New Englanders. The profoundest reverence for this great man need prevent no one from saying that he has not written "the Great American Novel."

The nearest approach to the desired phenomenon is "Uncle Tom's Cabin." There were very noticeable faults in that story; there was a very faulty plot; there was (if idealism be a fault) a black man painted whiter than the angels, and a girl such as girls are to be, perhaps, but are not yet; there was a little village twaddle. But there was also a national breadth to the picture, truthful outlining of character, natural speaking, and plenty of strong feeling. Though comeliness of form was lacking, the material of the work was in many respects admirable. Such Northerners as Mrs. Stowe painted we have seen; and we have seen such Southerners, no matter what the people south of Mason and Dixon's line may protest; we have seen such negroes, barring, of course, the impeccable Uncle Tom—uncle of no extant nephews, so far as we know. It was a picture of American life, drawn with a few strong and passionate strokes, not filled in thoroughly, but still a portrait. It seemed, then, when that book was published, easy to have more American novels. But in "Dred" it became clear that the soul which a throb of emotion had enabled to grasp this whole people was losing its hold on the vast subject which had so stirred us. Then, stricken with timidity, the author shrank into her native shell of New England. Only certain recluse spirits, who dwell between the Dan and Beersheba of Yankeedom, can care much for Doctor Hopkins as he goes through his exercises in "The Minister's Wooing," while the attempt to sketch Aaron Burr as a contrast to the clerical hero shows most conclusively happy ignorance of the style of heartless men of the world. "The Pearl of Orr's Island" is far better. It is an exquisite little story, a thoroughly finished bit of work, but how small! There, microscope in hand over the niceties of Orr's Island, we wait for another cameo of New England life. But what special interest have Southerners and Westerners and even New Yorkers in Yankee cameos?

There was another dainty and by no means feeble story about a still farther north-eastern realm of rocks and sand and fog. A brother of James Russell Lowell, a poet in soul, though he writes in prose, went to Newfoundland in search of the ideal, and wrote "The New Priest of Conception Bay." A few choice, critical souls praised it, we believe, and we believe the purchasing public hardly noticed it. It should not have been let die, and its author should have been called on for more novels. True, large, and kindly portraits of rustic souls were in it, and, as we judge of such things, the best landscape pictures ever done by any American, unless we except Thoreau. Story there was almost none, and no more passion than in a Fra Angelico. What can be hoped for such books in presence of a popular taste which accepts Headley as a Tacitus, and J. S. C. Abbott as a Livy, and Dr. Holland as a Virgil? One is tempted, even as Congressmen often are, to fall back upon "lore," and cry "O tempora! O mores!" We mention this book partly to call attention to the fact that its author, like so many of his competitors, evaded the trial of sketching American life and fled abroad for his subjects.

We shall always be grateful to Oliver Wendell Holmes for "The Autocrat of the Breakfast Table," and hardly less grateful for "The Professor." Lighter, brighter, keener, defter prose has rarely been written in America. It would not be unworthy of a Parisian; it would not be scorned by Taine or Veuillot or Henri de Rochefort. He has also created a personage or two whom we shall not forget. A truer American than "the young man called John" never breathed. We would let him vote anywhere on the mere credit of his ideas. If men and angels should swear to us that he was born abroad, we would not believe them. He is one of us, and was from conception. If he lives, he reads the Ledger and John S. C. Abbott, and does not read "The New Priest of Conception Bay." Heaven prosper him and give him more wisdom! There is true picturing of intelligent and unintelligent Eastern Americans in "The Autocrat" and "The Professor." But when the author undertakes a novel, he enters upon a field where passion is needed, to say nothing of his lack of what the poor despised phrenologer calls "constructiveness," and in that he is lacking. We have carefully watched his efforts, not in hardness of spirit, but with sympathy; we know how much easier it is to look on than to run. We acknowledge that "Elsie Venner" and "The Guardian Angel" are interesting books. They show us faithfully the exterior of commonplace New England life, and they travesty the solemnities of New England's spiritual life with an amusing manual dexterity. But the artist is hampered by his scientific theories and by his lack of fervent emotional sympathy. His characters do not go; they do not drag him along; they do not drag us. We seem to see that they disappoint their creator; that they do not move as he thought they would when he devised them; that they do not fulfil the double purpose of living for themselves and for him. From time to time he stops and rubs one up, seeking to galvanize it into life and action. We have little doubt that he was far better satisfied with "The Guardian Angel," for instance, when he commenced it than when he wrote the closing lines.

Moreover, these two tales are not American novels; they are only New England novels; they are localisms. We shall not be suspected of desiring to belittle New England, of denying its moral strength, keen intellect, and wide influence. But Dr. Holmes has not sketched that Yankeehood which goes abroad and leavens the character of the Republic. The Yankeehood which he exhibits is that which stays in corners, speechless and impotent—a community of old maids, toothless doctors, small-souled lawyers, village poets, and shelved professors; the coterie of an antique borough, amusing, queer, and of no account. We do not say that he should have put a Wendell Phillips or an Emerson on the canvas; we only say that he has given no prominence to those moral characteristics of New England which produce such movers of the national heart and teachers of the national intellect. He has scarcely alluded to the kind of society which made these men what they are, unless we allow an exception in favor of the suggestiveness of Byles Gridley. Thus his stories are not only provincial in scene and in the form of the dialogue, but provincial to the very depths of the spirit which animates them.

Of "Waiting for the Verdict" we have little to add beyond what we have already said. While acknowledging anew the breadth of the plan, we must reiterate our abhorrence of the execution. In reading it we remember with wicked sympathy the expression of a bachelor friend, "I hate poor people's children," and we are tempted to add, "and poor people." We do not believe that "the poor and lowly of God's creatures" are his chosen; we hold that, if he has any preference, it must be for the wisest, sweetest, and noblest. It is dreadful to have low, tattered, piebald, and stupid people so rubbed into one. Remembering Mr. Dolls, we feel a desire to burn a rag under the noses of Mrs. Davis's characters. The mild sermonizing twaddle of the "Hills of the Shatemuc" was better than this pertinacious exhibition of moral dwarfs, bearded women, Siamese twins, and headless calves. Bad taste in the selection of minor features and a rushing of adjectives to the head spoil a book which, in its table of contents, gives grand promise of an American novel.

There are other experiments. There are novels by Mr. Mitchell, and Mr. Bayard Taylor, and Mr. Beecher, and many more, but none is better than those already mentioned and few are nearly as good. Is there in the whole catalogue a "Newcomes," a "Vanity Fair," a "Misérables," or even a "Little Dorrit" or a "Small House at Allington"? Is there, in other words, a single tale which paints American life so broadly, truly, and sympathetically that every American of feeling and culture is forced to acknowledge the picture as a likeness of something which he knows? Throwing out "Uncle Tom's Cabin," we must answer, Not one!

And why not? There are several reasons, some material, some spiritual, some pertaining to the artists, some to the subject. It is not necessary to dwell upon the fact that, as we produce few books of any kind, we must consequently produce a duly small proportion of good ones. Another cause of barrenness is not less obvious; but it has been upheld by selfishness, shortsightedness, and national prejudice; it has been so strenuously defended that argument is pardonable. For lack of an international copyright the American author is undersold in his own market by the stolen brain-labor of other countries. The ordinary reader, wanting a book and not caring what, providing it will amuse him, steps into a bookstore and finds "Little Dorrit" alongside of "Elsie Venner." He is pretty sure that both are good, but he sees that the former costs a dollar and three-quarters, and the latter two dollars. He buys the cheaper because it is the cheaper. "Little Dorrit" is stolen and sold without any profit to Dickens; and "Elsie Venner" remains unsold, to the loss of Holmes. Nine readers out of ten do this; each one is glad of the twenty-five cents saved; then he wonders "why we don't have an American literature." Depend upon it that, if "Little Dorrit" were the dearest, more "Elsie Venners" would be sold, and Dr. Holmes would give more time to planning and perfecting novels. The American reader must have his book cheap. He will pay high for his coat, his sofa, his piano, his portrait; but the furniture and clothing and adornment of his mind must be cheap, even if nasty. To charge the English price for a good novel might provoke an indignation meeting, if not a riot. When the "young man called John" buys a book for two dollars, he wants very nearly the worth of his "stamps" in paper and binding. The intellectual or moral value of his purchase is a trifle in his estimation, and he does not mean to pay much for it. In short, the American author has first a small sale, and second a small profit on his sale. His business does not keep him, and so he works carelessly at it, or he quits it. His first book is marked by inexperience; his second is produced in haste to meet a board-bill; and he stops disgusted before he has learned his trade. If he could make a living, and if in addition he saw a chance, the merest chance, of doing as well as a grocery merchant, he would go on and perhaps be our glory; who knows?

We do not say that he would do miraculously well, even under favoring pecuniary circumstances. The child of a community which is given to estimating the claims of books by their cheapness, his culture is not of the highest. Clever, but not trained, he knows better what to write than what not to write. Just consider the educational advantages of an English writer of by no means the highest rank, Miss Thackeray, the author of "The Village on the Cliff." Surrounded from infancy by such men as the creator of "Vanity Fair," the creator of "David Copperfield," and their compeers, she may be said to have inherited the precious knowledge of what not to write. You can see it in her books; there is no great power, but there is nothing threadbare, nothing sophomorical; there is a careful, intelligent workmanship, like that of an old hand. The power of an author is frequently, if not generally, no more than the expression of the community which produced him. Have we as yet the literary culture to educate Thackerays and Balzacs? Ah! we only buy them—cheap.

So much for the artist; now for the sitter. Ask a portrait-painter if he can make a good likeness of a baby, and he will tell you that the features are not sufficiently marked nor the expression sufficiently personal. Is there not the same difficulty in limning this continental infant of American society, who is changing every year not only in physical attributes, but in the characteristics of his soul? Fifteen years ago it was morality to return fugitive slaves to their owners—and now? Five years ago everybody swore to pay the national debt in specie—and now? Our aristocracy flies through the phases of Knickerbocker, codfish, shoddy, and petroleum. Where are the "high-toned gentlemen" whom North and South gloried in a quarter of a century since? Where are the Congressmen who could write "The Federalist?" Where is everything that was? Can a society which is changing so rapidly be painted except in the daily newspaper? Has any one photographed fireworks or the shooting-stars? And then there is such variety and even such antagonism in the component parts of this cataract. When you have made your picture of petrified New England village life, left aground like a boulder near the banks of the Merrimac, does the Mississippian or the Minnesotian or the Pennsylvanian recognize it as American society? We are a nation of provinces, and each province claims to be the court.

When Mr. Anthony Trollope commences a novel, he is perplexed by no such kaleidoscopic transformations and no such conflicting claims of sections. Hundreds of years ago English aristocracy assumed the spiritual nature which it holds with little change to the present day. It had made its code of honor; it had established its relations with the mass of the nation; it had become the model for all proper Englishmen. At this time it is a unit of social expression throughout the kingdom. A large class of people go up to London at the same season, go into the country at the same season, lead very nearly the same lives, have the same ideas and tastes. There you have something fixed to paint; there you have the novelist's sitter; there you have his purchaser. All successful English romances are written with reference to this class; they may attack it, they may defend it, they always paint it. Wealthy, it pays high prices for books; anxious to be amused, it buys them freely. For such a sitter who would not, if possible, learn to paint well? Thus, also, in France, only that the subject is always in your studio, for the studio is Paris. If George Sand writes a provincial novel, she does it not for the people of the province described but for the Parisians, who occasionally like a novelty. But the French author need not know more than that one city to have his subject and his public. In divided Germany there have been few good novels. In distracted Italy there has been, perhaps, but one—"I Promessi Sposi"—and that historical, the result of half a lifetime, the task of a great poet. Even Manzoni found it a mighty labor to depict the life of a nation of provinces.

Well, what are our immediate chances for a "great American novel?" We fear that the wonder will not soon be wrought unless more talent can be enlisted in the work, and we are sure that this sufficient talent can hardly be obtained without the encouragement of an international copyright. And, even then, is it time?

ENGLAND.

LONDON, December 20, 1867.

THE whole attention of London, and indeed of England, for the last week has been fixed upon the explosion at Clerkenwell. The newspapers are crammed with details; at every social meeting there seems to be no other topic of conversation; and the irritation against Fenians and all their doings has risen to fever-heat. I do not think that there is much to be added to the simple facts, that an atrocious outrage has been committed and that some of the perpetrators are in the hands of the police. Perhaps I may add, indeed, that even in so detestable a crime there is an infusion of Irish absurdity at which it is difficult to avoid smiling. The Fenians wished to rescue Burke and Casey, consequently they enquired the time at which their friends were in the habit of taking walking exercise in an enclosed courtyard, and proceeded at that hour to blow an enormous mass of wall into the court. If the prisoners had been there, they would probably have been liberated from the jail and from this world at the same time. The governor of the prison appears to have received notice of the exact time of the assault and some hint of its nature; although, according to the newspapers, the form in which it was reported to him was that hand-grenades would be thrown into the exercise-ground of the prisoners—a mode of effecting their liberation more absurd, if possible, than the other. The proper retort would have been to place the prisoners on the exact spot where their would-be liberators expected their presence, and to let them take the consequences of the misguided zeal of their friends. The governor, apparently, was too humane for such a proceeding. Police were carefully picketed round the building, though their vigilance was eluded at the critical moment. Meanwhile the English spectators appear to have shown the unreadiness which some persons are unkind enough to describe as a national characteristic. A milkman who was going his rounds saw the barrel placed against the wall, and saw the lighted fuse attached to it by one of the criminals. A woman to whom he was speaking remarked that they would all be blown up. Hereupon the milkman—continued his rounds and served his other customers. Four or five minutes afterwards, he says, the explosion took place. The milkman certainly showed a coolness worthy of a better cause. An ill-natured person might make an allegory of these incidents. The Irish, in endeavoring to serve their friends, expose them to considerable danger, and only succeed in doing serious harm to the innocent population of the neighborhood. The English allow the catastrophe to take place from sheer want of vigilance and presence of mind. Absit omen! but on a small scale, it is not a bad illustration of the mischief which is due to Irish explosiveness and to English indifference.

The excitement has been kept alive by two or three minor incidents. Attempts were made to set houses in London on fire in three different districts by throwing bottles of "Greek fire" through the windows. Fortunately they all failed. Then a most unaccountable explosion took place at Newcastle. Some one discovered that there were some large casks of "nitro-glycerine" stored behind the town-hall. No one, it seems, was very well acquainted with the special properties of this compound. At any rate, the sheriff with some policemen set about removing it, and whilst they were employed in pouring it off into some safe place they managed to explode the barrels, and four or five men were blown to atoms. This unfortunate proceeding was naturally set down to Fenianism, though on explanation there seems no reason to suppose that it was anything but a purely fortuitous coincidence. It went some way to increase the general excitement and the unpleasant feeling, which the Fenians endeavor to propagate, that the ground is all mined beneath our feet and that a new gunpowder plot may have at any moment still more serious consequences than the last. The Government have called for special constables to be sworn in; magistrates are holding meetings in every direction; and grand juries are making presentments and being charged by judges. In short, we have all the symptoms of one of the periodical fits of British excitement. To one set of persons it certainly bodes no good, namely, to the prisoners now in the hands of the police. The counsel retained for Burke and Casey, a certain Dr. Kenealy, resigned his brief immediately upon hearing of the outrage, and declared that he would not defend persons whose rescue was attempted by such diabolical means. Dr. Kenealy appeared to be under the impression that he was in some way doing a noble action in throwing up his brief, and the magistrate paid him a compliment for the right-mindedness displayed. All the barristers, however, to whom I have spoken condemn him; and it seems, in fact, that his action was only justifiable on the hypothesis, for which he had no grounds beyond general suspicion, that the prisoners were privy to the attempted rescue. The incident, however, shows that some barristers have reached that pitch of excitement at which logic becomes difficult. It is still more certain that a jury will be inclined to reason with more rapidity than accuracy. If the supposed perpetrators of the outrage were to be tried to-morrow, I should think that their chances of acquittal would be small indeed, whatever the nature of the evidence. Any little gaps in a logical train of proof would escape notice, and the resolution that somebody should suffer would be much stronger than the resolution that only the right persons should suffer. Fortunately it seems, so far as is known at present, that the evidence against the persons apprehended leaves no reasonable doubt of their guilt.

And what is to be the net result of these atrocities? I wish that it were possible to give any decided answer. Some persons, of course, say that, setting aside the injury to innocent persons, they are rather glad of the performance than otherwise. It will, they say, make all sentimentalism impossible; men who blow up the houses of a number of poor people in a crowded London quarter deserve hanging, without doubt; no one can declare that their crime is political or capable of excuse by its partly political purpose. Henceforth our hands are free. We may treat Fenians as wholesale assassins and deal with them remorselessly and vigorously. There is only one cry from every part of the kingdom, and that is for energetic action. If energy were the one thing desirable in politics, there could be no doubt of the wisdom of this language. The outrage has done what nothing else could do to bring the British public up to the degree in which Government may venture upon any repressive measures that seem good in their eyes. There is, however, a further question which Mr. Gladstone noticed the other day, whether it will lead to any intelligent effort to remove the causes of Irish discontent. We shall be ready enough in future with the gallows as a cure for open disaffection, but shall we be more ready to attempt the solution of the irrepressible Irish question in a statesmanlike spirit? This is a harder question to answer, and it is the most important. The Fenians can provoke us for a time into severity or even cruelty; they may bring discredit upon their own organization with those who shrink from such atrocities as the Clerkenwell explosion; but these results, good or bad, are of comparatively small importance in the long run. A spasmodic fit of violence will die away, and it will, I fear, take a long time to awake any effective sense of shame amongst Fenians. But it is difficult to say whether the crime will help on or retard serious measures for improving the state of Ireland. On the one hand, the sense of the importance of Irish questions is certainly growing; on the other, the hatred of Irish questions and Irishmen and of everything and everybody that has to do with that unlucky island is probably strengthened by these atrocities, and any alliance between Irish and English reformers is rendered infinitely more difficult. If the leaders can make allowances, the popular instinct is becoming unmistakably hostile.

There is one other question in some degree connected with this. I went on Sunday last to the scene of the explosion. It was a gloomy day of London mist, which repelled the decent population from the streets. The only remark I heard from the crowd of squalid spectators was this: "Ah!" exclaimed a ragged looker-on, gazing at the prison, "I only wish they had 'underminded' the whole —— lot of it!" (I suppress the epithets). The speaker was evidently of that persuasion which has a pardonable prejudice against all machinery for temporarily restraining the liberty of the subject. I have no doubt that the feeling in the neighborhood was, as is natural, one of intense hatred to the Fenians, and I suspect that the crowd would have been quite capable of a summary application of lynch law. Still the question remains whether there is not a certain quantity of discontent in London which may be indirectly favorable to Fenianism, though this special outrage will rather tend to repress any sympathy that may previously have existed. It is, unfortunately, plain that too much of the raw material of complaint is to be found. There was in the Times the other day a letter from Mr. Dudley Baxter—a gentleman who is much given to statistics. He describes the condition of the East End of London—and the "End" by itself contains over 600,000 inhabitants. The stagnation of commerce and the diminution of certain industrial pursuits—especially iron shipbuilding, which formerly flourished there, have produced a gradual growth of distress for the last two or three years. Pauperism has increased, and it is impossible to increase the poor-rate without dragging down into pauperism many who at present just manage to keep their heads above water. We are already hearing of some of those dismal incidents which send a shudder through the comfortable classes. A man died the other day of sheer starvation, with several of his children; a few years ago he had been in possession of £3,000, and had a small business as a tradesman; he has died rather than ask relief from the workhouse. There is something respectable in this martyrdom to independence; but it indicates the existence of considerable evils. It shows, for example, that the poor-law is so administered that, whilst giving assistance to the idle and reprobate, it often leaves the best class of the poor in hopeless misery. In the East End of London another grievance is bitterly felt. It is the part to which the poor of this monstrous town naturally gravitate, whilst their rich employers go to the West. The districts are, however, separated, so that each bears its own burden of poverty. The natural consequence is that the rich districts with few poor pay trifling rates, whilst the poor district with few rich pay enormous rates, and are in some danger of total pauperization. This is one of the evils which is really felt far more deeply than any question of political privilege, and it may bring up problems for our statesmen of no very easy solution. I do not mean to say that we are on the verge of a revolution, or even of the smallest attempt at anything of the kind. Only there are grounds for doubting the restoration of the political complacency of former years, and for looking forwards to a period of political excitement such as we have not known since the famine in Ireland led to the repeal of the corn laws. The Reform bill is out of the way for a time; we shall soon have to reap its harvest; and no one, I think, would speak confidently as to the rapidity with which changes may be forced upon us.

Notes.

LITERARY.

G. W. Carleton & Co. announce two books—one called "Sense," the other "Nonsense"—by the writer known as "Brick Pomeroy," whose real name we do not know. The same house will also issue Renan's "St. Paul," the French edition of which is now in the printers' hands. We hope that since, by "the courtesy of the trade," this firm have secured the privilege of publishing Renan's works in this country, they will give us at least a tolerable translation of "St. Paul," and not such a rendering as we have had to put up with in the case of some of the other books by the same author which Carleton & Co. have reprinted.——Roberts Brothers, of Boston, announce as in press "A Sister's Bye-Hours," by Jean Ingelow; "A Universal Hymn," by P. J. Bailey; "Table-Talk and Opinions of Napoleon the Great;" Sainte-Beuve's "Portraits of Celebrated Women," translated by Miss Preston; "Upside Down, or Turn-over Traits, with Verses," by Tom Hood; "A Bushel of Merry Thoughts," by William Busch; "Thunder and Lightning," by W. De Fonveille; Mark Lemon's "Fairy Tales;" "The Book of Cats," by Charles H. Ross; "The Story of a Round Loaf of Bread," by E. Froment; "Optical Wonders," by F. Marion, and other books which, like some of these, will doubtless be reannounced some time hence.——D. Van Nostrand will publish "Siege Artillery in the Campaigns against Richmond," by Brevet Brig.-Gen. H. L. Abbot.——Sheldon & Co., having made special arrangements with Dr. Newman Hall, publish "A Parting Word," written by that gentleman.——Charles Scribner & Co. announce three new volumes of Lange's "Commentary"—namely, a volume on the "Epistle to the Corinthians," another on "Thessalonians, Titus, Timothy, Philemon, and Hebrews," and another on "Genesis." We may say here that in the next number of Scribner & Co.'s Hours at Home there will be a hitherto unpublished poem of Halleck's, which will be accompanied by a critical essay on the poet's genius and a memoir, the latter by General Wilson and the former by the Rev. H. C. Alexander. In the same number of the magazine Mr. James Greenwood, the "Lambeth Casual," will have an article entitled "Pen Poison," which will talk about that sort of fiction which is published in cheap English journals, the names of which are almost unknown here, and vast quantities of which are devoured, to their great detriment, by English seamstresses and milliners and shopboys. G. W. M. Reynolds is, we suppose, the chief of the writers who produce the "Poison" which is so deleterious; and Mr. Pierce Egan—who somehow did write "Quentyn Matsys"—is his worthy lieutenant. The same publishers announce a new map of Professor Guyot's series—"Imperium Romanum"—of a large size, suitable for the wall.——To Hurd & Houghton's list we add "Contributions relating to the Causation and Prevention of Disease, and to Camp Diseases, together with a report of the diseases, etc., among the prisoners at Andersonville," edited by Austin Flint, M.D.——James Miller announces "The Life of Maximilian," by Frederic Hall, one of his counsel, who, we believe, has printed in the papers one or two interesting letters concerning his client's trial and execution.——We have not mentioned, among books to be issued by Messrs. Ticknor & Fields, the "Life and Letters of Colonel Wilder Dwight."——Moorhead, Simpson & Bond, among several announcements of books interesting to physicians only, give the title of a forthcoming volume that may, perhaps, interest other readers: "Man: Where, Whence, and Whither? being a Glance at Man in his Natural History Relations," by David Page, LL.D.——D. Appleton & Co. announce "A Suggestive Commentary on St. Luke," by W. H. Van Doren, of Chicago; a new volume of Miss Mühlbach's writing; and a novel with the title "Count Mirabeau," by that lady's husband, Theodore Mundt. Appletons also intend to issue a cheap edition of Scott to match their just begun edition of Dickens, of which the volumes are priced, the lowest at fifteen cents and the highest at thirty-five; so the cost of the entire set is five dollars. The covers are paper, but the books are well enough printed and on good enough paper to make them worth binding.

—The second publication of the Agathynian Club is "Polydori Virgilii de Rerum Inventoribus," to which Dr. Hammond furnishes a needed preface. This work is decidedly more curious than valuable, at least for reference, the chapters on the Church excepted. It is a thoroughly unscientific budget of antiquarian lore, of which each head commonly begins in mythology or in profane tradition of as little worth. The Nile—to choose an example haphazard—is said, by obliterating the landmarks of the flooded Egyptians, to have compelled them to invent geometry; and to the same river we owe the thought of blood-letting, seeing that the hippopotamus practises the art by running against a sharp reed, and then plastering the wound with mud. The Camden Society printed Polydore Virgil's "History of England" in 1846, and those who own that work would doubtless be glad to put the present beside it. The "Proverbs" of Erasmus, the friend of Virgil, was also to have been printed by the Agathynian Club, but they have abandoned it, and announce that they will return the money to subscribers if called upon. The Agathynian Press is fully up to its standard in the volume before us, the typography of which is almost all clear, beautiful, and even in tone, and the title and first page of the reprint remarkably so.

—An English version of the "Sakuntala" was made some years ago by Professor Monier Williams. It is in very fair blank-verse, and is pronounced by competent critics true to its original. We are informed that if Professor Williams gives his consent to an American reprint of his translation, very probably the poem will before long be published in a form which, it is reasonable to presume, will be rather superior than inferior to its English form, for it will have the advantage of being edited by Professor W. D. Whitney. It will constitute one volume of that series of great foreign poems which Messrs. Leypoldt & Holt are endeavoring to lay before American readers, and which, it is to be hoped, they may succeed in "engrafting on our literature," to use their own words. There can be no doubt that the natural effect of a knowledge of the series proposed would greatly widen our literary sympathies and enlarge and cultivate our taste. Already we have had "King René's Daughter," Tégner's "Frithiofs Saga," and Lessing's "Nathan the Wise;" Porter's "Selections from the Kalevala," the Finnish epic, is now fresh from the press. The "Sakuntala" will be the fifth volume of the set. The publishers have it in contemplation, but may not carry their purpose into effect, to ask the friends of the enterprise to subscribe for a certain limited number of large-paper copies of the rest of the series. Then the usual edition of ordinary copies will be printed for the general public. Not many subscribers for the somewhat more expensive copies (more expensive and at the same time, of course, more valuable both as books and as property) would be necessary in order to secure perfectly the success of the whole undertaking. Subscriptions, it is intended, may be made for all the forthcoming volumes, or for one or more. We should say that a circular stating the plan definitely might readily call out the desired number of subscribers.

—Bryant having been asked by the alumni of Williams College to send them a poem for their annual meeting, the aged poet declined in this letter, which is to be described by the words charming and touching, and which is of more value than many occasional verses:

"New York, December 27, 1867.

"You ask me for a few lines of verse to be read at your annual festival of the alumni of Williams College. I am ever ill at occasional verses. Such as it is, my vein is not of that sort. I find it difficult to satisfy myself. Besides, it is the December of life with me. I try to keep a few flowers in pots—mere remembrancers of a more genial season, which is now with the things of the past. If I can have a carnation or two for Christmas, I think myself fortunate. You write as if I had nothing to do in fulfilling your request but to go out and gather, under the hedges and by the brooks, a bouquet of flowers that spring spontaneously, and throw them upon your table. If I were to try, what would you say if it proved to be only a little bundle of dead stalks and withered leaves, which my dim sight had mistaken for fresh green sprays and blossoms? So I must excuse myself as well as I can, and content myself with wishing a very pleasant evening to the foster-children of Old Williams who meet on New Year's day, and all manner of prosperity and honor to the excellent institution of learning in which they were nurtured. I am, sir, very truly yours,

"W. C. Bryant."

—The January number of the American Law Review contains, among several valuable articles, one on "Sunday Laws," in which the writer compares the legislation of the several States concerning the observance of the first day of the week, both as regards worship and abstinence from labor. The statute of 29 Car. II., c. 7, § 1, it is said, is the source from which "spring, with many modifications, the Sunday laws, as they are now found in this country," a fact which they will do well to remember who transfer to the Puritans the odium of all Sabbatical restrictions wherever established. The conflict of judicial decisions under identical or closely analogous statutes shows how purely they are based on expediency and not on natural law. Thus in Pennsylvania, "the question has been raised whether a marriage entered into on Sunday was valid, and it was so held; but, upon the question of the validity of the marriage-settlement made on that day, the Court were divided." And in Massachusetts, very recently, "the Court held that walking half a mile in the streets of Boston on Sunday evening, with no intention of going to or stopping at any place but the plaintiff's own house, was not travelling, within the meaning of the Lord's Day Act," as the city had contended; and "in Stanton v. Metropolitan R. R. Co., where plaintiff received an injury by being thrown from one of the defendants' horse-cars, while on the way to visit a friend, it was held that the plaintiff was travelling in violation of the Lord's Day Act," as the railroad company had pleaded to its own condemnation.——The American Naturalist for January opens with a very important paper from Dr. Jeffries Wyman on "Kjœkkenmœddings"—Danish for shell-heaps—which the distinguished professor, in company with other naturalists, examined last summer and fall on the New England coast, from Mount Desert, Me., to Cotuit Port, Barnstable, Mass. A table of thirty-five kinds of animals whose bones were found in these heaps is given, including those of the almost or quite extinct Great Auk, (coast of Maine, only), and part of the great toe of a man (Barnstable). Many bone and a few stone implements were discovered, and proofs of a former hard-wood vegetation where now either none or a soft-wood growth prevails. The age of the shell accumulations is not affirmed with confidence. ——Quite unannounced, the American Athenæum makes its appearance, a weekly paper "devoted to the progressive and æsthetic sciences." Nearly five of the sixteen pages illustrate what is meant by the first and rather inexact adjective, and from them we gather that the proprietors are inspired by perhaps a vague purpose to "swing into" the spirit of the age, and adopt the actual methods of scientific enquiry in all departments of knowledge. Translations from foreign sources are to be a peculiar feature, but whatever is so borrowed is to be applied in solving the problems of American civilization. The best-written, most interesting, and most valuable original article is that on "Negro Folk-Lore."

—M. Jules Claretie publishes at Paris (Libraire Internationale) the first volume of an "Histoire des derniers Montagnards," or the story of that last vain riot of first Prairial, 1795, when Saint Antoine rose against the Convention and was bayoneted down. Thirteen of the sixty members of the "Mountain" who momentarily took possession of the Assembly, and passed the laws which the mob desired, were brought to trial, and all guillotined save two who committed suicide in the court, and who have secured for the whole the title of Ultimi Romanorum. M. Claretie has had access to many unpublished documents in the Imperial archives, and his work will repair the neglect which this dramatic episode of the French Revolution has received at the hands of former historians. The greatest of all these, M. Thiers, has been congratulated and visited, for his anti-Italian speech, by the Bishop of Orleans among others. M. Dupanloup is busy preparing a third pamphlet against M. Duruy, whose scheme of female education has also failed to secure the unqualified sympathy of the bishops who sit on the committee of public instruction. The ultramontanist Bishop of Laval has attacked the minister in his rather vulnerable "Histoire de France," from which he cites passages to prove M. Duruy a materialist and even an atheist. Moral aid comes to the innovator from Berne, where the Grand Council has just decided, by a vote of 128 to 75, that the absolute obedience which members of religious orders owe their chiefs is incompatible with observing the legal regulations concerning public instruction, and they are forbidden to act as teachers hereafter.

—The Book Buyer, a cleverly conducted little monthly, is published—and given away to all persons who will pay the postage on it—by Charles Scribner & Co., and is, of course, avowedly intended to advertise books published by that firm and books imported by the allied firm of Scribner, Welford & Co. But it contains always a letter from London written by Mr. Charles Welford, who, better than any one else who writes for Americans, combines bibliographical knowledge with a knowledge of the insides of books, and it is therefore very well worth looking at. It is true that Mr. Welford shows rather his bibliographical than his literary knowledge in these letters; this we say that he may not be misjudged nor our criticism discredited by persons who know him only by the Book Buyer's correspondence. From his last letter we take a list of books that have either just appeared in England or may be expected during the season. In history, we have, or are to have, Motley's "Netherlands;" the end of Rawlinson's "Five Great Monarchies"—the fourth volume treating of Persia; Doctor Dyer's "History of Rome"—which is a part, we believe, of the present conservative reaction against Niebuhr; Professor Pearson's—of the Goldwin Smith school—"History of England during the Early and Middle Ages;" a work on early English annals, by Sir E. Creasy, author of "The Fifteen Decisive Battles;" Earl Stanhope's (Lord Mahon) "Reign of Queen Anne"—which links his former work to Macaulay's; Volumes III. and IV. of Kinglake's "Crimean War;" Mr. Andrew Bisset's "Commonwealth from the Death of Charles I. to the Dissolution of the Long Parliament;" E. E. Crowes's "France from Clovis to Napoleon III.;" "Smiles's Huguenots in England;" Doctor H. White's "Massacre of St. Bartholomew;" Von Sybel's "French Revolution," translated; the continuation of Wheeler's and the completion of Marshman's "India." In biography, there is to be the long-promised "Byron" of the Guiccioli; Professor Vietch's "Memoirs of Sir William Hamilton;" Morley's "Burke" we have; and some of the other more interesting books of this kind are—Lives of Keble, by J. T. Coleridge; of Pizarro and Las Casas, by Arthur Helps; of Sir Charles Barry, by his son; of Sir Philip Francis, by Parkes and Merivale; of Garrick, by Percy Fitzgerald—who has written several worthless novels and one worthless biography; of the Archbishop of Canterbury, by Doctor Hook; of Baron Bunsen; of James Ferguson; and of Père Lacordaire. In science, there will be Darwin's defence and elucidation of his theory—"The Variations of Animals and Plants under Domestication; or, The Principles of Inheritance, Reversion, Crossing, Interbreeding, and Selection," is the full title of the work. Mrs. Somerville will publish "Molecular and Microscopic Science;" Sir Charles Lyell the second volume of his "Principles of Geology;" and Sir Roderick Murchison "Siluria," etc. To give anything like a view of the field of miscellaneous literature would be impossible.

THE HUGUENOTS IN ENGLAND.*

We have before us two works illustrative of the history of the Huguenot refugees in Great Britain. One is a novel by Miss Tytler, and the other an essay by Mr. Smiles, author of the very good little book on "Self-Help." Of Miss Tytler's novel there is not a great deal to say. It first appeared, we believe, in a religious magazine, and partakes of the merits and defects which novels published under such circumstances are pretty sure to unite. There is a good deal more of moralizing than of romancing, and one is constantly reminded that the author is forcing herself to write in a lower key than that in which the genuine novel consents to be cast. One is reminded at the same time, however, that it is a very surprising thing to find such free-spoken compositions in a religious magazine, and one reflects with satisfaction that periodicals of this class are more cheerful reading than they were ten years ago. On her own merits, Miss Tytler is a very pleasant writer; with a pronounced style, and a fair appearance of knowing something about the times and manners with which she deals. She is intensely sentimental, but, after all, she does n't mean a great deal by it. She has a decided sense of the picturesque in nature and life, and the command of an exuberant vocabulary; and in the person of the old French lady whom she calls "Grand'mère" she has devised a figure sufficiently vivid, and extremely charming. The only serious trouble is that one feels that clever ladies who prepare these gentle infusions of history dilute its mighty essence to an undue feebleness. Mr. Smiles's book, a naked recital of facts and figures, brings us face to face with the era of the great Huguenot exodus, and makes us feel by mere weight of evidence what a vastly serious affair it was, and how full of matter for study and reflection. Miss Tytler, of course, has looked into certain of Mr. Smiles's authorities, but it is plain that she remains quite the same Miss Tytler as before, and that she has not extracted a great deal beside her subject. We may add that her book is far too diffuse for a work of its substance. It not only suggests omissions on the reader's part; it absolutely compels them.

Mr. Smiles's volume presents no claim to originality of matter or of treatment; it is simply a compilation from a number of published authorities. Those parts of his book touching upon the rise of Protestantism, the causes of the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, and the state of French society antecedent and consequent to that event, are especially commonplace and weak. Mr. Smiles is an economist with a taste for morals. He has not the penetration requisite for writing history, and when he attempts it he sets about it in quite the wrong way. It teaches us nothing at this time of day to sneer at the pretended "greatness" of Louis XIV., to assume that his course towards the Protestants wipes out all his splendor, and to characterize inveterately his various acts for the suppression of heresy as hideous and infamous. These very acts were just a part of his splendor, and were so regarded at the time by all who either wished him well or feared him, down to the Huguenots themselves. Properly to appreciate the virtues and the sufferings of the Huguenots we do not need to falsify the character of the king, and to make a monarch de circonstance to place them in relief. "The farce of Louis' 'conversion' went on," writes Mr. Smiles, describing the manner in which the king was brought to revoke the Edict of Nantes. And then he proceeds to relate the sanguinary consequences of the king's growing piety, and the dreadful rigor with which the revocation was enforced. These things prove that it is a gross error to call the king's conversion a farce. It was a most substantial reality. The revocation was in the eyes of all good observers an immense political error, pregnant from the first with those effects which immediately revealed themselves—provinces depopulated, manufactures arrested, and commerce paralyzed. It assuredly took something more than a "farce" to reconcile the king to the possibility of these calamities. "Not only did he lose his teeth," says Mr. Smiles, quoting from Michelet, "but caries in the jawbone developed itself; and when he drank, the liquid passed through his nostrils. In this shocking state Madame de Maintenon became his nurse." The "farce" was hatched between the king "in this shocking state" and Madame de Maintenon. The physiological detail mentioned by Mr. Smiles has at the best no great pertinence; but if it points to anything, it points to a state of misery from which relief was to be obtained only in the most uncompromising devotion. The suppression of the Huguenots was inhuman, but it affords no excuse for historians being inhuman to the king. He should at least have the benefit of his sufferings. For the rest, Mr. Smiles's book strikes us as valuable and interesting; and when once he leaves France behind and reaches English soil with the refugees, there is no fault to be found with his manner of telling his story.

A most interesting story, surely, is this great emigration of persecuted Christians, and a truly noble exhibition of patience and courage. During the thirty years which elapsed between the promulgation of the Edict of Nantes and the civil troubles which terminated in the taking of Rochelle by Richelieu, and the issue of the so-called Edict of Pardon (1629), the Huguenots were able to maintain successfully the political privileges granted them by Henry IV., and continued to form, practically, a little sectarian state within the state. This position of things was altered by Richelieu; the Protestants were extinguished as a political body, and reduced to the simple enjoyment of their religious freedom. The result of this extinction of their civil organization was to turn their attention from politics to industry and trade, and to make them gradually acquainted with the practice of those arts and virtues by the assistance of which, when the hand of authority began to press heavily upon them, they were enabled to combat adversity and to defy the terrors of emigration. During the greater part of the seventeenth century, the Huguenots may be said to have been educating themselves for adoption into other lands; for, destined as they were to be without a future in France, their own country was to reap but little of the benefit of their virtues. It is, nevertheless, true that while they remained in France they formed, as a whole, decidedly the most effective part of the population. "They were acknowledged," says Mr. Smiles, "to be the best agriculturists, wine-growers, merchants, and manufacturers in France." They prosecuted with distinguished success, on their own soil, several of those forms of industry in which, thanks to their example when naturalized in England, the latter country acquired the eminence which it still holds. During the seventeenth century the best paper made in Europe was made by the Protestant communities in Auvergne and the Angoumois, whence alone, almost, England and Holland were supplied. After the great French immigration of 1685 and the year following, England began to make not only its own paper but that of other countries. This is but a single instance of the great industrial impulsion which England owed to the Huguenot settlements. But at the same time that they cultivated the mechanical arts the Huguenots by no means neglected the higher sort of culture. Their two great seminaries at Saumur and Sedan attracted a large concourse of students, and prepared the minds of such men as Claude, Saurin, Abbadie, Jurieu, and Bayle for that influence which they were destined to exercise in new homes and under kindlier auspices.

* "The Huguenots; their Settlements, Churches, and Industries in England and Ireland. By Samuel Smiles. With an Appendix relating to the Huguenots in America." New York: Harper & Brothers. 1868.

"The Huguenot Family in the English Village. By Sarah Tytler." London: Alexander Strahan. New York: Geo. Routledge, and Harper & Bros.

The Edict of Nantes was revoked in 1685; but the way had been gradually paved for the act. One by one the disabilities of the Protestants had been multiplied, their freedom restricted, and the burden of life made heavy for them. Mr. Smiles relates with considerable fulness the successive degrees in the cruel legislation by which they were gradually deprived of their churches, their schools, their pastors, their parental authority, their property, their freedom, and the security of their lives. These measures were all calculated with the keenest sagacity, and directed to the grand consummation of making as many persons as possible disgusted with the discomforts attached to heresy, and so, finally, with heresy itself. The court became possessed with the mania for conversion, and gave itself up to it with the best conscience in the world. Madame de Maintenon had a little niece whose parents were Protestant. One day, in the absence of the latter, she stole away the little girl and immured her in a convent, and when her parents remonstrated, justified her course in letters of truly sublime impudence. In the course of time, after a good deal of external pressure, these people came over to the Church. But a trial to which the king's future wife did not hesitate to subject her own relatives was, of course, not deemed too grievous for the great mass of the heretics. Children were legally empowered to elect Catholicism at seven years of age, and were taken away from their homes under the plea that they had pronounced in its favor. In 1683, the more direct method of obtaining conversions was inaugurated by the introduction of troops into the heretical districts. These lay chiefly in the south, in Languedoc, Guienne, Provence, and Dauphiny, which provinces immediately became the scene of those military executions which were known as dragonnades. The principle was a simple one. The regiments were despatched into the tainted region with or without an ostensible duty, and quartered exclusively on Huguenot households. Once established, their programme was to harass the family à discretion. The story of their outrages is a truly painful one to read, but it is interesting at least as a revelation of ingenuity. The system was atrocious, but it had one excellent excuse: it was in a great measure successful. Conversions followed rapidly, so that the proselytes came to be numbered not by individuals, but by whole towns. Many of these conversions were mere acts of temporary expediency, with a view to obtain time for flight; but they filled the purpose of quickening the zeal of those who directed the persecution and convincing them that heaven smiled on their undertaking. Mr. Smiles's volume abounds in statistics, and the reader may peruse for himself the numerical history of the forced conversions. In a single populous district, for instance, sixty thousand persons abjured in less than a month.

The terms of the revocation of the Edict of Nantes were horribly rigorous. The Protestant ministers alone were allowed to leave the country; the rest of the faithful were to remain and recant, or be sent either to death or to the galleys. Even the ministers were allowed but two days for departure, and the few remaining churches but the same length of time to stand undemolished. Instantly there began a vast outward wave of emigration in all directions—towards Germany, Holland, and England. The civil authorities in these three countries immediately published declarations to meet the occasion, making the Huguenots as welcome in their own states as they were obnoxious at home. One may almost say that the hospitable attitude of all Protestant Europe at this moment is as affecting as the appealing and destitute condition of the refugees. Of their fate in Germany and Holland we have no space to speak. It is enough to say that even as a mere speculation the protecting policy of these states was found amply to pay. It may even be said that Huguenot industry and skill helped in no small degree to lay the basis of the greatness of the young kingdom of Prussia. Nor have we space to dwell upon the condition into which France sunk, materially, after the expulsion of the Protestants—how fertile plains became desolate and busy villages empty and factories stopped for want of hands. We can hardly go so far as Mr. Smiles, however, and declare that the exodus of the Huguenots bequeathed to the country a total cessation of intellectual life and a long literary dearth. It was followed by the advent of that vast group of brilliant writers of which Voltaire and Rousseau are the representatives. In England, in spite of the ill-will of James II., who was paid by France to withhold his sympathy, the Huguenots received a warm welcome, and in several parts of the kingdom, especially in London and in the South, grew rapidly into communities of great size and weight. For three years they had James II. against them, but at the end of that time they received from William III. the strongest confirmation of their rights of settlement and trade. Huguenot officers and men formed a considerable as well as a valuable element in the army which he brought over from Holland. The only fighting done on his accession to the throne was done in Ireland against the French troops sent to the assistance of James. Here the Huguenots met their fellow-countrymen and overwhelmed them, and here, when William's seat was secured, they formed the nucleus of several useful manufacturing communities. For a long time after their establishment in England the refugees cherished hopes of the repeal of their disabilities at home, in which case large numbers would have made their way back. As it was, indeed, small parties ventured to return on the promises of security held out to them by the indefatigable agents of Louis XIV.; but as a general thing they found the security guaranteed by the state to consist of a chain round their neck or loins and with the other end fastened to a seat in a galley. At the time of the king's death, therefore (1715), the Huguenots had become tolerably well absorbed in the English population. They had opened factories and built schools and churches, and proved themselves equally intelligent, industrious, economical, and skilful. In the early part of the eighteenth century the number of their churches in the island had become surprisingly large; but it was natural that they should not hold themselves in permanent isolation from their neighbors, and, accordingly, their number, after having reached a high figure under the influence of their piety, gradually diminishes under that of their growing familiarity with their neighbors. One traces through the remainder of the last century and the first half of the present the slow decline of the various distinctive marks of the Huguenot population. Their very names are corrupted into forms of a thoroughly indigenous sound. It is surprising, however, to learn how very large a proportion of the noted men of England, during these latter years, claim a greater or less degree of Huguenot blood. The reader may form an idea of it by a glance at the alphabetical table of refugees affixed to Mr. Smiles's volume.

We may add that the American publishers have furnished the volume with a short supplementary sketch of the Huguenots in our own country, from which we learn that the French Protestant element in our population, especially in the South, is considerably larger than it is generally supposed to be. But the only trace of the Huguenot character which survives, except the existence of a French church service in one or two Southern cities, is found in certain of those French names which are so common in American society.

THE POLITICAL CONDITION OF GREECE.*

It is not strange that Mr. Rangabè felt impelled to write this pamphlet. There is so little knowledge in Europe of the condition of the Greeks of to-day that any reasonable attempt to add to it has a "sufficient cause" to justify itself. The author, as a scholar and a man of affairs who has been prominent in the recent history of his nation, is certainly qualified to give such information; and this pamphlet, short as it is, contains much valuable matter nowhere else, we believe, to be found in English. It must be remembered in reading it that it is the plea of a patriotic Greek for his country, and, as such, should be taken "cum grano." The Greeks are still, as of old, masters of the "art of putting things." They can make a given amount of favorable fact go as far as most men can, nor do they find more difficulty than the rest of us in ignoring the unfavorable fact. Any one who knows them at all, moreover, knows that their love of country is sometimes quite as strong as their love of truth. Bearing these things in mind, one may gain valuable information and ideas from the book. We are glad that it has appeared in English and on this side of the Atlantic; the articles on Greece in most of our American papers during the past two years have shown by a tendency to vague eloquence, not to say bombast, the want of accurate information. Let us remark that the work of translating ought to have been better done than it is, and especially, in a book full of statistics, such a misprint as this, "182,481,825" for "1824 and 1825," which is twice repeated, is unfortunate. We propose to take the occasion offered by this pamphlet, without depending on it altogether for facts, to make some remarks on the political condition of the Greeks.

* "Greece: Her Progress and Present Position. Republished from the French of Alexander Risa Rangabè, Greek Minister at Washington. With an Introduction." New York: G. P. Putnam & Son. 1867.

They have a king without an aristocracy. In the convention that organized the Government after the revolution of 1821–9, it was decided that the nation could be successfully governed only by a king. Of course, mutual jealousy forbade the elevation of any one of their own number to royalty, and so they have imported both their kings from beyond the Alps. The constitution declares all citizens equal in the state, and excludes all aristocratic rank or title. Thus there are but two recognized orders in society—the king and the citizens. As Otho had no children, and George is not yet married, it has not been actually determined what shall be the status of princes and princesses under the constitution, whom they may marry, etc. The only thing settled is that they shall be brought up in the Greek religion.

They have a House of Representatives without a Senate; in other words, only one legislative body, and that elected by the people. There were at first two chambers—the higher appointed for life, the lower elected yearly. But in the revolution which dethroned Otho, in 1862, the popular dislike of the Senate under his management resulted in the abolition of the chamber. It can hardly be doubted that such a mutilation is an injury to the Government; but then an irresponsible senate, sitting for life, is almost always a hot-bed of jobbery.

They have universal suffrage, but no well-defined political parties. In most nations, especially those living under constitutional governments, there are at least two parties—one radical, the other conservative, by whatever names called. In Greece there are always a ministerial party and an opposition; but they differ not on principles but on occasional questions of policy, the only permanent distinction being that one is in, the other out. At present there are three leading statesmen, one of whom is sure to be called upon to form a cabinet as soon as he succeeds in ousting the one in power. The points contested are matters of policy, to be sure; but neither can be said to advocate uniformly one set of principles distinct from those of his rivals. The financial state of Greece affords abundant opportunity for the construction of parties. In the whole system of the imposition and collection of taxes and customs there is a field for the exercise of the best financial knowledge and ability. A man devoting himself to this end, organizing a party to govern the country with the express object of paying off its debts and developing its resources, would deserve success, and his success would be the greatest benefit any statesman could bestow on Greece.

But, putting aside these anomalies, the important question in regard to the political condition of the Greeks is, Do they manifest a capacity for self-government? The answer, if one considers fairly certain circumstances in their history, will be that they do.

It ought to be remembered, first, that they never have had the person of their choice as king. In 1833 they chose Prince (afterwards King) Leopold of Belgium; but he declined, and they took Otho of Bavaria. In 1863 they elected unanimously Prince Alfred of England; but he, or his royal mother for him, refused the crown, and Prince George of Denmark was given them. In both cases the first choice of the people showed good judgment, and they would have been better off, in all probability, if they had obtained it.

Again, the Powers which secured the Greeks their national existence in 1830 have never left them to the unrestricted development of it. They have more than once interfered to check insurrection in Crete; and in 1854 the combined English and French army of occupation in Attica prevented the Greeks from availing themselves of the opportunity of the Crimean war to take from Turkey the two provinces north of their present boundary, which they have always claimed as rightfully theirs. This action of the two powers was perfectly natural and defensible, but it was none the less an injury to the feelings and rights of the Greek nation. Then, too, the intrigues of England, France, and Russia at the court of Athens have been incessant, and have corrupted the political life of the nation at its centre. It is believed in Athens that English influence, excited against him by his efforts to extend the boundaries of his kingdom, was the chief cause of the expulsion of King Otho.

Now, if we make due allowance for the effect of these hindrances, it will appear that the Greeks have manifested a respectable capacity for self-government. With an excitable people and causes of discontent in operation, they have maintained a fair degree of order and carried on the functions of government without serious interruption. They have had several revolutions, it is true; but these last forty years have been marked by revolutions in various parts of the continent of Europe, no one of which was more honorable to the character of the people which made it than that of 1843 to the Greek character. The stability of government has been proved by the best tests—the safety of investments and the progress of material improvements.

There are only two facts that can be urged with any fairness against the ability of the Greeks to manage their own national affairs—the existence of brigandage and the non-payment of public debts. For the former there are certain physical reasons which amount to partial excuses. That they are not sufficient excuses is seen by the fact that brigandage has been completely put down at times. It has reappeared, as in the last few years, after revolutions or local disorders, in which men have committed crimes, to escape the punishment for which they have fled to the mountains and given themselves up to the life of outlaws. The mountains afford such facilities for defence and escape that it is very difficult, though of course not impossible, to hunt out brigands with soldiery, and in a population so sparse and scattered as that of Greece, though the peasants and villagers do not really favor the brigands, they are easily intimidated so as to give them food and keep secret their movements. The barren and mountainous nature of the country is the main excuse for the existence of brigandage. But this hindrance to putting it down has been overcome in part, and will be fully as the civilizing influence of a strong government comes to be felt through all classes of the people and in all parts of the country. Mr. Rangabè makes the most of these insufficient excuses for brigandage in his pamphlet, but the section in which he treats the subject is one of the least satisfactory in the book, and will give any careful reader the impression that the real cause of the evil lies behind the alleged excuses, and is ignored because it cannot be explained away. That real cause we believe to be the enforced barbarism of centuries, not yet fully eradicated from the character of the people. It must show itself in such disregard of law by individuals, and weakness of the Government to enforce law.

The other difficulty, that of the public finances, arises more from moral causes, and will be of slower cure. Not wholly from moral causes, for perhaps the poverty of the soil may fairly be urged as an excuse. But it is believed that the actual revenue exceeds in average years the expenses of the Government, and the main cause of the failure to pay even the interest on public debts seems to be the dishonesty of officials and the lack of financial ability. Mr. Rangabè's treatment of this subject is as unsatisfactory as that of the brigandage. He repeats the standard excuses that one hears everywhere in Greece, namely, that the debt was contracted by and for a much larger population than that now included in the kingdom, that it has passed into the hands of Dutch speculators, and that the Greeks never had the use of more than a very small fraction of it. Of these, the first only seems to us to have any force at all. His remark, under the head of the Department of Finance, that the Court of Accounts "is extremely severe, and excludes all possibility of misdemeanor in the management of the public moneys," could hardly be regarded as anything but a good joke in Greece itself. We do not wish to speak too harshly of their faults in this respect, but we regard it as the greatest weakness of the Greek character and Government. The tenderest charity cannot let others overlook it; the truest patriotism would prompt them to correct it.

The object of Mr. Rangabè's pamphlet does not lead him to speak at any length of the foreign policy of Greece. It has been by no means so successful as the management of internal affairs. It has not succeeded at all in its one great object, the extension of territory. To understand why this is its main object, we need only to observe the arbitrary boundary assigned to Greece at the settlement of its affairs by the three Powers in 1830. The northern boundary excluded Thessaly and Epirus, and the southern excluded Crete (or Candia). The inhabitants of these excluded districts shared in the struggle of the revolution as fully as any of the Greeks, and had the claims of race and religion to national unity with the new kingdom. Add to this that Thessaly and Crete contain better land than any except one or two comparatively small valleys in Greece, and there appears reason enough for the dissatisfaction of the Greeks with their present limits. The desire shown by the people of the excluded territories to join themselves to the kingdom of Greece is sufficiently accounted for by the fact that they are now under Turkish rule.

These efforts after extension of territory have always been repressed and discouraged by England and France, and never actively aided by Russia.

The reason of the opposition of the Western Powers is clear. It is their policy to support the Turkish Power in Europe as long as possible, in order to prevent Russia from getting control of Constantinople. Free access to the Black Sea, free movement of trade in the Levant and through Egypt to the East, not to be interrupted by war with Russia, they must have. To secure this, and to prevent disturbance of the balance of power by the extension of Russia to the south-west, they must bolster up the failing power of Turkey. It is probable that Russia has abstained from open encouragement of the Greek movements from the wish not to excite the jealousy of the Western Powers in behalf of this object of theirs.

There is but one other way by which this object could be secured besides this one of maintaining Turkey in Europe—a way which has the recorded opinions of Cobden and Guizot, not to mention others, in its favor. The Turks are moving back into Asia of their own accord. They bury their dead beyond the narrow straits, and every year the living go back whence their ancestors came four hundred years ago. Villages once wholly Turkish have been depopulated by this movement, and in others the proportion of Turks has greatly decreased. Meantime, the peoples under the Turkish rule are advancing in civilization and knowledge of themselves slowly but perceptibly, and their kindred round them are agitating for union with them. Now, the second way of solving the "Eastern question," recognizing these facts, is simply an application of the "principle of nationalities." It is to let these natural processes go on undisturbed, to let the Turks retire into Asia and the Empire of Turkey in Europe fall to pieces, to let the now subject peoples group themselves as they will, with no interference from without, in the expectation that the future will show a single state or a group of states occupying this important territory, independent and strong enough to take a place in European politics, and to keep Constantinople from the exclusive control of any of the great Powers.

This brings us to the grand idea—ἡ μεγάλη ἰδέα, as they call it, translating the French phrase—of the Greeks. Their dream for the future, over which at times they grow pitiably sanguine, is of a Greek empire comprising what is now Turkey in Europe with the Principalities and Greece itself, and having Constantinople for its capital. Through what political difficulties and ruinous wars the path to this darling object may lie, they seem to have no idea. The scheme has thorough possession of the Greek mind, and if the motto, "Possunt quia posse videntur," held good on so grand a scale, they would have their object within their grasp. Certainly the absence of other sources of ability makes this one eminently necessary in their case. It should be borne in mind, too, that the great body of the population of Turkey in Europe is not Greek in race, though it is in religion.

But for immediate efforts they have a more limited and reasonable ambition, that Epirus, Thessaly, and Crete should be added to their territory. This would satisfy them for the present, and with this addition of numbers and of fertile land they claim that they would be able to begin to pay off their debts, and to fill worthily the position of an independent nation. But this would be the beginning of the dismemberment of Turkey, and no European Power is sure enough what would come next to be willing to run the risk. The feeling of the Greeks towards the other Powers varies as they show themselves friendly or hostile to this desire for extension of territory. The first ship that took off families from Crete last fall was an English vessel, while the French Government seemed to oppose the revolution in every way except by force. Then the Greek papers were extravagant in their praise of England's friendship for Greece and denunciations of French treachery. But, as the winter went on, no other English vessel relieved the sufferers in Crete, and England refused to join the other Powers in their remonstrance to the Sultan, while the policy of France was unaccountably changed to favor the revolution. The newspapers cursed their former blindness, and declared that France was their true friend, but England an enemy to freedom everywhere. In spite of these fluctuations of feeling, it is clear that on general principles the English are the natural western allies of the Greeks; for the Greeks are pre-eminently a seafaring and trading people. The commerce of the Levant is now in their hands, and what national strength they have will always be in their navy. Thus, the interests of the two people are the same, while England has nothing to fear from the commercial rivalry of so small and distant a people, but might find the use of its ports and navy of great value.

The attitude of the Greeks towards Russia is not so friendly as might be supposed from their community of religion. In fact, at present the Greeks are afraid of so powerful and ambitious a friend. They fear to come into too close relations with her, lest they might suddenly find themselves absorbed and lost in the great empire. They know that the Pan-Slavonic empire of the future will not be strict in requiring purity of blood for admission. They see, too, that Russia has its eye fixed on Constantinople, and that there will be no chance for their Greek empire if the Czar gets there first. For these reasons the proposed marriage of King George with the Princess Olga causes some uneasiness, though as giving them a sovereign of their national religion for the first time it is gratifying. It is likely to increase the unwillingness of the Western Powers to permit any addition to the kingdom of Greece, and thus to complicate still more that knot of diplomacy, the "Eastern question."

The feeling of the Greeks towards the United States is friendly in the highest degree. Our separation from the interests and entanglements of the European states and our position as the representative of popular liberty explain this in part, but one cannot help seeing, when the Greeks speak of our country, that distance and ignorance have lent some enchantment to the view. "America! ah, that is the country where justice lives!" said an old Greek in a stage to the writer, with a sigh at the thought that it lived so far from him. They remember still with the liveliest gratitude the aid sent them from this country at the time of their great revolution, and the mere fact of being an American secures a traveller marked hospitality almost everywhere. In the nature of the case there can be no very close relations between the two countries. Our direct commerce with Greece is very insignificant, and we as yet happily have no immediate interest, none other than that of all civilized nations, in the settlement of the Eastern question. The presence of Mr. Rangabè as minister of Greece at Washington will, it may be hoped, make us better acquainted with the character, aims, and wants of his people, in other ways as well as by the issue of this pamphlet.

TWO THOUSAND MILES ON HORSEBACK.*

All Americans have some knowledge of the country west of the Mississippi; a vast number of books has been written about prairies on fire, buffaloes, Indians, trappers, military posts, emigrant trains, mines, lynch law, Mormons, prairie dogs, and other things appertaining to life on the edge of American civilization. But, so far as we know, there is no book of travel relating to those regions which does more than add to a mass of very desultory information. Few men have more than the most unconnected and unmethodical knowledge of the vast expanse of territory which lies beyond Kansas. This is necessarily so. The fluctuating waves of life on our immense frontier no one can hope to paint satisfactorily. Bit by bit he can give us a momentary glimpse of them, but the general description must be vague when the thing described is itself so shifting. In 1829 Kit Carson was in California, and became familiar with several powerful Indian tribes. He might have written an account of them; but had he done so his book would have been of little value twenty years afterwards. In 1853 he revisited California; and when he enquired about the various nations which had formerly filled all the valleys, he could find not a man who knew so much of them as even their names. A man talks to us of the country west of the Rocky Mountains, and while he is talking the Territory of Wyoming is established, of which neither he nor his auditors have before heard. Our author himself speaks of Nebraska as a Territory; but it has become a State of the Union since he began his journey in June, 1866. As Colonel Meline says, within the memory of living men, the traveller who intended to go West took Schenectady, in this State, for his point of departure; then Chambersburg was the headquarters of emigrants; then Clarksburg, in Virginia, and afterwards, in turn, Maysville and Kaskaskia, and St. Louis and Independence and Leavenworth. And by this time Leavenworth must have ceased to be in the West; probably, as we write, Denver has become an Eastern city, and day by day the Pacific railroad is abolishing the marks which distinguish Western from Eastern life.

Colonel Meline's volume is to be put in the same category with those books of Western travel of which every library has half a dozen. By and by, perhaps, somebody will gather together the numerous scattered descriptions of this and that period of our frontier history, and then we may get a complete and intelligible view of the new country, its inhabitants, white and copper-colored, and its institutions. At present we must rest content with reports made to the Department of the Interior, the letters of special correspondents, and books which, except binding, are in few respects different from newspaper correspondence.

Colonel Meline set out on horseback from Fort Leavenworth, in Kansas, rode to the north-west into Nebraska, to the west and south into Colorado, and to the south into New Mexico. Then, by a shorter course, north-east by east, he returned to Fort Leavenworth. He gives us as he goes along the usual amount of description of the usual sort. We read about the prairie dog, about the wonderful clearness of the mountain atmosphere, the beauty of the wild flowers of the plains, the buffalo, the vivid lightning, the force of the winds that sweep over such vast expanses; about the not-to-be-related brutality and filthiness of the Indians, about the traces of emigrant wagons and the rapid growth of towns, about the sardine boxes and tin cans—once hermetically sealed—which are strewn over three-fifths of the United States, and mark the westward course of empire towards the Pacific, about the gold mines and the national forts, and, in short, about all the things of the Plains about which we have heard so much. It is a hard task for a traveller in this region to tell us much that is new, or indeed anything new. The last comer finds, to be sure, towns and cities where his predecessor of five years before found only the ashes of camp-fires or the bones of men murdered by Apaches or Cheyennes. But when the towns and cities come to be described, it is merely saying that the circuit judge, and the circuit preacher, and the vigilance committee, and the hotel of the ninetieth degree of longitude west from Washington have been carried forward to the later Central City of one hundred degrees west from Washington.

* "Two Thousand Miles on Horseback: Santa Fé and Back. A Summer Tour through Kansas, Nebraska, Colorado, and New Mexico, in the Year 1866. By James F. Meline." New York: Hurd & Houghton. 1867.

But, after all, the fluctuations which it is so difficult to describe, and which have so much sameness, offer to each man's eye something which others missed, and every new book on the subject, amid much that is old, gives something fresh and interesting. The book in hand, for example, adds one to those numerous sayings whose Western largeness of phrase and idea has become a distinguishing mark of what is called American humor, when it tells us of a gentleman who declined to reside in Arkansas because he did not like a country where, if a man lay down, he was drowned, and, if he stood up, he was struck by lightning. Nor had we ever heard of the comprehensive use of the word "outfit," which, in the new country parlance, is made to include everything earthly, from the late Confederacy to a pair of green spectacles, or a woman with a parasol:

"This word 'outfit' is on duty night and day, without relief, from the Missouri River to California. To cross the Plains or go to the mountains every one must get an outfit; and, having outfitted, you become yourself an outfit. From generals it is used for particulars. The saddler who sold me my saddle assured me it was the best outfit he had furnished for some time. Bought a hat, and was told, 'Well, sir, I call that a good outfit.' Went to the Planters' House in Denver to get dinner. Waiter brought me a very poor one, and, when I complained, said, 'Very sorry, but can't help it; grand supper here to-night, given by the citizens to General Pope and staff, and that 's the best outfit I can give you.'

"I showed my Smith & Wesson revolver to a native. 'You 've got a bully outfit there, stranger, sure.' A train of wagons is an outfit; a man on a mule is an outfit; a squadron of cavalry is an outfit; a Jersey wagon drawn by one horse an outfit. So is a man with a cane, or a woman with a parasol."

It was new to us also to hear that, solitary as the prairies are, the roads over them are almost always as full of life and activity as any highways in the country. "You are scarcely ever out of sight of wagons," Colonel Meline says, and when he says it he is nearly at Fort Kearney, in Western Nebraska. "Since leaving Leavenworth we have passed in one week six hundred and eighty wagons." And again he reports, on the authority of the commander of Fort Kearney, that the number of wagons which passed that point between the fifteenth of May and the eleventh of June, 1866, was no less than eighty each day; and the number of persons who went with them daily was one hundred and sixty—men, women, and children. Besides these emigrant trains there are freight trains which exceed the others in number of teams, though of course the number of people accompanying them is much smaller. We may add that we believe they have been pushing the railroad at this part of the line about as fast as a team can travel, so that the railroad men keep their camping grounds even with those of the pilgrims, and that before long the wagons will be things of the past.

We go on pleasantly with our author, who is a very companionable traveller, till we reach New Mexico, and here he puts off for a while the character of a newspaper correspondent and appears as a student of historical remains. As a correspondent he might perhaps tell us as much as he does about New Mexico, the manners of its Indian inhabitants and of the Americans who live there for a longer or shorter time, its scenery, its mineral wealth, and so on. At any rate, he tells us more of these things than we know where to find elsewhere, and we found it all interesting reading. This, we take it, is new to most of our readers, though it is true that we have on the statute-book a law against peonage in any part of the United States:

"The New Mexicans are essentially a pastoral people, and a poor people. Come and look at them, and you will then understand that we, in the United States, do not know what poverty is. At least six-eighths of them are only just emerging from a state of peonage; for peonage, like its accursed twin sister, slavery, dies hard. Said a man (a Virginian) to me, the other day:

"'That man there is my slave'—pointing to a tall, good-looking, elderly Mexican, with intelligent and sharp-cut features.

"'Your slave,' said I; 'why, what do you mean?'

"'I mean that I bought him and paid for him. He owed his former master three hundred dollars. I paid the money, and now I own him.'

"'But,' said I, 'if he chooses to walk off, and work for himself, you have no law to get him back.'

"'That's very true,' he replied, 'but they do n't know any better.'

"And there are thousands still held here in slavery and peonage, simply because they do n't know any better, or because long years of aimless and hopeless toil have produced an apathy and ignorance that time and freedom alone can dissipate. Already there are signs of improvement, and I have heard of several instances of men, formerly peons, one in particular at Mora, who, but a few years out of bondage, have already earned competency and ease. With the elevation of this class, which is the great body of the people, will come self-respect, industry, saving, comfort, and the commerce that necessarily springs from the wants of a civilized people."

As a student of history, our author throws some light on one or two episodes of American history, and we hope that when New Mexico shall have a historiographer, he will work the vein upon which Colonel Meline has struck. We are sorry that he was not able to give us the documents of which he speaks—we take his word for their being valuable—which relate to the once famous conspiracy of Aaron Burr, and which he found in the New Mexican archives. As to the particular historical topic to which our author paid most attention, it is this: In 1806, Wilkinson, once well known for his connection with Burr, sent Lieutenant Montgomery Pike on a journey through the wilderness with orders to treat with the Indians on his way, to discover the head-waters of the Red River, and to bring his men and himself to Santa Fé. Pike—Mungo Meri Paike, the Spaniards call him in their reports—by mistake, his maps being good for nothing, or next to nothing, went into Spanish territory, and was surprised to find that the Governor of New Mexico treated him with a degree of hostility—courteous, to be sure—better befitting an enemy than a soldier of a friendly nation who had lost his way in the wilderness. Down to the time when he published his book, Pike was unable to account for the usage he received. Colonel Meline discovers that he was suspected, reasonably enough, of being in Wilkinson's and Burr's secrets, and was therefore jealously watched.

The other historical point to which Colonel Meline's attention was directed was the question whether De Soto's men, after burying their first commander in the Mississippi, did not, under the leadership of Louis de Moscoso, advance through Texas into the desert Llano Estacado or Staked Plain. His reasons for believing that his supposition—his, for he is the first to make it—is the correct one seem to us sound, and it might be well if he would treat it at more length than the limits of an appended note will allow.

We may as well add that some of Colonel Meline's stories—that, for instance, about Fort Yuma—are rather aged, and that he is very whimsical and not very well advised in his remarks about Miss Nightingale and the proper pronunciation of Demosthenes. But he travels a little out of the record when he talks of those personages; and within the record he is an instructive and entertaining writer, whose book will be read not without some considerable pleasure.

Doctor Wilmer's Love. A Question of Conscience. By Margaret Lee. (New York: D. Appleton & Co. 1867.)—The question of conscience proposed for consideration in this volume may be thus stated: Doctor Wilmer saves from imprisonment, idiocy, and almost certain death, a young lady whose wicked stepmother wants her ward's money. The young lady thenceforth loves the doctor, and he her. He puts it to his conscience whether he ought to ask her to marry him; he fears that mere gratitude on her part may lead her to grant him what only love ought to give, or be asked to give. It is a rather absurdly fine-drawn case of casuistry, and one that in real life would probably not long trouble any man or woman of ordinary sense; but it is conceivable that it might trouble some people. We should, therefore, have not so much fault to find with Miss Lee—or Mrs. Lee—if she had so constructed her story as to present this problem and then work it out. But she states the question, she names her book after it, and then she forsakes it. She makes the scrupulous doctor write his confession of love in a letter and conceal the letter in a book in a library, where Belle does not find it, but a scheming enemy does. It is, of course, concealed, and the doctor does not marry his inamorata until she has first married another man and by-and-by become a widow—he meanwhile having suffered much misery, not, as Miss Lee thinks, so much because of his nice or over-nice conscience, as because of his clumsiness when, taking a sensible view of the matter, he decides to reveal his passion. A conscience that hampers a man in a certain course of action, while it yet does not prevent his entering upon that course, might be a theme for a very fine novel; but to ask us to admire the power of conscience as seen in a series of actions and events which really owe their birth not to conscience at all, but to pure stupidity, is to ask an impossibility and to ask what the authoress of "Doctor Wilmer's Love" asks. The book is the materials of an ill-conceived magazine story spun out into a volume, and the authoress does nothing to reconcile us to the more than necessary diffuseness with which she details the incidents of her story by any skill whatever in the portraiture of character, by any force and freshness as a thinker, or by any especial ability as a writer merely. The moral tone of the novel is good, and its style is not vicious. This exhausts what praise can be given it.

The Lovers' Dictionary. A Poetical Treasury of Lovers' Thoughts, Fancies, Addresses, and Dilemmas, Indexed with nearly Ten Thousand References, as a Dictionary of Compliments and Guide to the Study of the Tender Science. (New York: Harper & Brothers. 1867.)—This book pretty well—well enough, at any rate—exhausts the range of amatory poetry in the English language. To translated poetry, however, the compiler seems to have paid too little attention. Six hundred and seventeen of the volume's fine-print pages are filled with the fears and hopes and love-longings and other perturbations of the spirit consequent on the passion of love, metrically expressed; and the rest of the book—a hundred and seventy odd pages—consists of copious and exact indexes. We have amused ourselves by looking over these latter in a cursory way. "I" we discover a hundred and forty odd times; of "thous" and "yous"—the "thous" preponderating—we find only sixty-four. There are forty "smiles" and a considerably greater number of "tears;" "nightingales" there are one hundred and thirty-one. The "broken vows" and "broken faiths" are out of all proportion to the "broken hearts," of which there seem to be no more than two. Of "kisses" there are sixty-two. We were not surprised to find that "eyes" were mentioned no less than one hundred and eighty-two times; "lips"—sweet, coral, rosy, and so forth—are mentioned thirty-eight times; "teeth" but once; "hair," under which head we include "locks," "tresses," and "ringlets," is mentioned seventy-three times; the "neck" six times, the "brow" ten times, the "bosom" twelve," and the "breast" nineteen times; the "cheeks" forty-four times, the "feet" but five times, the "hand" and "fingers" and "finger-tips" thirty-three times; "dimples" only twice, and the "form" but seldom. As for the poetry, it is of course of all sorts. There is no end to the passages that might be cited by a compiler having in view the object which the compiler of this work had before him, and he has omitted much that he might have quoted. But we do not know why he has not done his work well enough; we see no good reason why any one else should labor in the same field. It was rather a foolish task, at the best, that he set himself—to prepare "A Dictionary of Compliments" for lovers; but in performing it he necessarily gathered together a great mass of good poetry, and, as a collection of very many amatory pieces, extremely well indexed, we can recommend his book. It is handsomely printed and prettily bound.

Horse Portraiture. By Joseph Cairn Simpson. (New York: Townsend & Adams.)—Aside from its peculiarities of style, "Horse Portraiture" is a most valuable treatise. It is the work of a man who thoroughly understands the breeding, training, and management of the horse, and, furthermore, it is free from the jockey slang with which works of this description are too often larded. Both the novice and the veterinary surgeon will derive a benefit from the perusal of Mr. Simpson's work. The one will learn from it all that is necessary in the care and management of the horse, while the other will gather original suggestions, which may be made available in the practice of his profession. An appendix which treats exclusively of the celebrated horse Dexter accompanies the book, and will be found interesting to the many who, after the "almighty dollar," look upon the trotting horse as the last and best gift of Columbia to her sons. It is unfortunate that the author has thrown his work into the cumbersome form of a dialogue, which often amusingly and oftener tediously takes a dreadfully moral turn, and it is a pity, too, that his style is so bad. It is a very good book, though, for horse-owners, in spite of its faults of manner.

FOUR NEW BOOKS.

CIVILIZATION IN THE FIFTH CENTURY.

History of Civilization in the Fifth Century. Translated, by permission, from the French of A. Fred. Ozanam, late Professor of French Literature in the Faculty of Letters at Paris. By A. C. Glyn, B.A. 2 vols. 12mo, cloth, $3 50.

HODGSON'S REFORMERS AND MARTYRS. The Lives, Sentiments, and Sufferings of some of the Reformers and Martyrs before, since, and independent of the Lutheran Reformation. By Wm. Hodgson. 1 vol. 12mo, fine cloth, price $2.

ECCE DEUS HOMO; or, the Work and Kingdom of the Christ of Scripture. 12mo, tinted paper, extra cloth, price $1 50.

WALDEMAR KRONE. The Story of Waldemar Krone's Youth. By H. F. Ewald, author of "The Nordby Family," "Johannes Falk," etc. Translated from the Danish. 1 vol. 12mo, neat cloth, price $1 75.

For sale by Booksellers generally, or will be sent by mail, postage free, on receipt of price by

J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO.,

PUBLISHERS,

PHILADELPHIA.

THE NATION.—"I wish it success from the bottom of my heart."—Rev. Henry W. Bellows.

THE STORY OF MY CHILDHOOD.

LITTLE, BROWN & CO.,

BOSTON,

Have Just Published

The Story of My Childhood.

By MME. J. MICHELET.

Translated from the French by Mary Frazier Curtis. 12mo, cloth, $1 25.

"The autobiography of Madame Michelet, if the translator judges rightly, will prove itself to be the sweetest picture of child-life, and the strangest that has ever been offered to New England readers."—From the Introduction.

"Among the more pretentious books with which the season inundates the booksellers' counters this charming little story may escape the attention it deserves. There is a naïve grace and sympathetic candor about the French memoirs which make the record of family life singularly attractive. In the story of her childhood, the wife of the celebrated French historian gives us a vivid picture of her early home in the south of France, and the remarkable experiences of her father at St. Domingo. The local descriptions in this pleasant book are very graphic and graceful, the household life full of color, and all the experiences of a French girl of good parentage in a picturesque though provincial region, from infancy to her first communion, and so on to ripe maidenhood, are narrated with frank and animated relish."—N. Y. Times.

"As charming and as sad a narrative of a child's life as ever was written. . . . The translation is admirably well done into good but not too-English English, retaining not French idioms, but a certain delicate foreign flavor that is in keeping with the essentially foreign atmosphere of the story."—Boston Advertiser.

"We have read this volume with an interest which we could scarcely have supposed would be excited by any mere relation of the incidents and experiences of childhood. We can heartily recommend it as equally well adapted to the perusal of old and young alike."—Boston Courier.

"The hopes and fears, the joys and sorrows, the struggles and disappointments, and all the varied experiences that fill up the early years of a life, are sketched in a way that never fails to reveal a strong imagination and a most graphic power of description."—Boston Journal.

THE NATION.—"It stands in New York without a rival."—Phila. Evening Telegraph.

Now Ready:

THE COMEDY OF CONVOCATION IN THE ENGLISH CHURCH.

In two Scenes. Edited by Archdeacon Chasuble, D.D.

Pamphlet, 8vo, 75 cents.

The New York Nation says of this pamphlet:

"We do not know when we have read anything with more pleasure than the Comedy of Convocation, which is the title alike of the fifteenth article in the Catholic World, and of an English pamphlet which the Catholic Publication House is about to reprint. The article is wholly composed of extracts from the pamphlet, which, for its wit and fun and acuteness, is really admirable. We heartily recommend all our readers, of whatever shade of religious belief, to give themselves the pleasure of reading it, and we advise the Catholic Publication House to print a very large edition of it. The work is said to be from the pen of Father Newman, and is every way worthy of the imputed authorship."

THE INNER LIFE OF THE VERY REV. FATHER LACORDAIRE, O.S.D.

Translated from the French of the Rev. Father Cochrane. $3.

"This deeply interesting work is a full and thoughtful study of the life and character of the great Dominican of the Nineteenth Century. Those who wish to appreciate fully the strange phenomenon of the existence in modern France of a monk whose whole genius was purely and essentially that of the middle ages, can find ample scope for doing so in the charmingly written pages of Père Cochrane."—New York Times.

REASON AND REVELATIONS.

Being Advent Lectures delivered by the Rev. Thomas S. Preston, in St. Ann's Church. 1 vol. 12mo, $1 50.

THE MONKS OF THE WEST.

By Count Montalembert. 5 vols. 8vo, $25.

 Orders from the Trade solicited.

Classified Catalogues of American and English Catholic Books sent free on application.

Address

The Catholic Publication Society,

LAWRENCE KEHOE, General Agent,

126 Nassau Street, New York.

ANNOUNCEMENTS OF NEW PUBLICATIONS.

D. APPLETON & CO.,

443 AND 445 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,

Will Publish on the 8th of January,

THE MILITARY HISTORY

OF

ULYSSES S. GRANT,

FROM APRIL, 1861, TO APRIL, 1865.

BY ADAM BADEAU,

Colonel and Aide-de-Camp to the General-in-Chief, Brevet Brigadier-General United States Army.

Volume I., with Portrait and numerous Maps, 580 pages, price $4.

ON THE 11TH OF JANUARY,

NAPOLEON AND BLUCHER:

AN HISTORICAL ROMANCE.

BY LOUISA MUHLBACH.

TRANSLATED BY FRANCIS JORDAN.

1 vol. 8vo, illustrated, paper covers, $1 50; cloth, $1.

"In this novel the author unrolls before us the great rising of the Germans against Napoleon, and depicts with masterly skill the most stirring events and episodes of the great year 1813. Old General Blücher, the impetuous youth of seventy, around whom the noblest spirits of the fatherland rallied with so much enthusiasm and devotion, and on whom princes and soldiers, with one accord, conferred the immortal title of 'Marshal Forward,' is the leading hero of the work. The author communicates to us about this remarkable man many facts not to be found in the histories of the times, and well calculated to excite our interest in, and admiration for, this wild and dashing, yet exceedingly kind, amiable, and noble-hearted captain. Scharnhorst, the original organizer of the Prussian Landwehr; Lützow, the daring raider; Theodore Körner, the inspired Tyrtæus of the war; Hardenburg; Frederick William III.; York, who struck the first blow against Napoleon; Eleonora Prohaska, the heroic girl who fought under Lützow, and many other prominent characters of the times, are grouped round Blücher with that dramatic power for which Louisa Mühlbach is noted."

ON THE 11TH OF JANUARY,

A SUGGESTIVE COMMENTARY ON ST. LUKE.

By Rev. W. H. VAN DOREN, of Chicago.

2 volumes crown 8vo, containing twelve hundred pages, price $3 50.

These volumes have received the warmest commendations from clergymen of every denomination in England, where they have only recently appeared. They are now published for the first time in this country.

ON THE 18TH OF JANUARY,

COUNT MIRABEAU:

An Historical Tale.

By THEODORE MUNDT. Translated by THERESE J. RADFORD.

1 volume 8vo, with illustrations, paper covers, $1 50; cloth, $2.

His Historical Romances are much admired for their polished style and solid learning. They are Historical Romances in the best sense of the word. Thirty years of historical researches qualified him for his task.

Upwards of 20,000 copies of this work were sold in Germany shortly after its publication.

ON THE 21ST OF JANUARY,

A STORMY LIFE:

An Historical Romance.

By Lady GEORGIANA FULLERTON, Author of "Too Strange not to be True," "Lady Bird," etc.

1 volume 8vo, with illustrations, paper covers, $1 50; cloth, $2.

The subject of this story is the beautiful Margaret of Anjou. "From her birth, she entered upon this extraordinary blending of the most brilliant circumstances with the most calamitous events, which attended her through life, checkering her existence with alternate bursts of sunshine and long, dreary watches of deepest midnight, until death and the grave put their final shadows around her tempest-tossed body, opening a prospect of endless light to her soaring spirit."

The Agathynian Club

Respectfully announces that it has just issued, as its second publication, a translation, by JNO. LANGLEY, of the "De Rerum Inventoribus of Polydore Virgil, with an account of the Author and his Works, by Dr. WILLIAM A. HAMMOND." One hundred and twenty copies only have been printed.

The book is elegantly printed on thick toned and laid paper by the Agathynian Press, and consists of 279 8vo pages, with new head and tail pieces. A few copies remain for sale. Price, $5 in paper; $6 in extra cloth, bevelled edges, top edge gilt.

Intending subscribers should address

B. W. BOND, Actuary,

60 Duane Street, New York.

NOW READY:

PATHOLOGICAL ANATOMY OF THE FEMALE SEXUAL ORGANS.

By Prof. JULIUS KLOB, of VIENNA.

Translated by Drs. KAMMERER and DAWSON.

1st volume, containing the Diseases of the Uterus, extra cloth, price $3 50.

MOORHEAD, SIMPSON & BOND,

PUBLISHERS,

60 Duane Street, New York.

PUBLISHED THIS DAY.

I. A Journey in Brazil.

By Professor and Mrs. AGASSIZ. 1 vol. 8vo. With Eight full-page Illustrations, and numerous smaller ones, from Photographs and Sketches. Carefully printed, bound in morocco cloth, price $5.

The scientific results of the Brazilian Expedition of Professor and Mrs. Agassiz are not fully given in the present volume, which is of a popular character, presenting only such results and details of the scientific observations as were necessary to explain and connect the narrative and descriptive portions of the volume, which will be found exceedingly fresh, graphic, and picturesque.

The new and rich field of observation, the unusual qualifications of the observers, the thrilling adventures they experienced, the attractive style in which the story is told, and the numerous illustrations, combine to render this one of the most valuable and attractive volumes of travel ever published.

II. The Antiquary. 1 vol.
The Monastery. 1 vol.

Two more volumes of the elegant and cheap Illustrated Library Edition of the WAVERLEY NOVELS. Ten volumes are now issued. The complete set will contain twenty-five. Price $1 50 a volume.

 For sale by the Booksellers. Sent, post-paid, on receipt of price, by the Publishers,

TICKNOR & FIELDS, Boston,

And 63 Bleecker Street, New York.

JAMES VICK,

IMPORTER AND GROWER OF

Flower & Vegetable Seeds,

ROCHESTER, N. Y.

VICK'S ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE OF SEEDS, AND FLORAL GUIDE FOR 1868,

Is now published and ready to send out. It makes a work of about one hundred large pages, containing full descriptions of the choicest Flowers and Vegetables grown, with plain directions for Sowing Seed, Culture, etc. It is beautifully illustrated with more than one hundred fine wood engravings of Flowers and Vegetables, and a beautiful colored plate of Flowers. Well printed on the finest paper, and one of the most beautiful as well as the most instructive work of the kind published.

 Sent to all who apply by mail, post-paid, for Ten Cents, which is not half the cost.

Address JAMES VICK, Rochester, N. Y.

READ AND JUDGE FOR YOURSELF.

THE NEW WEEKLY PAPER.

The Second Number now ready.

THE AMERICAN ATHENÆUM.

Devoted to the Progressive and Æsthetic Sciences.

Amongst the Contents of the First and Second Numbers are:

The True Spirit of Progress.
French Progressive Philosophy.
No International Copyright.
Negro Folk-Lore.

The Slow Growth of Human Advancement.
The Useful, the Virtuous, the Just.
The Progress of Culture.
Boundaries of Religion and Fable.

And many other valuable articles, each worth a year's subscription.

TERMS: $5 a year. Specimen numbers 10 cents.

For sale by all Newsdealers.

THE AMERICAN ATHENÆUM,

63 William Street, New York.

EL BIB.

GOD AND MAN BY THE LIGHT OF NATURE.

1 vol. 16mo, pp. 216, price $1 50.

WHO WAS SWEDENBORG?

1 vol. square 16mo, pp. 72, price 75 cents.

THE DOCTRINE OF LIFE.

From the Latin of EMANUEL SWEDENBORG. 1 vol. 32mo, pp. 132, price $1.

 Ask for the "Gem Edition."

ALSO, THIRD EDITION

DEUS HOMO (God-Man).

By Professor PARSONS, of Cambridge. 1 vol. crown 8vo, pp. 455, price $2 50.

THIRD EDITION.

AUTHENTICITY OF THE GOSPELS.

1 vol. 16mo, pp. 110, price $1 25.

CHARLES SCRIBNER & CO., New York.

E. B. MYERS & CHANDLER, PUBLISHERS, Chicago.

NOW READY,

THE FIRST NUMBER OF

THE NEW ECLECTIC,

Containing the Choicest Articles from all the Reviews and Magazines of the day:

ENGLISH,
CONTINENTAL,
AND AMERICAN,

on matters Political, Social, Religious, Scientific, etc.

BRILLIANT, VIGOROUS, HIGH-TONED, ENTERTAINING, OF PERMANENT VALUE.

The opening chapters of a NEW NOVEL, by ANTHONY TROLLOPE, to be continued.

Reviews of the most important new publications—

A MISCELLANY OF NOTES—
LITERARY,
ARTISTIC,
HUMOROUS, etc.

Subscription price, $4 per annum, for over 1,500 pages of valuable standard reading, and handsome typography.

Agents wanted everywhere.

LAWRENCE TURNBULL,
FRIDGE MURDOCH, } Editors and Proprietors.

For Sale by the American News Company and Newsagents generally.

RARE AND CURIOUS BOOKS.

CATALOGUE of a CHOICE COLLECTION of RARE, CURIOUS, and VALUABLE BOOKS, in various languages and departments of literature. Sent gratis to any address on application to the publishers—GEO. F. PHILES & Co., 172 Fulton St., N. Y.

TO PARENTS AND GUARDIANS.

An English University man, of established reputation as a Classical Scholar, College Tutor, and Author, desires to obtain as pupils two or three youths of talent and ambition, willing to undergo a course of training that may fit them to win Scholarships and Prizes at Oxford (Eng.) sufficient to defray their expenses there. Many young men of quite limited means were so trained by him formerly in England with complete success, and are now either Fellows of their Colleges or Rectors of Parishes; and he does not see why he should not succeed equally well with American pupils if they will only submit implicitly to his instruction and guidance. Many of the most eminent clergy of New York will endorse his English testimonials as to his success as a University Honor Tutor. Address "D. C. L.," box 419, P. O., Brooklyn.

The Nation.

VOL. VI.—NO. 133. THURSDAY, JANUARY 16, 1868. { Five Dollars per Annum. Twelve Cents per Copy.

CONTENTS.

The Week 41

Editorial Articles:

Congress and the Supreme Court.... 44
The Soldier..... 45
The Judge..... 46
The Leading Facts of Mr. Wells's Report 47
"Flippancy"..... 48
Paris Gossip..... 49

Notes:

Literary..... 50
Confucius..... 52
Father Lacordaire..... 53
Recent Republications..... 55

Fine Arts:

Pictures at Bowdoin College..... 56
Ticknor & Fields's Lithographic Portrait of Dickens..... 56

Five Dollars per annum, in advance; Six months, Three Dollars; Forty Dollars to Clubs of Ten; Clergymen, Four Dollars.

The Nation is sent till positively ordered discontinued, and all arrears have been paid. Subscribers are particularly requested to note the expiration of their subscriptions, and to forward what is due for the ensuing year, with or without further reminder from this office.

George Street, 30 Cornhill, London, E. C., Agent for the Receipt of Subscriptions and Advertisements.

E. L. GODKIN & CO., PUBLISHERS, 130 NASSAU STREET, N. Y.

The Week.

There is, as we write, and as well as we can make out, a widespread feeling of anxiety about the political future. Gold has gone up eight per cent. within a week, and most people have a feeling that something is going to happen of a serious character in the financial world—inflation, repudiation, they do not know well what. Moreover, most people feel that we are rapidly approaching a crisis in the reconstruction question which will produce a decisive result. The bill, passed through the House on Monday, forbidding anything less than two-thirds of the Supreme Court to pronounce a law unconstitutional, is a direct challenge to the court as well as to Mr. Johnson, as it is believed that five out of the nine judges believe the Reconstruction act unconstitutional. We should prefer—and we believe that the country would prefer—that Congress should wait for the court to take the first steps toward a conflict of authority, inasmuch as that conflict may never come; and the tone of the debate on the bill in the House was anything but reassuring. There is no denying the fact that the majority in Congress does not possess the confidence of the party now as it did a year ago, and that, whenever it prepares to fire off a gun against the rebels, the "weak-kneed" members of the party run behind trees and walls. We may share Mr. Stevens's contempt for these "cowardly" brethren; but we cannot forget, as he apparently does, that they all have votes, and that they have at least courage enough to cast them, and that their ballots count for as much as those of the most lion-hearted of us all. We have discussed the Supreme Court controversy elsewhere. It is a fine thing as a display of courage, we admit, but we doubt its value as a piece of political tactics: "c'est magnifique; mais ce n'est pas la guerre." We hope we are mistaken, and, if it turns out well, promise to sing the praises of Messrs. Bingham and Boutwell most heartily, and to acknowledge their superior wisdom without flinching.

The Senate has declined to concur in Mr. Stanton's removal, and he has accordingly gone back to his place. Mr. Johnson will acquiesce with the best grace he can muster. On the propriety of the Senate's course few Republicans will have much difficulty in agreeing, though the public satisfaction at the result would, of course, have been greater if less mischief had not resulted from Mr. Stanton's removal than was generally anticipated at the time it took place. He could hardly have done anything at the War Department which Grant left undone, but the effect of his restoration on the South will doubtless be excellent.

On Wednesday last, neither the Senate nor the House did anything of special interest or importance. On Thursday, the Senate passed a bill intended to do something towards stopping "whiskey frauds;" it forbids the removal of whiskey from any warehouse, for any purpose whatsoever, until the full amount of the Government tax shall be paid—which seems a not particularly valuable addition to the whiskey legislation as it stands on the books at present. In the House, on the same day, there was unanimous passage of resolutions requesting the President to interpose his official influence for the release of American citizens confined in Great Britain and Ireland, and, having done this, the question of whiskey frauds was discussed, and the bill above-mentioned passed. On Friday, whiskey-metres were the theme of debate in the House; and in the Senate there was discussion of the bill to prevent further contraction of the currency. Saturday, also, was an uninteresting day. In the House, Mr. Ward, of New York, made a set speech against the minority report of the Judiciary Committee in the matter of impeachment, and Mr. Baldwin argued against Mr. Brooks's theory, that the negro is naturally inferior to the white man. On Monday, the House passed the bill declaring what shall constitute a majority of the Supreme Court—a bill passed for the sake of that section which provides that two-thirds of all the members of the Court must concur in any decision adverse to the validity of any law of Congress. The new Reconstruction bill was also read twice and recommitted. The Senate, on Monday, by a vote of 25 to 6, reinstated Mr. Stanton as Secretary of War. On Tuesday, the Senate discussed, without result, financial matters, and the House resumed consideration of the reconstruction question.

The case of McCardle, which apparently has frighted the House from its propriety, is, in brief, this: McCardle is the editor of the Vicksburg Times, and as he was afflicted with the common fault of editors south of the Potomac, of not being nearly strong enough to hold his tongue wholly or, indeed, in any tolerable degree, General Ord had him arrested, on a charge of publishing libels on officers of the Freedmen's Bureau, and of inciting to a breach of the public peace. Then, too, he published articles which it was alleged were intended to intimidate loyal voters, and to hinder the reconstruction of Mississippi. He was brought before a military commission for trial, but application having been made in his behalf for a writ of habeas corpus, he was produced in the United States District Court, Judge Hill on the bench, and, after argument heard, was remanded to the custody of General Ord's deputy, General Gillem. Appeal was at once taken from this decision, and it seems to be the general expectation that the Supreme Court will speedily pronounce upon the case. We do not know if in this matter he is so reliable as he generally is, but the Washington correspondent of the Boston Advertiser asserts that in the ordinary course of business the case cannot be reached in less than two years.

There is a bill before Congress for the erection of the whole South into one military district, under the exclusive control of Grant, and the total overthrow of the existing State governments. This is the answer to Hancock's performances in Louisiana, and the ridiculous endorsement of them by the President, as well as to various removals and changes of one sort or other made by the latter. To this measure, if it had been brought in and passed a year ago, there would not be a word to be said; but it is in reality the third amendment of the Reconstruction bill, and is, therefore, calculated to bring that bill and its authors into disrepute with the public for incompetency and haste. For this reason only, we should have been glad to see it let alone as long as it worked even tolerably well; and that it is working tolerably well nobody disputes. No act will work any better under all the circumstances. The real impediment all along has not been the conduct of the Southern State governments or of the military commanders, but the temper of the Southern whites. No legislation will change or improve this, particularly as long as Mr. Johnson is in the Presidential chair; and it has been proved that he cannot or will not offer any greater obstacle to reconstruction than he has already done. The passage of the new bill will, therefore, we fear, unsettle the public mind both at the North and South, and weaken the authority of the Congressional leaders without sensibly improving the machinery of reconstruction. General Meade's removal of Governor Jenkins, of Georgia, shows that he will do his duty in his new post.

The inflationists take a good deal of comfort from the refusal of the Senate to pledge itself against expansion, and their hopes are still further strengthened by sinister rumors from the Senate Finance Committee. Moreover, the grand plan of paying off debts with the debtors' "notes" seems to be finding favor with Republicans out West. We believe there has been no time within the last fifty years when it could be so safely said that "republican government is on its trial." Should the repudiationists carry the day, and particularly should they attempt the transparent humbug of paying the public debt in greenbacks, what we shall have gained by the war will be the reputation of being the most muscular and longest-winded, most ingenious and barefaced of the great historical knaves. The greenback scheme far surpasses the old mediæval plan of adulterating and clipping the coinage, just as printing surpasses writing. The attitude of the New York Tribune on this matter is one which it is impossible not to admire and derive hope from, as it circulates more than most other papers in the infected districts, and has never treated any subject with greater force and clearness and courage.

How far anything legislation can do is from reaching the bottom of the Southern difficulty was well displayed the other day in Mrs. Martin's card in the Mobile papers, asking the public to "suspend its judgment" with regard to the conduct of her husband in attempting to murder Judge Busteed in cold blood in the street, in the most brutal and cowardly manner, he (Martin) being the district attorney, or, in other words, the official prosecutor of criminals. He approached the judge unawares, shot him, and continued to fire at him coolly after he fell. His wife now writes to the papers, with much feeling and perfect simplicity, asking people not to condemn Mr. Martin before they know all the circumstances, and gives us to understand that Judge Busteed had been intriguing against Martin to get him out of his place. This may be true. It is true that Martin was under prosecution himself for malfeasance, but neither of the charges has anything in it very surprising. What is remarkable in the affair is the condition of Southern morality, as illustrated in the frank avowal by a woman of education and position of her belief that the public will agree with her in thinking that unhandsome conduct on the part of a judge will justify the public prosecutor in assassinating him in the street in daylight. Moreover, we have not the slightest doubt that her confidence is well-founded, and that a majority of the Southern people would concede that behavior on the part of the judge which in other parts of the world would simply lead to a mere hostility of feeling was sufficient to justify his murder. The occasional glimpses that one gets, through such incidents as this, into the working of the Southern mind, we confess dishearten us far more as to the future than any stories we hear of disorders arising out of mere political feeling. The moral condition of a community is never so hopeless as when there is a wide interval between its highest moral rule and the one in daily use. A Malay may assassinate freely and yet be a very good fellow; but when a Christian assassinates freely, and his fellow-Christians do not think the worse of him for it, the case is one which puzzles the most ardent reformer. In what does the moral condition of a society in which such a man as Martin grows up differ materially from that in which Milo killed Clodius? The South differs from all other civilized communities in the modern world in having carried its mental and political and religious training far beyond the point at which nations usually acquire a profound respect for human life. A Southerner would listen with the deepest interest and deepest sympathy to an exposition of Christian doctrine from any Northern or English divine, and would outdo a man of any civilized state in the fervor of his adhesion to the great principles of political ethics; but you would not be surprised to hear that he had the same day killed his man treacherously and in cold blood. There is in this a deeper difficulty for legislators than we are yet fully aware of.

General Butler has gone "down among the Moors," as the song says, and has been making a speech to the Virginian freedmen at Richmond, by whom he was enthusiastically received. He began with a sketch of the history of the Government from 1789, and got down rapidly to the late war and emancipation, the effects of which on the status of the blacks he described with great force and clearness. He declared confiscation to be impracticable, and undesirable if practicable—admitting, what we had the honor to maintain a year ago at some cost, that farms which cost nothing were worth nothing, and that, if land-grants were made to the negroes, they would probably be of as little use to them as the land-grants made to white soldiers in the West. But he warned the holders of the great estates that they must be broken up, and advised them to anticipate the action of legislative authority by themselves selling out small lots, either for money or labor, to the colored people about them—a suggestion which we also had the honor to make early last summer, and which we are glad to have reproduced in General Butler's nervous language, and before those whom it most concerns. The speech was, on the whole, excellent—full of good sense and good feeling, expressed plainly and forcibly, and, we are sure, did good.

We have been for nearly two years considerably in advance of certain of our Radical brethren on divers topics of importance, so much so as at times to feel our position lonely and exposed, and have often longed for them to take a "leap ahead," as Mr. Wade says, and join us. We are, therefore, very much gratified to find them, one by one, catching up to us. They have all reached us on the impeachment question. Mr. Stevens and Mr. Butler have had a hard struggle with confiscation, but have at last got through, and are now fairly abreast of us on this also. There was perhaps no point, however, on which we were for a long while so wildly advanced as on the necessity of education to the voter. There was for a year or two such a singular unanimity amongst the leading Radicals as to the entire worthlessness of education to the colored voter at least, that we used to express our desire to see him provided with it, as necessary to the proper use of the franchise, with some timidity. On this line we have for some time past heard a good deal of puffing and blowing behind us, as if somebody were coming in hot haste, but we never dreamed of its being Mr. Wendell Phillips. And yet it was he. He caught up with us last week in the Anti-Slavery Standard, demanding, with his accustomed energy, education from the general Government as the only means of meeting the horrible consequences of Grant's election. We do not despair yet of being overtaken on the question of the propriety of discussing public measures in Congress, and the value of early education to statesmen.

Some persons occasionally write to us to complain of the irreverent way in which we speak of Congressional legislation, and the airs of superior wisdom we seem to assume. But we will cite two incidents which will, we think, prove clearly that one may be very modest and yet laugh often and laugh heartily over some of the things done at Washington. One is, that under the existing law, passed a year or two ago, if you let a man a house, and he starts without your knowledge or consent an illicit distillery in it, your house and ground are liable to confiscation. We can think of nothing which can well be compared to this except the practice in which the Turkish pashas at one time indulged, of making people on whom they levied contributions pay a tax, by way of compensating them for the wear and tear of their teeth in eating their tough meat. The other incident we find in Mr. Wells's report, and we commend it to the attention of the reformers, clergymen, and others who will have it that drinking can be taxed or policed out of existence. The present tax on whiskey is two dollars a gallon; "cowardly" people have always insisted that such a tax could not be collected, and would promote drunkenness instead of diminishing it. Now hear Mr. Wells:

"In the Eighth Collection District of the State of New York there was, before the Internal Revenue law went into operation in 1862, but one distillery; when the tax of twenty cents was imposed, some five or six additional distilleries were started. When at sixty cents, about one dozen were in operation; but this number under the $2 tax increased to about forty. Furthermore, the tax collected in one distillery in this same district in one month in 1864, under the sixty cents tax, was one-third more than was paid in the aggregate by thirty distilleries in the eight months succeeding November 4, 1864, when the tax was $2; or, in other words, one distillery in one month in 1864 paid $58,819 at sixty cents per gallon, while thirty distilleries in eight months of 1866–67, paid at $2 per gallon only $33,664."

Mr. James Brooks is really a little too bad. He deserves to have his poetry reprinted from the "Poets and Poetry of America." The days of the years of man's life are no more than threescore and ten, and the Saturdays are only thirty-six hundred and forty, more or less, and Saturday last, in the House, was in great part taken up by a speech from Mr. Baldwin, of Massachusetts, "contradicting the statements of Mr. Brooks on the inferiority of the negro race." Of course there is no good excuse for Mr. Baldwin; but as for Mr. Brooks, he is a most hardened offender; he is continually biting the heel of the African; every Saturday he is, as Mr. Squeers might say, "laying into" the black man's tibiæ, and pulling his hair, and proving that he was not Dido, but that Carthage was settled by white citizens or Indians not taxed, and that Jamaica exports less sugar than she did when half the inhabitants were peeling the skin in short strips off the backs of the other half—getting sugar from two canes. He is wanton, too, in his inflictions; it is not done for buncombe; his constituents have always neglected the reading of the Globe, and other printed matter. The House is the judge of the qualifications of its own members; and we submit that a man who through his misfortune or his fault has formed an incurable habit of making speeches on the anatomy of the negro and his place in nature, ought to be expelled. Or, if the gentleman's fellow-members are disinclined to be harsh, we suggest that some representative who understands the previous question should force a vote without delay on the question, whether or not the negro as at present existing in these States is more Democrat or Old Line Whig or of African blood; and, secondly, whether or not he is to be assumed to be, in a Pickwickian sense, and for parliamentary purposes, the equal or inferior or superior of the white man. It would just now be particularly well if this question could be got out of the way. Mr. Brooks does not, but the country very particularly does, want the Republican party to say what is to be its policy for the next year; and as soon as we have it settled in some satisfactory way just where the negro race belongs in the scale of races, we shall stand one more chance of getting a Republican platform.

A new party is announced as having recently been formed in this city. It is designated as the "I. P. P.," which letters stand for the words "Independent Progressive Party." The declaration of principles is already made, and it is declared that only such candidates as can make profession of faith in them will be supported by the party in the next and future national elections. Of these principles the chief are as follows: 1. "A moderate tariff based on the principle of equalization"—that is, we suppose, a tariff of which the burdens are imposed justly on the various branches of industry; 2. "A progressive"—graduated, we suppose—"income tax, exempting the poor;" 3. "Conversion of the Government loans into one debt with low rate of interest;" 4. "No coercive or prohibitory Sunday laws;" 5. "A general obligatory system of education;" 6. "The establishment of an Executive to be elected by Congress, and separation of the political and military authority now vested in that office;" 7. "Reconstruction on the base of the measures inaugurated by Congress." We are informed by a member of this new organization that it has been formed inside the North American Turnerbund; and how important the Bund is may be judged by certain figures which he gives us: The money invested in "Turnerhallen" amounts to $441,300; and if the debts of the one hundred and eighteen clubs be deducted from this amount and the value of their libraries, gymnastic apparatus, and other property added to it, we find that the total wealth of the Bundes-Vereine is represented by the respectable sum of $401,761. Scattered as they are throughout the country, liked by their fellow-countrymen, of rather more than average intelligence, the political influence of the members of the "I. P. P." is not to be despised.

The armaments continue in Europe on a scale which promises to ruin every state in it except perhaps Prussia, which has beyond any other the knack of making war cheap, as far as mere outlay in money is concerned. Russia is increasing her land force at a rate which bids fair to raise it before long to more than two millions of men; and as she is now the only really aggressive state in the world—the only one which is known to cherish great schemes of territorial aggrandizement—she, of course, forces the others to follow suit. What the effect is may be guessed from the fact cited in Mr. Wells's report—that the French debt has increased 130 per cent. in the last thirteen years, with hardly any increase of population. The Austrian debt has increased 108 per cent. in eighteen years. The Italian debt has increased in the last six years 158 per cent. The Russian ratio of increase Mr. Wells does not give, but she has an annual deficit of about $50,000,000, and the debt steadily grows. Even Prussia has now a deficit, though comparatively a small one. The cause of all this is, of course, the enormous size of their standing armies, which, beside their cost in wages and supplies, by the abstraction of labor from the community diminish greatly its tax-paying power. Moreover, there is probably very little of the old love of warlike aggression left in the breasts of any European population. They are generally now devoted to the quest of material comforts, and moral and mental improvement. The fears and susceptibility and sense of honor which keep up the great armies are those of the monarchs towards one another, and the whole military system is part and parcel of the system of "personal government," as it is called. The hopelessness about the future which this creates amongst the laboring classes may be fairly expected to stimulate emigration to this country.

The foreign news this week contains nothing of much interest. The English are still busy with Fenianism, the French with their army bill, and the Italians with the formation of a ministry. The King of Prussia has written a cordial letter to Louis Napoleon, which is looked upon on the Bourse as a sign of peace, and has sent the funds up. The only point in the political sky which now looks threatening is Turkey. Russia is savage and indefatigable. She is building fortifications at Kertch, which is a little further from Constantinople than Sebastopol, but will make a better naval station, and escapes the operation of the treaty of Paris. Meanwhile, her agents are working amongst the Greeks and Bulgarians, and the Porte, growing thoroughly frightened, has begun to roar for help, and promises amendment. Lord Stanley, it is said, has accordingly sent a remonstrance to its aid, though the latest telegrams pronounce this untrue. If untrue, the probability is that the story arose out of his having remonstrated with Servia on her military preparations. But no amendment is possible except on paper. The Government is rotten. The latest report on the Turkish debt to the English holders described it as a funny farce; the coupons are not paid, no provision of any kind made for them, no apology offered, and no sinking fund or anything like it created. In fact, a parcel of Christian boys would manage finance twice as well.

Articles on any of the subjects usually discussed in this journal will be received from any quarter. If used, they will be liberally paid for; if rejected, they will be returned to the writers on the receipt of the requisite amount of postage stamps.

All Communications which pertain to the literary management of THE NATION should be addressed to the Editor.

CONGRESS AND THE SUPREME COURT.

A BILL was passed in the House on Monday last providing that six judges shall be necessary to constitute a quorum of the Supreme Court, and that the concurrence of two-thirds of the members of the whole court shall be necessary to pronounce a decision, in any case pending before it, against the validity of any law of Congress. The proximate cause of this legislation is well known to be the report—we presume well-founded—that five judges of the court hold the Reconstruction act to be unconstitutional. The object of the present measure is, therefore, to secure the act, and all others of a similar nature, against an adverse judicial decision, and it has been passed in the House by a party vote. Whatever we may think of the wisdom or constitutionality of the proceeding, too many calm and able men, including a large number of lawyers, have voted for it, to allow us to treat the result with anything but consideration and respect. We say this in the teeth of the fact that the debate previous to the vote was anything but calm or judicial in its tone, and, considering the excited state of the public mind, very unlikely to inspire confidence out of doors. The bill is one of the gravest that ever came before Congress, and yet the principal speech in support of it—Mr. Bingham's—was a violent harangue, very largely made up of coarse abuse of the court. Unless "the citizens of the Republic who keep watch at the gates of the morning, and the citizens of the Republic who keep watch at the going down of the sun," as he grandiloquently calls the people of the United States, have greatly changed within a very few months, we venture to assert that it is not by rhetoric of this sort their approval can be won for changes of such moment as this bill covers.

We admit fully—we have done so more than once already—that any interference of the Supreme Court with the process of reconstruction, as Congress is carrying it on, would be legislation, and legislation of the highest order, no matter by what name it was called. Clothing it in the form of a judicial decision would not alter its character. It would be in reality the assumption by the court—nay, by five members of the court acting under no responsibility to the country—of power to decide on what terms and conditions peace should be made between the parties to one of the bloodiest and most extensive wars on record. Nothing could make an act of this sort anything but a political act. There would not be enough law in it to give it even the faintest odor of a judicial decision. It would be absurd to suppose that anybody would be imposed upon by its being called a "judgment," and by the production of a plaintiff and defendant to support it. Moreover, nothing can be more certain than that the founders of the Government never dreamed of the court playing any such part. They acknowledged that for such a convulsion as we have just passed through, for an armed attempt on the part of a great combination of States to overthrow the Government, they could neither make provision nor offer counsel. We may be sure that, if they allowed themselves at all to foreshadow the course or consequences of such a conflict, they never contemplated the possibility of the Supreme Court framing the treaty of peace; for this is what the interference of the court in this matter of reconstruction really would mean. It has already held the war with the rebels to be a regular territorial war, attended with all the incidents of a conflict with an alien enemy. If, after this, it were to step in and say what Congress might not do, by way of restoring peace and order, it would be tantamount to the drafting of a treaty of peace—an act in all respects political, and in no way judicial. We have, therefore, always hoped and believed that the court would resist all attempts to drag it into the affair, would declare at the outset that the force and validity of acts of Congress passed for the political reorganization of the South were subjects outside its jurisdiction. We hope and believe this still. In regulating the relations of co-ordinate branches of a constitutional government, something must be left to men's prudence and patriotism.

While, therefore, we cannot greatly blame the majority in Congress—in fact, we do not take upon ourselves to blame them at all—for desiring to take precautions against the assumption by the court of legislative powers, under judicial forms, there are certain objections to the bill now before them which, if we may judge from the report of the debate, either have not occurred to them or have very little weight with them. One of these, and the principal one, is suggested by the citation as a precedent, by Mr. Bingham, of the original Judiciary act of 1789, under the administration of Washington, which required four out of the five judges to constitute a quorum. Now, it is absurd to cite past legislation to prove the expediency of proposed legislation, without taking into account the circumstances of the time at which it was passed as well as the terms of the law. The original Judiciary act was passed in a time of profound peace. It was framed by cool jurists on general principles. It was not a party measure at all; it was not intended to meet a temporary exigency. It was not intended to form a court for the purpose of one year or one case, but for all cases and all coming time. To produce it, therefore, as a precedent for the bill now before Congress, is a piece of sophistry by which few people will be deceived, no matter with how much spray of words Mr. Bingham may cover it. Moreover, making a certain number necessary to form a quorum is a very different thing from making a certain proportion of the members of a court necessary to pronounce a particular decision on one side of a particular kind of question.

Another objection made to the present bill by the World we consider a very grave one. We quote the World because we make it a point, in discussing matters of this kind, to consider the force of arguments rather than the source from which they come, although we know that many good people consider this a dangerous and pernicious operation. This objection is that inasmuch as the validity of acts of Congress must always, or nearly always, come before the court, in controversies between private individuals about property, if you make the votes of six judges necessary to set a law aside, while three can maintain its validity, you give the party whose rights are created by it double the advantage you give him whose rights are infringed by it; whereas all suitors ought to come before a court of justice, and do come before all courts of justice the world over, on an equal footing, as far at least as the organization of the court is concerned. If, to make good my case, I have to secure six votes, while my adversary, to make good his, has only to secure three, one scale of justice is made heavier than the other. The Supreme Court, it must be remembered, is not a council for revising legislation—it is a judicial tribunal.

Another great objection is, that it is an attempt by a party vote—the party being one which has just been defeated in an appeal to the country—and at a time of great excitement, and for a temporary purpose, and with the view of affecting a particular decision, to change the constitution of the highest judicial tribunal in the country. We will grant freely, if desired, that the proposed change is in general desirable. We will grant that the past conduct of the court shows that Congress requires additional bulwarks against possible judicial partisanship. If the measure were brought forward by competent men in quiet times, and after mature deliberation, we doubt if we should have a word to say against it. But it is brought forward by persons whom half the legal voters at the North consider eager partisans; it is supported in speeches of extreme violence; it is not denied that it is intended to meet a temporary exigency. Does any intelligent man suppose legislation of this kind will stand; that there is any political party in the country strong enough in the confidence of the people to support the burden of it? Is not this a game at which two can play? Are we sure of always having a Republican majority in Congress? Are we sure of having one three years hence? What is to hinder a Democratic majority from repealing this act and doctoring the court so as to make it swallow acts of its own, which, unlike the Reconstruction bill, will have neither the rights of man nor of woman nor any other good thing for their object? Would it be possible for the worst enemy of the country to devise a more effective instrument for putting us to shame and confusion than a high court of justice in which the judges were rearranged and divided every two or three years by party votes so as to secure their approval of certain measures, the constitutional presumption that they will pronounce on the validity of acts of Congress, as on all other things, without fear or favor being turned into a legal fiction and made the laughing-stock of bar-room politicians?

Moreover, however much we may sympathize with the objects Congress has in view, however much we may desire to have reconstruction completed in its way, we are compelled to recognize the fact—the most glaring fact of history and human nature—that there are limits to the powers of legislation; that there are things it cannot accomplish; that, in all good political work, much, often what is most necessary to success, must be left to Providence, to time, to the growth of popular good sense, to the slow action of public opinion, and to the patriotism and moderation of public officers.

THE SOLDIER.

In putting down a few of the thoughts which suggest themselves to us on seeing the greater and greater distinctness with which General Grant and Chief-Justice Chase appear on the scene as the two candidates between whom the Republican party will be expected to choose at the approaching nomination for the Presidency, we have not the smallest intention of making a contribution to the literature of the coming "campaign." We cannot help feeling that from the public character and career of the two men, as we all know them, one or two lessons may be drawn of considerable value to the community, no matter which finds favor in the eyes of the Convention—the more valuable because they are perhaps, each in his walk, the most distinguished men between whose claims to its confidence any party has ever had to decide.

The only unfitness for the Presidency in Grant which has been discovered thus far, and which can be called radical, irremovable, is that he is a soldier; and a very skilful letter from Washington, published in the New York Tribune, of which we spoke last week, and which probably expressed the sentiments of the chief of Grant's opponents, put this objection forward in striking terms, and cited Andrew Jackson's behavior in office in support of it. It is not Jackson's case, however, which suggests this objection. It is only by stretching the term more than it will bear that Jackson can be called a soldier at all. His military service was very brief—too brief to affect in any perceptible degree his character or tone of mind. Whatever there was about him that savored of the camp—his arbitrary temper, his impatience of opposition, his unscrupulousness in the pursuit of his ends, his contempt for the slow processes of law—he derived not from education, but from nature; or, if he learnt them at all, he learnt them not in the army, but in a very much worse school—Tennessean court-houses and plantations in days when Tennessean life wore only the thinnest possible varnish of civilization.

The objection to Grant is really inspired by European traditions, and, like a large number of European traditions—though, we admit, not all, by any means—that which disqualifies a successful soldier for the chief office of a republic is singularly inapplicable to his case. There are three great historical examples of the overthrow of free governments under the blows of the commanders of their own armies, but in every one of them society had been prepared for the catastrophe by a long process of decay and disorganization, or by a combination of circumstances which made free government impossible. When Rome fell before Cæsar, the spirit of republicanism had fled, and there had grown up a large army, hardened in foreign conquests, utterly ignorant and indifferent to the forms of law, and to which there was no other force in the state capable of offering the least resistance. When Cromwell turned Parliament out of doors, it had become clear that the republican spirit had broken out before its time, and was seeking to establish itself in a community in which the feudal ideas and manners were still full of life. The facility with which Napoleon accomplished the coup d'état of the Dixhuit Brumaire was due to the same cause as most other French misfortunes—five hundred years of absolute monarchy, and the concentration of the national brain in the capital. There would be abundant reason for dreading the elevation of a soldier to the Presidential chair here if he were to be surrounded by the social or political phenomena in the midst of which soldiers in other ages and nations have destroyed public liberty; but these are almost all wanting. Our case is not made sufficiently like the case of the Romans or French or English to enable us to take warning from their example. To object to a candidate simply because he is a soldier, is like the old lady's objection to having a gun handled, although she was assured it was not loaded. "Loaded or unloaded," said she, "it may go off."

But may not the practice of putting soldiers in high office, simply because they have done good service in the field, and although they have given no evidence of political skill or experience, become a dangerous one? May it not even, in states in which there is nothing, or next to nothing, for a lawless or ambitious temper to work upon, beget at last an insidious indifference to the political qualities of public servants, and an insidious contentment with military capacity only? We admit that it may; but there are circumstances in Grant's case which seem to us not only likely to make an exception in his favor harmless, but beneficial. We think, we honestly confess, that he has rendered and is rendering a service to the country, by his manner of performing his duties now, hardly inferior in permanent value to that which he rendered it in putting down the rebellion in the field, and it is a service which furnishes a better guarantee of future efficiency than ten thousand speeches and the same number of votes.

He is not a perfect being. He is not a man of the golden age, or a knight of the "great order of the Table Round." He is, perhaps, not a statesman in the strict sense of the word, or perhaps in the highest sense of the word; has probably but little store of the acquisitions which a statesman ought to have. But, unless we greatly err, he has that thing which of all others the times most need, and which the rising generation ought most diligently to seek after.

Nobody who observes public men carefully but must notice the widespread disposition there is amongst them to serve their country and their species in a large, vague way rather than in one way narrow and well-defined, to seek remote and haze-covered ends rather than near and clear ones, to gaze into the "illimitable perspective" rather than down upon the dusty highway which stretches out before their feet. There are few of us in any walk of life who do not prefer working generally for eternal justice and eternal truth to plodding eight or ten hours a day in an office or a committee-room. When one is engaged simply in upholding what Carlyle calls the "eternal verities," one is neither tied to time nor to place, and as the end of one's task is infinitely remote, it would be useless to display great diligence or great haste. We would any of us far sooner labor for the elevation of the entire negro race than devote ourselves to the elevation of one negro family. We are unwilling to believe that we can possibly be doing as much for the nation in faithfully appraising goods at the custom-house or faithfully inspecting whiskey casks as Jones is, who every night makes the roof tremble with his expositions of the rights of man or his scathing exposures of the frailties of "the party in power." So, also, it will be found that despots always prefer being responsible "to God and their own conscience," as they say, for the use they make of their power, to being responsible to any collection of human beings; and the average politician in a democracy, while never tired of acknowledging his accountability to "the people," hates to be held accountable to a governor or a president or a court of justice or any concrete representative of the people.

Now, the lesson of Grant's life is that this is a mistake on our part; that, wherever we are placed, we are doing our highest and best political work when we are doing the work nearest at hand and to which we have been specially assigned; that there is no such servant of the country as he who keeps his mind steadily fixed on what he knows to be his business. When Grant took command of a regiment at the outbreak of the war, he did nothing but command it to the best of his ability. When he got command of an army, he did nothing and thought of nothing but commanding an army. When he was made commander-in-chief, he gave his mind to the duties of that office and to nothing else. He kept his gaze fixed on his books, papers, and reports, instead of taking surveys of the country and the world, or getting up "views', on reconstruction or universal suffrage. Being a soldier, he tried to be the best kind of soldier simply, and not a mongrel politician, with newspapers, documents, and drafts of speeches sticking out of the pockets of a uniform coat. What temptations an American soldier has to resist who pursues this course, we may infer from the example of General McClellan. When that unlucky personage found himself driven back on Harrison's Landing, after those awful days of July, 1862, with an army perishing by inches in his hands, the nation looking on in agony, and the world in suspense, with every inducement that was ever applied to a human being urging him to concentrate all his faculties on the dreadful game before him, he retired to his tent and wrote out, for Mr. Lincoln's edification, his "views" on the state of the country—old "views," too, with which he had probably been crammed a month previously by New York politicians. It was one of the most ludicrous incidents in military history, but there was nevertheless something very pathetic about it. It meant not that he wilfully neglected his own work to meddle in other people's, but that, being weak-brained and overmatched, he turned readily for relief to one of the commonest indulgences of the day. It was so pleasant and easy to show Mr. Lincoln on paper how to govern the country at large; so hard to withstand the terrible Lee and his rebels on the other side of the hill. And he made his account by it. A large portion of the public hailed it as a lucky stroke, and the Harrison's Landing letter became a "state paper."

Merivale, in talking of the corruption of Roman society in the days of the empire, presents, as one of the great redeeming features, "the constant succession of brave, patient, resolute, and faithful soldiers—men deeply impressed with the sense of duty, superior to vanity, despisers of boasting, content to live in obscurity and shed their blood at the frontiers of the empire, unrepining at the cold mistrust of their masters, not clamorous for the honors so sparingly awarded them, but satisfied in the daily work of their hands, and full of faith in the national destiny which they were daily accomplishing." No modern army is wanting in such men; our army is certainly not wanting in them. Thousands of such were in its ranks during the late war, and they served with a purer zeal and a nobler hope than the soldiers of the ancient world ever knew. We do not despair of seeing the day when we shall have a civil service, too, which will create and foster this type of character. But few have hitherto proved able to resist the corroding action of the political atmosphere. Fewer have been able to look at the Presidency, or even a governorship or senatorship, as a possible prize without flinging reserve and dignity and sobriety to the winds, without despising "the daily work of their hands," and giving themselves over, body and soul, to any clique of charlatans or speculators who chose to constitute themselves their "political friends." Let us be thankful for the spectacle which Grant affords us of a man really great and genuinely American; a son of the soil, if ever there was one, who, conscious of merit, knows how to wait in silence and at his post for his reward, and, whether it comes or not, is satisfied with his share in working out the national destiny.

THE JUDGE.

THERE can be little question amongst thinking men—there has for thirty years at least been little question—that the establishment of the Supreme Court of the United States was a very important contribution to civilization. It has not, it is true, worked any striking change in modern society, and is perhaps only the germ of something better. But this it has done—it has brought under the regular, systematized control of law, not by theocratic pretensions like the Papacy, and not by conquest like the English Privy Council or House of Lords, a greater extent and variety of weighty human interests than have ever before been submitted to a judicial tribunal. It has pushed the dominion of reason into fields over which it never before exercised any sway, and has accustomed large and quasi-independent communities to abide by legal decisions in the regulation of some of their most important concerns. The Papacy tried to play this part in the Middle Ages, and it did play it to such an extent as the material and moral condition of the world permitted; but its jurisdiction was based on faith, and its decisions were enforced by supernatural sanctions. The Supreme Court rests, like all other modern political institutions, on secular foundations—the popular respect for order, for security, for logic, for opinion. In a very few years its writs will run over a greater area than the decrees of any potentate that ever existed, and it will hear the appeals of a more highly civilized and complex society than any tribunal, lay or ecclesiastical, of which history makes any mention. Supposing no greater calamity to overwhelm us, it is difficult to avoid the expectation that its success will do much to hasten the consummation for which so many generations of philanthropists and philosophers have sighed in vain—the submission to aregularly constituted tribunal of all disputes which are now usually decided by the sword.

The court has not lately been in favor with the public. Like so many other sacred and venerable things, it was prostituted in the service of slavery. Of all the foul and foolish deeds of which the pro-slavery zealots were guilty, there was not one for which the civilized world ought to owe them such a grudge as their dragging the court into the arena as the champion of their philosophy. The Dred Scott decision was not simply an offence against "free society;" it was an offence against all civilized society. It weakened that faith in the possibility of a human tribunal raised above even the fierce passions of great bodies of men, which the court during sixty honored years had been slowly but surely building up, and which, whenever it becomes firmly established, will seal one of the great fountains of human misery. The reconstruction crisis found its authority shaken, and a large portion of its prestige gone, in the presence of a majority whose will had been strengthened, passions roused, and impatience stimulated by four years of bloody war. All thoughtful men watched its course a year ago with considerable anxiety, lest it should, in false confidence in its strength, ruin what remained of its influence in trying to adjust questions which, whether it had jurisdiction over them or not, it was impossible to expect the Northern people, after all that had happened, to submit to its decision. They would not have submitted them to Moses and the prophets had they risen from the dead. Courts may prevent nations drawing the sword; but when once the sword has been drawn and blood spilt, they are visionaries who ask the victor to come to the bar, with his wounds still open, and plead as if he had suffered nothing, risked nothing, and won nothing. The court showed the highest wisdom in putting from it the dangerous task of deciding what it was that half a million of men had just died for, and we trust it will continue to show its wisdom in the same way.

Its recent decline in popular estimation, however, so far from making the office of judge in it an office to be lightly assumed and lightly laid aside or lightly worn, renders it, or ought to render it, in the eyes of every right-minded man, more sacred than ever—doubly sacred in view of the fact that the legislation of so many of the States, by making the State judges mere counters in the game of political intrigue and jobbery, has made the Federal judiciary almost the sole remaining refuge of the great and venerable traditions of judicial purity, independence, and decorum which ages worse in other things but in this better than ours, have handed down to us. No thoughtful layman can enter that small room in Washington in which those eight or nine old men sit, without feeling that he is in the presence of the strongest evidence the world has yet offered of its respect for moral force. No lawyer ought to go up and take his place amongst them without putting away from him for ever all political hope or ambition with greater earnestness than ever Trappist monk repudiated the world and its joys, without casting out of his heart, or at least smothering, every desire that would be likely to make him the debtor or suitor of any man or body of men. From that bench "the noises of the world" should all retreat—

> "The loud vociferations of the street > Become an undistinguishable roar."

But should a judge relinquish all interest in politics? Not at all. What is not practicable is not desirable. He still remains a citizen, and he would be a poor judge, as well as a poor citizen, if what concerned the state did not concern him also; but it should concern him as it concerns the meanest and obscurest of us all, and not as a candidate for office or honors. Not one word of what we are saying is intended to cast the slightest imputation on any judge's integrity. But it is not enough that a judge should be upright and independent. He owes to the community not virtue only; he owes it the appearance of virtue. He must not simply be just, but people must believe him just and incapable of succumbing to bad influences. He is bound not simply to do his duty faithfully, but to inspire the community with confidence that he does it faithfully. Only half his value to the nation lies in the patient hearing and righteous decision of causes on the bench; the other half lies in the belief which his character diffuses that any causes which might come before him would be patiently heard and righteously decided. If by anything in his conduct he shakes this belief, he is guilty of a gross wrong towards every man within his jurisdiction.

Now, a judge cannot sit on the bench of the Supreme Court and be at the same time a candidate for high office—that is, for something which is notoriously not in the gift of the people at large, but of a small body of men who, whatever else they are, are not amongst the purest and most high-minded of the community—without shaking people's confidence in him, without diminishing the popular respect for his office, and without opening for his associates and successors a straight and easy way to the grosser forms of corruption. People would not believe that Justice herself was pure if they knew she was working for the Chicago nomination.

We hear a good deal of high-sounding rhetoric about the necessity of having "a great jurist" in the Presidential chair, in order to complete the work of reconstruction. There is something almost amusing about this, considering that it comes from the very men who have been laboring night and day for the last year and a half to show that the President did not need to be a "jurist," that his province was simply to execute and not to legislate. In this we entirely agree with them; but we hold that if we do not want juridical lore from Mr. Johnson, we do not want it from Mr. Chase either. The country is almost dying of "jurists." Every second man one meets in the street now is a "jurist." Everybody in Congress is a "jurist," from the sergeant-at-arms up. In Congress, however, and in the courts, jurists are needed, and if any editor or orator knows of a jurist of remarkable powers, let him labor to get him into one of these places, but not into the Presidential chair. There is something, we admit, admirable in Mr. Chase's long devotion to the cause of the black man. We would not, if we could, take away one iota from the credit to which it entitles him; but it is extraordinary that he should not see that since he ascended the bench his relations to the blacks have totally changed. To go about amongst them now, haranguing them as he did a year ago; to work in the lobbies of Congress to procure legislation favorable to their interests, as he has done, more or less, for the last two years; to go ostentatiously to Ohio to cast his vote at the State election, and from his windows in Cincinnati call the attention of the crowd to the fact—this is not the way for a judge to serve the freedmen; it is the way to injure himself. The duty of a judge towards the poor and helpless and oppressed, his first and last and only duty, is to be a good judge. Whatsoever is more or less or other than this comes of evil, and produces evil. Whatever shakes confidence in the judiciary, in its independence or integrity, weakens the only real security the poor have for their rights. The rich and powerful can protect themselves without courts; but the poor and weak, if the courts fail them, have no resource. It may be safely said that a judge's value as a judge declines in the direct ratio of his display of political zeal, no matter how pure his motives. When Mr. Chase lobbies for the black man, he does what a hundred men in Washington can be got to do just as well for twenty-five dollars a day; when he goes to Cincinnati to vote for him, he renders him a service which a hod-carrier round the corner probably neutralized five minutes afterwards; and he at the same time does his protégés the mortal injury of leading the whole Democratic and half the Republican party to regard the Chief-Justice of the United States as a political partisan and a candidate for office.

We trust the people will not let this opportunity escape them of maintaining what is left of respect for the judiciary, by laying it down, once for all, that neither the Supreme Court nor any other court shall be used as a resting-place on the way to something more attractive in the political field. It is high time that public men were reminded that there is other work to be done for society than haranguing and writing messages, and palavering with politicians. There is on the bench of the Supreme Court enough to satisfy the noblest and purest ambition. We know of no position in which more can be done to serve the best and largest interests both of the country and of the race, from which more valuable contributions might be made to the highest branches of human thought, in which a man of the highest mental and moral qualifications might achieve a more splendid and enduring fame. Such an ambition is rare, and is in the gift of nature only. We cannot supply it where we do not find it; but we can at least see that if the office is not sought for high ends it shall not be used as an aid in the attainment of low ones.

THE LEADING FACTS OF MR. WELLS'S REPORT.

We look on the annual reports of the Commissioner of Revenue, the second of which is now before us, as the most important "public documents" which have yet been issued, putting aside of course the reports of the scientific corps of the Government service. They are not only valuable contributions to political science, but they are the first attempts ever made to supply trustworthy data for legislation, and to supply the people with accurate knowledge of their own material condition and resources. What has been done in this, or in most other fields, by Congressional committees, may be said to be absolutely worthless. Few of those committees have men upon them qualified for such enquiries by taste or education; and the few men of this description who do get on them are overawed or overpowered by the mere politicians, that is, men who value facts solely for their effect on party measures. The result is that the reports of committees are generally of about as much value, in helping the public to form sound opinions, as long articles in a party newspaper on any exciting topic of the day. All other countries have been driven long ago, by their greater necessities, into establishing bodies of experts to collect materials, and make suggestions based on their knowledge and experience, for the use of the legislative body, whatever it may be; and European legislatures are all in the habit of treating their reports with respect and attention, and acting on them if they act at all. We have never tried the experiment, mainly owing to the exceeding simplicity of the governmental apparatus. Anybody almost was competent to manage it, and it may be said to have been left to the management of anybody who chose to undertake it; and this class, we need hardly say, was largely composed of gentlemen who evolved their finance and political economy out of the depths of their moral consciousness. Mr. Wells's first report, issued last year, was not very well received by Congress. It was an experiment, and it would have been contrary to all Congressional usage for the report of one man, outside the regular political circles, to have much weight. Moreover, at that time the majority were still tolerably certain that the science of taxation had no secrets for them. Complaints of depression in trade, it is true, reached them from various quarters, but they were tolerably well satisfied that only one remedy was needed, and that was to increase the tariff.

Mr. Wells is this year meeting with a much more respectful hearing, and we begin to hope that his report will do good service, and that its leading suggestions will really affect legislation. It is hard to say which is more valuable—its suggestions or its statements of facts. It is not possible within the limits of our space to give even an outline of the report itself, and we shall confine ourselves to-day to a summary of its most striking features, hoping to return to them hereafter in detail.

It is pleasant reading, for two reasons. First, it is a crushing reply to those who are trying to persuade the public that it can only get relief from its burdens by breaking faith with the public creditor; secondly, it shows that the prevailing depression in business is greater in appearance than in reality, and is rapidly passing away without any help from legislation at all. The national debt has been reduced since the war by $266,000,000 (we omit the fractions), the interest on it by $15,000,000 per annum. It seems when General Butler or Mr. Pendleton states the case that it would be an awful thing to withdraw all the legal-tender currency at the rate of four millions a month, and convert it into six per cent. coin interest-bearing bonds; it would make such a frightful addition to the burden of interest under which the unhappy people is now groaning. How much, after all, would it amount to? Simply an increase per annum for eight years of $3,880,000, or, at the end of eight years, of $31,000,000 per annum; but, as Mr. Wells shows, with our present means of reducing the capital of the debt, there is little likelihood that any absolute increase of interest, from the conversion of the currency into bonds, would take place at all.

What are the real causes of the weight of the public burdens? They are three in number; the heavy expenditure of the Government; clumsiness and multiplicity of the taxes, not their total amount; and the thieving and incompetency of officials. Mr. Wells shows that the expenditure of the Government is too large, and ought, as one means of relief, and a very important means, to be greatly reduced. For instance, he shows that if the expenses of the War Department were cut down from $83,000,000 per annum to $53,000,000, it would leave it still in possession of a revenue 260 per cent. greater than in 1861. This, and reductions on a similar scale in the Navy Department, civil service, and bounties, together with the total abandonment of Mr. Seward's purchases of foreign territory, would absolutely enable the Government to remove all internal taxation on all cotton and woollen manufactures, on all iron, steel, and machinery, on all leather and hat manufactures, and on all kinds of paper!

People who are not immediately interested, and especially country people, who read all that is said in the newspapers about internal revenue frauds, probably imagine that it is, after all, a trifling matter, and that the losses are mere drippings. Now Mr. Wells expresses a positive belief, as the result of his enquiries, that "not over fifty per cent. of the amount of the internal revenue taxes is received in the national Treasury." On turning to the tables, we find that the internal revenue receipts during the year 1867 amounted to $265,920,000—we again omit the smaller fractions. Therefore, what he asserts is that nearly $266,000,000, due to the Government, has in one year either not been collected through the incompetency of its agents, or has been collected by them, and either stolen by them, or divided between them and the persons owing it. This is really an awful statement, especially when coupled with the account he gives of the almost absolute honesty and efficiency of the administrative machinery of the leading European countries. We use the word "awful," strong as it is, advisedly, because the mere loss of the money is only a trifling portion of the calamity. Its worst feature is the amount of fraud, perjury, and lying, on the part of an immense body of persons occupying respectable positions in society, which these figures represent. In fact, we doubt if a debauching agent of similar efficiency was ever applied to any Christian community. In some trades, the whiskey manufacture, for instance, cheating is so general that the few men who have tried to be honest have had to choose between cheating and beggary, and openly confess now that they chose the former. Flesh and blood cannot blame them. The guilt of it before God and man lies on the legislature and the public who, with these facts before their eyes, permit the civil service to remain in its present condition.

Another encouraging feature of Mr. Wells's report is the demonstration he affords that our present financial depression is simply part of the great wave that has passed over the commercial world everywhere, while our case is really not so bad as that of the English and French. Moreover, the recuperative process is going on amongst us at a rate few of us dream of. Immigration, Mr. Wells calculates, makes a positive yearly addition to the wealth and producing power of the country of one hundred and fifty millions of dollars. The crops last year were, though not so good as was expected, greater than ever before. There is just now great depression in the cotton trade, and yet there is from 15 to 20 per cent. more machinery at work in it than before the war. Who that ever sees much of iron manufactures, or rather of the newspapers devoted to the iron interest, does not think the iron trade a sickly plant struggling feebly for existence? Yet it has increased since 1810, under all kinds of tariffs and disturbances, 2,371 per cent., while population in the same period has only increased 410 per cent. So on through nearly every branch of industry: whatever depends on the soil and on private individuals is flourishing as nothing ever flourished before. Nothing is wanting but scientific legislation and honesty in officials to make us in a very few years the most prosperous and most lightly taxed community in the world. Do Americans know, or do they not, that they are the only people in the world whose income largely exceeds their expenditure; the only people whose taxation daily diminishes under the mere increase of population and wealth; and—we hate to write it, but it must be said—the only people amongst whom there is any talk of cheating the public creditor?

"FLIPPANCY."

THE dictionaries give the word more than one definition, but, as we suppose, "flippancy," when found in the mouths of men other than lexicographers, has nowadays no sense but a bad one, and always means the thoughtless, slighting, disrespectful treatment of themes of discourse which by right ought to be treated with respect. But the vice of flippancy is thus far unlike what have been called the natural vices—all men indiscriminately are not to be trusted to judge of it. As regards lying or stealing or murdering, the "black or negro" man, as the geographies say, with his phrenologically undeveloped head, is, for all practical purposes, as capable of forming right conclusions as the highly Caucasian Professor Fowler would be, or any other man of good facial angle. From China to Peru and from Indus to either pole they dislike a liar or a thief, and kill a murderer. But flippancy belongs to that indefinitely larger class of human failings as to which we have nothing written on the tablets of our hearts to enable us to make a judgment absolute and universally applicable, but are compelled to discard instinct, so to speak, and make use of brains. At once, then, we come upon the widest possible difference of opinions. What is flippancy to one man at one time and place, is hardly more likely to seem such to another man at the same, or the same man at another time and place, than all men are likely to be of one mind as regards the religious obligation to observe the feast of Pentecost or to practise auricular confession.

With reflections such as these we console ourselves for an inability which we discover in ourselves to agree with very many persons as to whether or not, in particular instances, some one—ourselves, for example—has or has not been guilty of flippancy. Flippancy in the abstract—disrespect shown to the truly respectable—we, as all men, rightly, naturally, unavoidably hate. Also, we are human, we suppose, in a dislike which we entertain for disrespect shown to whatever things we individually happen to venerate, and in a disposition to denounce as flippancy an irreverent way of treating them; orthodoxy is the name of our doxy, too, when we consult feeling. But we are no longer able, as in happier days, to believe without doubt that to other people our sincere denunciations of this and that, of flippancy, among other things, may not seem mistaken and, perhaps, foolish. As we now look at it, it is a thing to be freely admitted by all the Hapsburgs that the Austrian General Wurmser, or whoever it was, made a mistake when he so severely condemned the self-sufficiency and flippancy of which General Bonaparte was guilty when he showed such marked disrespect for all well-established rules of warfare as was exhibited in the battles and victories of the well-known Italian campaign. And, however much we may have respected General George B. McClellan, we are willing to confess that the flippant critics who urged an advance on Yorktown and "Prince John" Magruder turned out at the last to have not been so very far wrong as some friends of ours who had friends at West Point succeeded in making us partially believe.

Or, for further example, we may, for our part, say that the Honorable Ben Wade is "one of our grandest public men," or, to use Miss Anthony's words, is "a right royal old fellow," and we may not only fervently say this, but fervently believe it. Still, should a person who avows his belief that a senator of the United States ought to know something; ought to have had some education; ought, for instance, to have some knowledge of political economy, of jurisprudence, of the history of this and other countries, as well as of the history of parties in this country, of the rule of three and the rules of grammar, to speak briefly, as well as of the golden rule as applied to the relations of black men and white—should a person of this sort, we say, treat as an entirely ridiculous thing some of Mr. Wade's acts and sayings, we should not see our way clear to condemning him absolutely for what would perhaps seem to us flippancy. So also of the representatives of their constituents in the lower House of Congress. We believe, say, in Mr. Banks; we know that without special training for political life, without having given very many midnight or other hours to the study of the effete institutions of Europe, or to the writers on international law, or to other writers, he has risen, by his own laudable exertions, to the dignity of representing Massachusetts as a Member of Congress, and the United States as Chairman of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, and, as we have said, perhaps we believe in him. But it is true, too, that we admit the possibility that some not over light-minded man may be moved to laugh Mr. Banks's Fenian speeches and naturalization reports and eight-hour bills to scorn; may, merely from a sense of humor, ridicule them for what seems to him their intrinsic absurdity; may, because he thinks that they are folly, and that ridicule is the most dangerous foe to folly, make fun of them because they are things discreditable to the country, and yet through it all, whatever he seems to us to be, may, from his own point of view, be anything but flippant.

There are not a few people—who, like ourselves, have their own opinion of certain royal old public men—who, without hesitation and even with violence, stigmatize as flippancy anything but the soldest and most serious way of treating all that these gentlemen say and do. Some man known as "a leader" frames a stupid resolution or a wildly absurd bill, or makes a really silly speech—talks after a fashion which, if he used it in talking to his neighbors about private matters, would cause them to speak of him, and to him, with extreme lightness—and it is commonly pronounced flippancy, of a sort to be deplored much and condemned very much, if the laugh which rises to the occasion is not decorously stifled. The proper thing to do, it is held, when one is contending with such a warrior as Mr. Ashley, for example, is to look on apparently with anxiety and sleepless vigilance while he tears up the sod, shovels dirt for entrenchments, drags out his frowning batteries of Quaker guns and gets them into position. Then, Mr. Ashley, being a leader, one is industriously to levy great numbers of horse, foot, and dragoons, to prepare large trains of siege artillery, to sit down before him, open parallels at the orthodox distance, approach him gradually, as if one were really in fear of his abilities as an engineer, and finally admit him to an honorable capitulation. To send a sergeant's guard of light cavalrymen to capture his fortalice would, we are told, be a species of levity so far from decent as to be undoubted flippancy. This, as we have said, is not altogether our way of thinking. We are not sure that we have a right to ask other persons to give Mr. Ashley or Mr. Banks, or this or that other grand public man and right royal old fellow of a statesman, as much respect as we accord them; if people think they see a fool, why, at all events, there are worse uses to which they might put him than make him food for mirth, and so long as they do nothing more to him than that, we shall not violently insist on their adopting our own view of him.

But to speak with perfect seriousness, the charge of flippancy, as we are accustomed to hear it made, we have got into the habit of disregarding almost wholly. In those instances to which our attention has been most particularly called, nine times it has seemed to us a charge to be smiled at to one time that it has seemed well-founded. Generally it is preferred by a person belonging to one of two classes. The accuser is either one of those people—and they are more common than hopeful people are apt to think—who are totally destitute of humor, a person unable to distinguish between weight and heaviness; a person whom facts overpower and whom truths do not address at all; a person who, to speak in the concrete, thinks that Mr. B. F. Perry ceased to be Mr. Perry and became a sage to be respected when he was made Provisional Governor Perry; a person who would think oratorical nonsense merely a speech until he saw it printed in the Congressional Globe, and then would think it constitutional eloquence;—the accuser as we know him is, we say, either such a person, or else he is an offended partisan—a literary partisan or a partisan of some religious creed or a political partisan—a Republican, say, who appears to think, because Mr. Greeley has served the party well and served mankind well, that laughable things done by him are not to be laughed at.

Now, as to the first of these two sorts of people, there is nothing, we suppose, to be done with them; till the end of time it will be necessary to suffer, or rejoice, under their reprehension. As to the second class, considered as a distinct one—the boundaries of the two certainly overlap, and overlap so much that sometimes, if one is angry with partisans, the classes seem almost coincident—we can only recommend them to use the philosophy which we ourselves endeavor to put in practice—counsel them, when some hero of theirs, or some favorite doctrine, is treated with what appears to be too little respect, to consider in their secret hearts whether perhaps they themselves have not been unwise in their worship and belief.

PARIS GOSSIP.

PARIS, December 23, 1867.

CURIOUSLY in contrast with the wonderful displays of elegant and luxurious objects which, at this season, bring all Paris out into the streets to gaze and to desire, is the fact that a poor, shivering wretch was arrested, a day or two ago, as he was hurrying away from the Garden of Plants with a blanket he had just "cribbed" from one of the boa constrictors! There is, in fact, much distress in this splendid city; but the administration distributes large sums every winter among the distressed portion of the population, and private charity, also, does a good deal. One of the most useful of the many channels through which charitable help is dispensed here is the institution of "Economical Soup-kitchens," which, begun in 1853 by a well-known philanthropist, have demonstrated the possibility of furnishing a meal of good, nourishing meat-soup—2¼ oz. cooked meat, half a pint of cooked beans, or a pint of rice-soup—for one sou each portion. The first establishment was worked at these prices during the whole winter, and was found to have realized a profit from the sale of bones and greasy water. The following winter sixty-eight of these soup-kitchens were organized by the Prefect of Police, and sold from forty-five to forty-six thousand portions daily, or a total of over five millions during the four months through which they were kept open. The number of these establishments has increased every year, and they are now to be found in every part of the city. Several of them are supplied by the Emperor, the Empress, and the Prince Imperial, the distribution being gratis, and admission being given by tickets certifying the indigence of the holders.

The various sections of the Academy and other learned bodies have just had their annual opening; one or two have had a dinner, but the greater number have contented themselves with meeting and making speeches. Great are the efforts now making to obtain tickets for the approaching reception of the brilliant Republican barrister, M. Jules Favre, and of the Abbé Geratry; the former will pronounce a eulogium on Victor Cousin, to whose arm-chair he succeeds; the latter, in monkish garb, will sound the praises of M. de Barante. The speeches of the two new members are ready, and have just been submitted, as usual, to the preliminary examination of their respective friends.

The Conservatory of Music has also had its annual celebration, accompanied by a distribution of prizes among its pupils. Its president, the ever green Auber, was as active, alert, complimentary, witty, caustic, and charming as ever, and did the honors of the occasion with as much animation as though sixty years had been struck from his existence.

M. Flourens, the eminent naturalist and physiologist, member of the Academy, has just died at 76. He wrote a book to prove that the average duration of human life should be, according to certain natural indications, one hundred years; but, to the disappointment of the friends of his system, he has not lived to demonstrate the correctness of his reasonings. The well-known Italian librettiste, Piave, the most assiduous collaborator of Verdi, has just departed this life; as has also, to the great regret of her friends and the musical public, the charming and accomplished singer, Madame Nautier-Didiée, whose sojourn in Naples has failed to arrest the malady which has carried her off in the prime of her days and of her talent. The Duc de Luynes, the richest member of the French aristocracy and the most liberal patron of art in all its branches, has fallen a victim to his benevolence. He went to Rome to attend upon the victims of the late fighting, and having given his cloak to a wounded soldier who was suffering greatly, he took a cold, and died a few days ago.

The lovers of Mendelssohn will be glad to learn that the son of the illustrious composer, who is professor of history in the University of Heidelberg, is bringing out the posthumous works of his father. He has just published an eighth book of the famous "Lieder ohne Worte," quite as beautiful as their widely-known predecessors, and is about to publish a symphony called "The Reform," a sonata, and a funeral march composed for the anniversary of the death of his friend Norbert Bergmüller.

The lectures for young women so brilliantly inaugurated at the Sorbonne are being attended not only by a large gathering of girls of the lower and middle classes, for whose benefit they were mainly designed, but also by the daughters of people of the highest rank, among others by the Empress's nieces, the daughters of the late Duchess of Alba, who are passing the winter with their Imperial relative.

The return of Christmas, ushered in by the imposing concomitants of the "Midnight Mass," has been celebrated with all the pomp usually displayed by the Catholic Church in the observance of its "high-tides." The finest voices of the various operatic troupes, the best instrumentalists of the various orchestras, have rendered the noble creations of the Catholic muse with a perfection which leaves little to be desired on that score. The Archbishop of Paris has officiated at Notre Dame, and various dignitaries of his diocese have beaten "the drum ecclesiastic" in the other principal pulpits of the capital. Thanks, probably, to the exasperation of the narrow patriotism which insists on maintaining the temporal power of the Pope in order to prevent the completion of Italian unity, the churches have been crowded to a degree unparalleled for many a long year. The zeal with which M. Thiers and the mass of Frenchmen who share his prejudices, if not his talent, join hands with the most ultra portion of the clerical party in the preservation of the kingly power of the "Vicar of Christ," reminds one of the reply of Victor Cousin when complimented by one of the most fiery of the bishops on his "conversion," as evidenced by his attitude in a parliamentary discussion of the temporal power:

"Oh! Monseigneur, do not mistake me! I accept the Pope as emphatically as you do; but Jesus Christ, never!"

The splendors of the shops at this season seem to grow more and more splendid every year; but, amidst the host of rival attractions which dispute the contents of the general purse, the confectioners still reign supreme, the various political factions remaining faithful to the one adopted by each. Thus Siraudin is patronized especially by the Imperialists, Boissier by the Orleanists, and Seugnot, in the Rue du Bac, by the Legitimist grandees of Faubourg St. Germain; while the general public—that large portion of every people that troubles not its head overmuch about the politics of the moment—addresses itself to one or the other according to its tastes and the capacity of its portemonnaie, or patronizes the legion of lesser lights of the sugar plum firmament, whose lower charges they find it more easy to meet.

The universal buying of the fortnight that precedes the New Year will be felt as a special godsend just now; for every branch of industry is suffering from the stagnation caused by the general doubt as to what the coming spring may be destined to bring forth. This state of paralysis, so openly admitted in the angry discussions of the legislative body, seems to have extended even to the activities of the littérateurs to whom the world of Paris looks for its daily dole of mental pabulum. With the exception of the magnificent illustrated works—mostly reprints—brought out by the leading booksellers for New Year's gifts, no book or play of any importance is announced for the present.

The excitement created in a certain portion of the literary world by the prohibition of Victor Hugo's "Hernani" is far from having subsided. This prohibition is generally regarded as the reply of the Government to the violent attack lately made on its policy by the self-exiled poet, in the shape of a set of verses into which he has put all the sting and bitterness of which his pen is capable. As the Théâtre Français was in treaty with Victor Hugo for a revival of his principal plays, the poet remarked before publishing his satire, "This will cost me 100,000frs." The Government, however, has not openly prohibited the revival in question, but has managed the matter in another way. At the Français—which, as your readers are no doubt aware, is the principal theatre of France subsidized by the Government and under its control—it is customary, whenever a new play is to be brought out, to appoint two actors to each character of the piece, the second actor, styled in theatrical parlance a "lining," being destined in case of illness or other incapacity of the principal actor to take the place of the latter, so that the performance of the play may not be interrupted. This order of proceeding has not been attended to in the case of "Hernani." Mlle. Favart, who takes the part of the heroine, and Delaunay, who takes that of Hernani, have been ill, one after the other, with violent colds, and the rehearsals of the play in question have thus been put off "accidentally" from week to week, as the manager, despite the reiterated demand of the irate poet, has persisted in not appointing the usual "lining" to the various parts. It is probable that, to save appearances—as the opposition journals are keeping up on the subject of "Hernani" a series of irritating attacks on the Government quite out of keeping with the real inferiority of the play—the play will be brought out ere long for a few nights, and then be quietly dropped, and its place be taken by some other production.

The theatres of the capital are all complaining of the scantiness of their audiences. Whether this indifference of the public be due to the fact that everybody is busy shopping, or to the recent intervention of the police, to which we owe a noticeable addition to the quantity and length of the draperies of the ballet-dancers, it is difficult to say, but it is certain that the receipts of these favorite centres of amusement have rarely been so small as they are just now. Even the Porte St. Martin, so greatly in vogue for its splendid fairy pieces and sensation dramas, has felt the general depression, having seen its receipts dwindle down a night or two ago to the unheard-of smallness of three hundred francs! The "luck" of the diva of the stage in the matrimonial sphere is, however, far from diminishing; and a songstress of the Munich Theatre, Mlle. Oswald, has just married Count Heppelberg. It is true that the bridegroom is sixty-five years old, while the bride has not yet attained to "sweet sixteen."

Theodore Rousseau, the best landscape painter of France, and who took the sole medal of honor awarded to that branch of art at the late International Exhibition, has just departed this life, to the great regret of the artist world. Lamartine seems to have suddenly rallied, and, to the surprise of all about him, has come to Paris for change of scene. Sainte-Beuve is believed to be nearing his end, as his malady is regarded as incurable; the process of dissolution is almost certain to be slow and extremely painful.

The issue of Renan's forthcoming work, "Les Apôtres," is understood to be delayed in order to allow of the intermediate republication, in the form of a volume, of various essays, literary and critical, which formerly appeared in various journals of the capital. It may not be known to some of your readers that M. Renan, who lost his post at the Collége de France on the publication of the "Vie de Jésus," is entirely dependent on his pen for support. His wife, daughter of Ary Scheffer, brought him no other dowry than a brilliant name. He lives in very modest style. By the arrangement entered into with his publisher, Lévy, Renan receives one franc for every copy sold of the large edition of the "Life of Jesus," of which 800,000 were sold during the first year after its appearance. He has also a certain amount for each copy sold of the abridged edition of that work. During the first few years of his independent career Renan was extremely poor; happily for him his tastes and habits are simple, and he is thoroughly indifferent to the luxurious vanities of the time. Destined for the priesthood, he was educated at the Seminary of St. Sulpice, where his great talent soon attracted the attention of his teachers, who, believing him to be destined to shine as the champion of the Church, afforded him every possible facility for the study of the Bible in its original tongues, where he acquired that intimate knowledge of Oriental languages and literature which has enabled him to become so formidable an adversary of the system under whose auspices his talent was developed.

On quitting the seminary, as he did when his convictions no longer permitted him to remain in the fold of the Church, Renan found himself penniless and friendless in the midst of Paris. Under the auspices of the eminent Professor Egger, he took part in the course of lectures then being delivered by that savant, and also gave private lessons in the classic and Eastern tongues. Having secured an income of about 1,200 francs a year, he wrote and published his first great work on the Semitic languages, the materials for which he had amassed in the course of his studies at St. Sulpice, and whose appearance confirmed the favorable impression created by his lectures, placed him in the front rank of the Oriental scholars of the day, and led to his appointment to the honorable and lucrative chair of Oriental Literature at the Collége de France. But the heterodox tendency of his lectures in that institution soon attracted attention. The clerical party brought so strong a pressure to bear upon the Government that the latter was compelled to eject him from his post. Since that, Renan has devoted himself entirely to the writing of the remarkable works which have drawn upon him the anathema of Rome, and excited so furious a contest of opinions throughout Europe.

Notes.

LITERARY.

THE Revolution is a new weekly paper of handsome appearance, which may be roughly described as the mouthpiece of a certain number of those persons among us who think that women ought to be allowed to vote. But it gives its own statement of its aims, and these are directed to many objects in the various fields of politics, religion, social life, commerce, and finance. It will uphold, it says, firstly, Educated Suffrage irrespective of Sex or Color; secondly, Equal Pay to Women for Equal Work; thirdly, Eight Hours' Labor—which, we fear, means equal pay to the eight-hours laborer and to the man who does ten hours' work; fourthly, Abolition of Standing Armies and Party Despotisms—a form of words which, used in this country, either means nothing or condemns the police force, say, and all firms or other associations formed for the purpose of doing things; fifthly, the prospectus says Down with the Politician, Up with the People—as to which it is proper to say that the elevation of the people is the elevation of the politician, for, as a matter of fact, the name of that particular sort of person who is ever painfully alert to catch every intimation of the people's wish is Politician. In the matter of religion the Revolution demands and will work for Deeper Thought, Broader Ideas, Science, not Superstition, and Love to Man as well as God. In social life it will favor Morality and Reform, Practical Education, not Theoretical, Facts, not Fiction, Virtue, not Vice, Cold Water, not Alcoholic Drinks or Medicines. Finally, it proposes a new financial and commercial policy. There appears to be some vagueness in its aims in this respect also. "America no longer led by Europe" is one of the leading principles of the new scheme; another is said to be "New York the Financial Centre of the World;" and a third is thus stated, "Atlantic and Pacific Oceans for American Steamships and Shipping." So it seems as if it would be necessary to wait for other numbers of the paper to develop more fully the new policy. The more important as well as rather more intelligible features of it are the imposition of a productive tariff which shall shut out all manufactured articles not made in this country, and the issue of a vast additional quantity of paper money, for the purpose, among others, of peopling this land "from Ocean to Ocean, and from San Francisco to Omaha." We have a financial scheme of our own which we do not know why the Revolution should not urge on the public attention: let Congress enact that every qualified voter, native born or duly naturalized, shall, on presentation of his certificate of birth or of naturalization, be empowered to draw, either in person or by attorney, from the printing bureau of the Treasury Department, as many dollars in new greenbacks of any denomination as will, in the drawer's opinion, constitute a competency. On the Revolution's theory—which is that of several people—of the absolute value of greenbacks, there can be no doubt of the efficacy of this process in making everybody wealthy and killing "the crisis." It might be repeated as often as the repetition was requested, and if the country were not speedily peopled from Ocean to Ocean, and from San Francisco to Omaha, the blame would at any rate be attributable to some other cause than the lack of printed dollar bills. We have looked carefully through the Revolution, from beginning to end, with the hope of finding that the cause whose advocacy will probably be its chief business was going to have in the new paper a reasonably good advocate. Neither in the matter of the first number nor in its tone do we find many grounds for indulging such a hope. On the contrary, there are many grounds for fearing that it will hurt rather than benefit "the cause of female suffrage." Its wildness and vagueness, as shown in the prospectus from which we have quoted; the implied want of anything like ability in its conductors when such a prospectus is put in print, its apparent close connection with Mr. G. F. Train, are all very unfavorable signs, and we look for but little good from its endeavors.

—A late writer in Harper's Weekly, commenting on the singular absurdities of our present system of taxation, gives a few facts and figures which are interesting to the literary world in particular. An American publisher, let us say, imports paper as a part of the raw material of which he is to make books. He pays on it a duty of 35 per cent. ad valorem. If now, instead of importing blank paper, he sends across the water and has his books printed and bound by foreign workmen, he can bring his paper into the country with a tax on it of only 25 per cent. ad valorem. If a further example is sought of the very strange manner in which our lawgivers have managed the revenue business, one can easily be found in the postal regulations regarding the transmission of books through the mails. We need not go into the details which would make it plain how certain results are reached; it is enough to give the results which the law as now existing has produced. A package of books weighing twenty pounds may be sent from London to New York for $4 80. But let any one send such a package by mail from New York to Newark, N. J., and the postage would amount to $19 20. So let citizens of St. Louis, who want a dictionary, do as we the other day knew a young man to do, order a "Latham's Johnson" from London instead of a Webster from Springfield, Mass. It is to be remembered that the foreign package will go free after reaching this country. The English dictionary can be bought and received by the Missourian for half the money which it would cost him to buy and receive by mail a "Webster" or a "Worcester." Perhaps we have gentlemen in Congress capable of bringing order into the multifarious confusion of which the above statement gives us a mere glimpse. But certainly from some quarter a remedy ought to come, and we can only hope that it may be brought by experts.

—It is not generally worth while to notice the errors of an auction catalogue, or a list of second-hand books, for criticism will produce no reform. These lists appear to be made by persons who cannot understand a title written in any language but their own, auctioneers and booksellers thinking, and probably with justice, that greater learning in their clerks would only increase the expense of their catalogue without promoting the sale of their books. Moreover, the printing is done in a hurry, often from illegible manuscript, and "extra corrections" are costly. "They manage these things better in France" and Germany, and many foreign sale catalogues would compare favorably with those of libraries for skill in the statement of bibliographical facts, for moderation and truth in the praise bestowed, and for accuracy in the titles, notwithstanding an occasional slip in the English. And there are exceptions in this country. America can point with satisfaction to the catalogue of the library of W. F. Fowle, and to that of the library of R. W. Roche, edited by J. Sabin.

In these cases the exceptional value of the books justified an exceptional expense. It would not be just to say that the unusually bad catalogue before us—"Catalogue of a very Valuable Collection of Books. . . . comprising some of the Scarcest Elzeviers, Aldus, Plantins. . . . to be sold at Auction by Leavitt, Strebeigh & Co."—describes unusually worthless volumes. Yet it is bad enough, one would think, to prejudice seriously their sale. It is so full of errors of every description that it is as amusing as a Joe Miller. In the very first Number described the imprint is "Amsterdam, 1824," and yet the edition is said to be that "used by Gibbon in his History of Rome," of which, as Macaulay's school-boy must have known, the last volume was published more than thirty years earlier. This book, by the way, and many others afterwards, are described as "folio calf," a term which suggests a new nomenclature to literary drovers. No. 70 gives us a perplexing mixture of languages: "Horatii, F. Opera. Illustrated, notes. C. G. Mitscherlich." No. 72 tells us that an edition printed in 1518 is "a re-impression of the first of 1808." No. 78 would make Quintilian stare and gasp: "Lexicon græce prosodaicum, versus et synonyma complectus;" but perhaps not more than No. 83: "Gillio (Petro) Lexicon Græco-Latinam." In 103 the cataloguer does not seem quite sure whether the commentary on the "Somnium Ciceronis" was Marrobii or Marcrobii. In 346 we hear of a new European monarch, "Gustavum II., Snecorum regem." The title of which these words are a part is omitted, we are not surprised to be told, by "De Buve." Passing by such trifles as "To. Barclaii Argenis," "ex T. Lipsii," "Ausonii Popinæ Frisii," "Argonauticorum," "Græco-carbarum," "Quatuor," "Pisonis, General. De Indiæ utriusque re Naturali," we come to what are, perhaps, the gems of the collection—"Amesii Meduall. Theologiæ Veræ. 12mo," and "Ansea Pythagoreorum Carmina." Usually the titles are not so disguised but that the pleasant exercise of a little conjectural emendation will reveal their meaning, but two, we confess, have baffled us. They are—No. 122: "Biblia Sacra. Que præter Antiquæ Latinæ Versionis. D. D. Lucæ Oriandri. Large 4to, new half calf. With nice Portrait. Tubingæ, 1600;" and No. 117: "Rosarii Theologie Aurei ad Sententiam tertium Libri Accomodatissimus," which, we are told, is "a nice book."

These may be only typographical mistakes, although we must remark that typographical mistakes in dates of books on sale are rather serious matters. When so much is said about the scarcity and excellence of editions as in this catalogue, one likes to feel some confidence that the book offered is really of the edition described. And it is difficult to decide whether to buy "No. 483. Jaubert Grammaire Turk. Paris, 1833;" or, "501. Taubert, Grammaire Turke. Paris, 1823." Perhaps the epithet "Rare," applied to the latter only, was designed to remove a difficulty which the writer felt he had caused. But it is not the printers who have made all the mistakes. In the French titles the accents are conspicuous by their absence. The capitalizing is a marvel. The English of the notes is on a par with the Latin of the titles. Such sentences as these—"Lanfranc was the first doctor that has made the great chirurgical operations of the art," "Corradi wrote many works; between them two are very scarce—one is the above copy," "So it is very seldom when we can find a copy"—adorn almost every page. No. 119 is recommended as "A treatise on the errors of the Armenians, by Armacanus Bishop and Primate of Ireland." It is really by Richard Fitz-Ralph, Archbishop of Armagh, or, as he would be styled in Latin, Ricardus Archiepiscopus Armacanus. This mistake is excusable, for an auction-room is, of course, not furnished with many books of reference; but then it is provoking to be told that this is "a curious and scarce book," as if the writer knew all about it. After such errors as we have pointed out, what confidence can one have in the notes "A valuable work," "A curious medical work," etc.? A man who pretends to express an opinion on the contents of a book should give some evidence that he understands its title. And yet, after all, one hesitates whether to be indignant at the carelessness which offers to bibliophiles a catalogue bibliographically so faulty, or to be grateful for the innocent amusement which it affords.

—In the last report of the condition of the Boston Public Library we find many things of interest—too many to be exhaustively set forth within our limits. In general, it may be said that the institution maintains its high character as the completion of the school system of the city, to use

Mr. Everett's designation; that it is growing rapidly—the additions for the year just ended amount to 5,303 volumes and 7,769 pamphlets, so that it is now the second in size of American libraries; that it is still fully appreciated by the Bostonians, 53,000 of whom have secured the right to use it, and 12,000 of whom do use it habitually; that it offers well-selected reading even more liberally now than in any former period of its fifteen years of existence, and that it is in every way an honor and a blessing to the community—a well managed and almost perfectly free library. We observe, in looking through the report, some interesting tables which show the relative popularity of various authors, and from these tables we cull a few facts. During the year just past, Cooper was read by 5,460 persons; Dickens by 3,955; Marryat by 3,730; Mrs. Caroline Lee Hentz by 3,375; Scott by 2,663; W. Gilmore Simms by 2,345; next come Charles Lever (2,146); Miss Mulock (1,663); Miss Yonge (1,312); Thackeray (1,295); and following this first ten we find, in the order named, these ten other novelists: Mrs. Stowe, Miss Braddon, Charles Reade, Mrs. Grey, Hawthorne, Mrs. Ann S. Stephens, Tom Hughes, Miss Cummins, Mrs. Charles, and Theodore Winthrop, who found 210 readers to Mrs. Stowe's 980. We learn that Cooper's little known "Stories of the Sea"—speaking from the critical point of view, and not taking the circulating-library test, it is to be called little known—is, among the Bostonians, the most popular of all his works; including duplicates, there are 7 volumes of it, and each volume gets 37 readers, while "The Pioneers," which the publishers say is his best selling book, shows an average to each of its 10 volumes of but 25½ readers; "Ivanhoe" is the most popular of Scott's novels; "Pickwick" of Dickens's; "Never Too Late to Mend" of Charles Reade's; "Hyperion" of Longfellow's prose works; "The Scarlet Letter" is by much the most popular of Hawthorne's romances; and Lever's "Charles O'Malley" is more read than any other of his books. Among the poets Longfellow leads; his 44 volumes (inclusive of duplicates) found 429 readers; Tennyson, 12 volumes, had 124 readers; Whittier found 91, and Clough only 4. Readers of the "Minor Drama" numbered 757; of "Bell's Theatre" 859; of "Shakespeare" 545. About the travellers we can hardly tell. To judge by the number of duplicates which it is found necessary to keep on hand, it would seem as if Doctor Kane's "Arctic Explorations" is most in request, and that Bayard Taylor's works come next. Prescott is more read than any other historian; then comes Froude, then Bancroft, then Motley. Of semi-historical works relating to the rebellion, "Semmes's Cruise" is first in the list, followed by "Barnard's Peninsular Campaign," a "Youth's History of the Rebellion," and "Greeley's American Conflict." Juvenile readers, with whom we end, seem to like Mayne Reid best, Jacob Abbott next, and Harper's "Story Books"—which we are not able to name specifically—are third in popularity. If the trustees of the library should incorporate such tables in future reports—and they possess both value and interest—it is to be desired that they be a little more definite.

—The sudden death of the Duc de Luynes, the sole remaining representative in France of the grand seigneur of other days, a most liberal patron of art, and kindly and generous to the last degree, has given rise to a host of anecdotes concerning him, in none of which, perhaps, are his princely qualities better exhibited than in that which involves the late painter Ingres. Twenty years ago the Duke was making of his magnificent château of Dampierre, in the valley of Chevreuse, one of the richest of art museums extant, and to induce Ingres to paint for him there some great work worthy of his pencil, he offered him 60,000 francs, and free quarters in the château for himself and his family, furnishing all the servants and paying all the expenses. Ingres accepted, but with reluctance, and he and his wife were duly installed in a luxurious and splendid suite of rooms. After some time the Duke showed him the chamber whose walls he was to decorate, but delicately made no stipulation as to the size, subject, or style of the desired painting, saying: "Voilà! I insist on nothing; do just what you will and when you will." Ingres responded by demanding that some excellent paintings by Gleize—"rubbish," as he termed them—should first be scratched off. The Duke complied and absented himself, and for the next two months the painter and his wife explored at their leisure the beautiful environs of Dampierre. The following year the Duke received from Ingres complaints that his wife could not endure the cook allowed them and must have another, with additional accommodations, and that the blue velvet hangings of the room to be painted must be changed for grey to harmonize with his subject; and the easy Duke at once assented. Summer, however, was again spent out-of-doors in the environs, so that when the Duke returned in the winter Ingres had nothing to show but sulkiness, but as soon as he had turned his back wrote him that the grey hangings must be changed to green. This, too, was done, and the artist then shut himself up in the "Ingres Room," letting no one enter at any time, and keeping one whole wing of the château under lock and key that he might not be overlooked. The steward wrote to the Duke that he might now return, as Ingres had surely begun. But on his arrival, no offer was made to show him the work in progress, and "noblesse" constrained the Duke not to ask to see it. This sort of see-saw lasted three years, and might have continued indefinitely, had not the Duke, it is said, on one of his visits, perceived from his window a woman spreading wet linen upon the choicest exotics of a favorite parterre; and crying out hastily, "Hallo, my good woman!" discovered too late that it was Mme. Ingres herself. No apology could satisfy her enraged husband, who professed to be greatly insulted in her person, and the couple that very day quitted the château for Paris. When they were gone the Duke hastened to open the mysterious room, and found upon the wall—the unfinished outline of a single head! This he allowed to remain for some years as the painter had left it, but subsequently covered with a rich collection of ancient armor the drawing for which he had paid 60,000 francs.

—The most modern of studies is the critical study of the history of art. When, nowadays, a student of that branch says "the fine arts," he means a different thing from what his predecessor meant twenty years ago. Not only do we cultivate the field in a very different manner; the field itself has enormously widened, and the new ground has opened up in the most unexpected way, and yields the most startling crops—all within a dozen or fifteen years. All Europe has been dazed with the newly discovered decorative and descriptive art of Japan, and, while still bewildered with that, and only little by little settling to the work of analyzing and critically examining it, there come the results of the Tei-ping rebellion and the French and British march to Peking, plunder and purchases reach Europe, and Europe learns that during an intercourse of several hundred years nothing of importance has been learned of Chinese ornamental art, and little that has been learned has been learned accurately: it must be learned over again. Mr. Owen Jones is well known as one who supplies the English artists and students with big books on ornamental art; years ago he published his work on the "Alhambra;" afterwards, with greatly superior mechanical facilities, his large folio edition of the "Grammar of Ornament;" from time to time many smaller, although not small, works on kindred subjects; and now, not a month ago, "Examples of Chinese Ornament." Mr. Jones is not a highly critical writer; moreover, his own designs, whether embodied in the decoration of London buildings or published in books like "1001 Initial Letters," are not of the first force even of modern design. But his books are of great use on account of the large amount of material they offer, and what seems the faithfulness of their reproductions of ornament. In the preface to the new "Examples of Chinese Ornament," he says: "We have long been familiar with the power of the Chinese to balance colors; but we were not so well acquainted with their power of treating ornamental forms; and in the 'Grammar of Ornament' I was led, from my then knowledge, to express the opinion that the Chinese had not the power of dealing with conventional ornamental form; but it now appears that there has been a period in which a school of art existed in China of a very important kind." In other words, we did n't know much, and jumped at conclusions; it now appears that our conclusions were wrong. The book in question consists of one hundred plates in colors, very well executed, and giving specimens of the full size of Chinese color decoration from painted china, cloisonné enamels, and painted surface-enamels on copper. It is a very interesting and valuable book. It is published not by Day & Son (Limited), but by S. & T. Gilbert, "Back of the Bank of England."

CONFUCIUS.*

If there is a civilization to whose merits we are more generally and thoroughly unjust than to those of any other, it is the Chinese. If there is a historical phenomenon whose wonderful and anomalous character fails to attract a due share of our attention and study, it is the persistency of Chinese national life. The present Emperor of the Flowery Land is the lineal successor of an almost endless line of sovereigns, running back into times deemed pre-historic by nearly every other race; and he is charged with administering institutions which grew up on the very ground he occupies—originated, developed, and handed down by the same people that now lives under them. When not a single Germanic tribe had learned to read and write, China had entered upon her modern era. When petty Roman chiefs, whose very existence is doubted by the historical criticism of our day, were brawling in an obscure Italian village, the representative man of

* "The Life and Teachings of Confucius. With Explanatory Notes. By James Legge, D.D." Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. 1867. 8vo, pp. vi., 338.

"Confucius and the Chinese Classics; or, Readings in Chinese Literature. Edited and compiled by Rev. A. W. Loomis." San Francisco and New York: A. Roman & Co. 1867. 12mo, pp. 432.

China was casting in a form which should endure for ever the gradually elaborated wisdom of numberless generations of his ancestors. When the Greeks, happily settled near to the homes of older systems of culture, were only preparing the way for that glorious career on which they later entered, the Chinese state had already become, in the main, what it is now. When the Hebrews were wearily wandering through the deserts in search of their promised land, the Yellow River of China had been shut in, and its meadows reclaimed from devastation by the same public works which still stand, maintained by the same race, for the same purpose. Through how many hands has the inestimable gift of culture passed on its way to us! How have its chief possessors, one after another, been swept away—worn out, as it were, by their efforts to sustain and advance it! How wonderful, then, is the calm continuance of the Chinese nation and its institutions!

It is easy for us to sneer at Chinese civilization, and cast contempt upon its products; but it is so immeasurably superior to anything that our own ancestors had attained but a few centuries ago, that we, who have climbed to our present height upon the shoulders of men alien to our race, would do well to be a little modest. A people who taught the world to make silk and porcelain, who invented the compass, gunpowder, and the art of printing; who have produced a literature exceeded in value and interest only by those of a very few other races, the acknowledged leaders in human history—such a people is too secure in its position to be affected by the taunts of such upstarts as we are. Undoubtedly we are right in believing that our culture contains far higher elements than theirs, and is upborne by a more energetic and progressive capacity; there are radical deficiencies and incongruities in Chinese character that justify the feeling of distaste with which we contemplate it; but this neither excuses our wholesale depreciation and disregard nor takes away the interest of the historical problem set before us. It is, after all, the desire of every race, as of every individual, to prolong its life; to keep up indefinitely its separate consciousness and activity: how have the Chinese attained this object so much more successfully than any other existing member of the human family—than any which has ever existed, with the exception, perhaps, of the Egyptian?

To the student of Chinese history there is one epoch of transcendent importance—an epoch when the inner life of the nation, we may almost say, crystallized into shape; when, at least, it received its model for all future time; when the ancient literature was worked over, reduced to its essential elements, and increased with new matter, to form a classical and sacred canon, to stand thenceforth for ever, and to exercise over the national mind all that influence which belongs to the Bible among Christian nations, the Veda in India, the Koran among Mohammedans. This epoch was the life of one man, Confucius, the highest type of the Chinese moralist and thinker; by him and his disciples was the work accomplished. A modest and self-restrained man, he made no pretence of divine appointment or supernatural power; he was simply a good citizen and patriot, a humble student of the wisdom of past times, a seer and teacher of the right way. He made himself a focus, in which were gathered all the scattered rays of light from ancient sages and worthies, to be poured forth in one steady stream of enlightenment upon the future. The times were not propitious to his undertaking. The empire was in a state of almost anarchy, amid whose storms his life, as a reformer and administrator, was tossed about and wrecked; he died in discouragement and obscurity. But his doctrines and example began after his death to win the minds and hearts of his countrymen, and rapidly attained an influence which time has not worn out nor persecution subdued. And such is the scale upon which this influence has been exerted, that Confucius stands forth as one of the most prominent figures in the history of humanity.

The task which Dr. Legge has undertaken, in illustration of the life and labors of Confucius, is a gigantic one. His plan includes the whole canonical literature of China, the "Shi King," and the "Four Books"—written, in part, by Confucius himself; in part selected by him from the older literature, and arranged and commented; in part the records of his teachings and of those of his principal disciples and successors. All these books had been already made accessible to Western scholars, but in various tongues, by various hands, at various times and places, and with various degrees of scholarship. Dr. Legge's is an entirely independent work, founded upon his own study, for more than twenty years, of the sacred texts themselves, and of the whole immense body of native comment upon them. He is issuing from the press a stately series of royal octavo volumes, in which are contained the Chinese texts, with complete apparatus for their illustration—English versions, the text and translation of works, or parts of works, bearing upon those under treatment, notes critical and explanatory, biographies, historical sketches, indexes, and glossaries. Four volumes have already appeared: the first contains three of the "Four Books," namely, those which have to do more especially with Confucius himself; the second, the works of Mencius, composing the fourth "Book;" while the other two present a part of the "Shi-King," or Historical Classic. Six or eight more will probably be required to finish the series.

At a very early period in his labors, Dr. Legge was not left without testimonials of an unwelcome kind to their value and general usefulness. Hardly had their first instalment reached this country, when some savant in the provincial town of Worcester, Massachusetts, put forth proposals for a reprint of their English portion, and, by way of adding insult to injury, ventured certain criticisms, more self-complacent than wise, on parts of the editor's work. The latter, under this provocation, and in order to forestall similar piracies, determined to hasten the execution of a plan which he had already in view, and to accompany his grand text edition with another adapted to a much larger circle of readers. Accordingly, in the volume before us, he gives the main contents of the first of the original series, with omission only of the Chinese texts, and of the critical notes, glossaries, etc. No better beginning could have been made than with this particular volume, which supplies the material needed for a comprehension of the character and activity of the Chinese sage, and we hope that the reception given it by the public will be so hearty as to encourage the editor and his publishers to go on without delay to issue the rest of the smaller series. The larger is so expensive, and Chinese scholars capable of using it with profit are so few among us, that we can hardly hope to see it excepting in our libraries of the first class.

The California enterprise is vastly more legitimate and respectable than the Worcester one, although Mr. Loomis's volume is also rather more than half made up of extracts from Dr. Legge's. Any one who prepares such a thesaurus of authentic and valuable materials as the latter has done, must expect to have it freely drawn upon by compilers. It is only as compiler that Mr. Loomis comes before us, but he appears to have done his work conscientiously and earnestly, and with a worthy purpose. Certainly, the California public needs all the enlightenment respecting China and the Chinese history and institutions that it can be made to receive, in order to be led to treat its Chinese fellow-citizens as men, rather than as brutes—and so, in a less degree, do we upon this side of the continent, and the whole world of enlightened white men. Mr. Loomis—himself, we believe, for some time a missionary in China, like Dr. Legge—has had resort, throughout, to excellent and trustworthy sources, and has produced a highly readable and instructive book.

We have been solicitous rather to point out the general considerations which lend importance to these two publications, and so to direct toward them general attention and appreciation, than to win favor in their behalf by extracts or descriptions of their contents. Those who resort to them with the expectation of finding a purer morality, a higher wisdom, than we have access to elsewhere, will be disappointed. Nothing that the world has produced besides will bear comparison with the fruits of Hebrew inspiration, of Greek and Roman genius. Yet these are not to be understood, either in their general characteristics or in their special excellences, till they are set side by side with the best efforts of other races, and judged by them. Such historical study will strike down our arrogance, and inspire us with respect for our fellow-men, even while it teaches us to value more highly our own advantages.

FATHER LACORDAIRE.*

It was the opinion of the late Father Lacordaire, formed during a visit to England, and at the sight of the flourishing condition of certain Catholic foundations in that country, that the Catholic Church was destined in the course of time to reassert its sway over the stronghold of Protestantism, and, indeed, that all the forms of modern scepticism concentrating themselves in a single camp, and all the forms of faith collecting about the Catholic standard, the contest would be reduced to a battle between these two armies, in which the latter would be victorious. It is, moreover, the opinion of the author of this volume that the influence of Father Lacordaire in particular is destined rapidly to expand until all weak and wandering souls have felt its fortifying virtue, and until the uttermost ends of the earth have confessed its celestial efficacy. Under these circumstances, it seems not unsuitable to make some enquiry into the character and history of the remarkable man who entertained such ardent hopes and communicated them to others, the more especially as Father Lacordaire is in any event a singularly interesting object of study. He was a combination of the most dissimilar qualities and tendencies. His character was made up of elements partially hostile to each other, which, by the intensity of his will, he had reduced to unity and consistency. One of his disciples qualified him happily enough as "an ancient Christian in a modern man." He was a mediæval monk and a political liberal. His sympathies, one may say, dwelt in the future and his ideas in the past. He subjected his body to the most rigorous austerities known to the cloister at the same time that he protested against religious persecution, and raised his voice in favor of personal and political liberty. He revived in France that monastic order whose members were the most active servants of the Inquisition, and he founded and conducted a school in which an ample freedom of conscience was allowed to pupils. And, moreover, in all things his sincerity was without reproach. Whatever he did, he did with the accent of conviction.

* "The Inner Life of the Very Reverend Père Lacordaire, of the Order of Preachers. Translated from the French of the Rev. Père Chocarne, O. P." Dublin. 1867.

Jean-Baptiste-Henri Lacordaire was born in a small village in Burgundy in the year 1802—the year in which the Church emerged from the eclipse from which it had suffered during the régime of the Revolution. He was educated at Dijon under the care of an excellent mother. In his early years he showed signs of that passion for religious oratory which was to become the great resource of his manhood by preaching sermons to his nurse over the back of a chair. But as he grew older, and yielded himself to the discipline of public schools, his religious instincts died away, and were to be awakened again only by a personal experience of the vanity of earthly satisfactions. In 1822 he went up to Paris with the intention of studying law. He entered the office of an eminent advocate, worked hard, and was finally called to the bar, where he immediately gave evidence of his pronounced faculty for public speaking. But the very first sweets of professional success turned bitter upon his conscience. He gave himself up to religious meditations, and in May, 1824, proclaimed himself converted. His experience of the world had been brief—he was only twenty-two—but it had been intense. His feelings, indeed, were all intense, his nature was passionate, and he went in all things to extremities. To become a priest was to his mind the logical result of becoming a Christian, just as to become a monk was subsequently the logical result of becoming a priest. He entered the Seminary of St. Sulpice, began his theological studies, was ordained abbé, and spent several years in a state of strong religious and political fermentation. It was not in his nature to be idle; he longed for occupation and action, and at one time was on the point of starting as missionary to the United States, a country for which he always entertained a high esteem. The motive feeling of all his subsequent career was a desire for the perfect independence of the Church under the state, and he found his conception satisfied by the situation of the Church in this country. He was detained in France by an invitation to take part in the conduct of the Avenir newspaper, founded in 1830 by M. de Lamennais, and devoted to the maintenance of this programme as well as to that of various other liberal measures. The fate of the Avenir and its conductors has since become notorious. The latter carried their doctrines to an extreme which challenged the disapproval of the Papacy. They were summoned to Rome, and invited to retract. Lacordaire offered an immediate and total submission, and Lamennais held his ground, reiterated his views, and forthwith became for a time the black sheep of Catholic Christendom. Whatever may be the real value of the course taken by Lamennais, certain it is that Lacordaire was guilty of profound inconsistency, and that it is vain to attempt to prove, in the manner of the author of the volume before us, that there is no breach in the unity of his conduct. This is more than Lacordaire himself would have claimed. Absolute submission was in his eyes a duty whenever demanded by an ecclesiastical superior, but he would assuredly have admitted that it was a rupture with one's own development, and not a consummation and sanctification of it. He might, however, make express and isolated submission ad infinitum; he was unable to abjure the essential liberalism of his mind. On his return from Rome he began the series of "conferences" or sermons from the pulpit of Notre Dame, in Paris, which inaugurated and established his reputation and his influence as a sacred orator. During the years which ensued he conceived and matured the plan of reviving on French soil one of the extinct orders of monks, and finally decided in favor of the branch of the order of St. Dominic consecrated to preaching. This scheme offered a great variety of obstacles, but with courage, tact, and perseverance he successively overcame them, and in 1843 opened at Nancy the first of the new Dominican convents. He had passed his own novitiate in one of the Italian convents, and in 1840 had pronounced the solemn monastic vows which consecrated his final rupture with the world. But, in truth, to take leave of the world was for Lacordaire but to take possession of himself and his own genius. As a shaven and sandalled monk he was now to arrive at the perfection of his own development. He had recruited a considerable number of young men passionately desirous to embrace the Dominican career. He had in each case tested the soundness of their vocation, and when he had opened the house at Nancy he was able, as one may say, to stock it with persons of exemplary worth. At the close of 1840 he had reappeared in the pulpit of Notre Dame in his monastic habit, and had thereby authoritatively demanded and obtained tolerance for his order. Public opinion was the tribunal to which at all times Father Lacordaire ultimately appealed, and as, thanks to his irresistible eloquence as a speaker, he exercised a powerful sway upon the public temper, he seldom appealed in vain. The interval until 1854 was occupied with establishing new convents, to the number of four in all, preaching in various cities, and fostering with unwearied diligence the growth and influence of his order. In 1848 he was returned by the city of Marseilles as a member of the Constitutional Assembly of the new republic, a position which he occupied with no increase of reputation, and from which he speedily retired. One may say that throughout his career Father Lacordaire showed an indifference to superficial consistency of action, and a disposition to sacrifice it to the essential interests of the truth at stake, which do real credit to his sincerity. A good example of this tendency is offered by his acceptance of his election to the French Academy—an act which was thought at the time to be at flagrant variance with the character of an ascetic monk, but which he justified on the ground that he diverted the honor to the collective glory of his order, and that he made it a matter of conscience to repudiate no testimony that the monastic character was no obstacle to public consideration. In 1852 he had made a journey to England, and received from the spectacle of the three Dominican convents established in that country the gratifying impressions indicated at the outset of our remarks. Shortly after his return he entered upon the third and (to our mind) decidedly the most interesting phase of his career. He proceeded to the foundation of two houses of education, the colleges, namely, of Oullins and Lorège, in the neighborhood of Toulouse. For a very charming account of the latter establishment—the one over which he presided in person—we refer the reader to Mr. Matthew Arnold's little book, "A French Eton." In 1854 he had resigned the generalship of the French province of his order, and from that moment to his death had devoted himself to his pupils. He died in 1861.

His influence was exerted through three channels: his "conferences," his published writings, and, finally, his school. Belonging as we do to the profane and Protestant half of society, we are naturally able to form no estimate of the large spiritual empire which he is said to have exerted over the members of his order, his pupils, and those who placed themselves under his direction. His present biographer relates a number of instances of the spiritual efficacy of his contact and conversation. We can readily believe that he possessed the authority which accompanies great intensity of will, as well as the irresistible charm which belongs to passionate tenderness of feeling. Lacordaire had both of these gifts; and no small portion of his influence is logically explained by the fact that, besides being a most sagacious guide and an eloquent preacher, he was also a perfect exemplar and model of the spiritual virtues. He subjected his own person and character to the action of his will quite as much, and, indeed, decidedly more than he exerted it upon the lives of others. At the very outset of his career he seems to have reconciled himself by a prodigious moral effort to the utmost possible extremity of spiritual submission, so that never for an instant was he found wanting in perfect obedience, and so that, moreover, he never hesitated to enforce in all its rigor a virtue of which he was so completely the master. Nevertheless, severe as he was in his own regard, he was not so severe but that one is tempted to apply the simple term impudence to certain manifestations of his sacred fervor in the assumed interest of his friends. Of his own personal austerities, concerning which Father Chocarne gives some very curious details whereof we shall presently speak, one may hold such opinion as one finds it most natural to form; but what is one to think of such an anecdote as the following? A certain young man of wealth, satiated with pleasure, and longing for spiritual light and repose, had presented himself to the reverend father in quest of these treasures. Lacordaire had prescribed a retreat and meditation in a religious house, and ultimately the assumption of the Dominican habit; but the young man's friends had interfered and by their importunities had prevented him from acting upon this advice. The unhappy gentleman accordingly had spent a year in the utmost distress and irresolution of mind, yearning, and yet fearing, to break with the world and seek for peace in the cloister. At the end of this period he received a note from Lacordaire, summoning him to the apartment which he occupied when in Paris at the house of the Carmelites. The reverend father received him with great severity and rebuked him sternly for his weakness and cowardice. Then, suddenly inflamed by a sacred ardor, he commanded him to fall on his knees and lay bare his shoulders. The young man felt that it was not in him to disobey. Lacordaire seized a discipline of leathern thongs and inflicted a sound scourging. With the first blow the happy victim felt an ecstatic sense of relief. He had received his baptism. He rose with a fortified spirit and a complete absence of all doubts of his vocation. To perform such acts as this one certainly needs that sacred audacity which is a result of grace, but one also needs a little of that grosser sort of assurance which is merely a gift of nature.

The writings of Father Lacordaire may be fairly pronounced, on the testimony of the most impartial critics, works of no great value. His reading was extensive in certain directions, but his information was not large, and his compositions exhibit that poverty of thought which smites with its hideous barrenness all those works which come to the world through seminaries and cloisters. We do not of course mean to pass a sweeping condemnation on such works, we only mean that, to be read with satisfaction, they should be read also in seminaries and cloisters. It is only when the sound of the world's mighty life is shut out from our ears, and the fruits of its ceaseless labor hidden from our eyes, that we can forgive the want of criticism, the want of the faculty of appreciation, the want of reality—in a word, the intellectual insufficiency of books like our author's lives of Saint Dominic and Saint Mary Magdalen. We can enjoy them in our actual circumstances in a considerable degree, but this is not what the author asks. We must be moved, enlightened, converted. Ah! we exclaim, what a far different thing is the light of our profane desire. What we say of Father Lacordaire's writings holds good of his sermons as we now possess them. The reader is surprised that they should have stirred vast multitudes and awakened so many sleeping consciences. But here, as in the case of so many famous orators whom we know only by their printed discourses, we are obliged to fall back upon the delivery. There can be no doubt that there was a magic virtue in his utterance, manner, and aspect, and that it was in these things strictly that his eloquence lay.

Père Chocarne, the author of the volume before us, is simply an unquestioning enthusiast and devotee, from whom it would be folly to require any intelligent appreciation of the subject of his biography. His book is interesting, however, as an exhibition of the sort of profound attachment, and the kind of impression of absolute personal sanctity and value, which it was in the power of Father Lacordaire to produce. It justifies, moreover, its title by a full account of Lacordaire's private devotions and austerities. This remarkable man possessed so great a force of will that one is constantly in doubt as to where, in his career, passion ceased and volition began—as to when he was acting from inspiration and when he was acting on theory. We are quite unable to satisfy ourselves as to how far his assumption of the monastic character was a spiritual necessity, and how far a spiritual luxury—how far a matter of humility and how far a matter of pride. They order these things much better in the Catholic Church than we do in the world. Happy beings, the reader exclaims, as he peruses this record of the Dominican revival; happy beings, who could get such satisfaction out of your souls! who, burdened with this heavy, mortal necessity of a conscience, were able so cunningly to make it pay for its prerogative. Certain it is, however, that having once entered upon a monastic life, Father Lacordaire resolved to be a monk indeed. "A modern man," as one of his disciples pronounced him; but in no degree a modern monk. He plunged deep into the heart of the monastic ideal. "The hidden source of all his heroic resolutions," says his biographer, "the explanation of his whole life, (was) his love for Jesus Christ crucified. . . . Strange to say, even before his conversion, this idea of the cross of the Son of God seemed to pursue him. On the 15th of March, 1824, not being yet in possession of the faith, he writes: 'I should wish to be fastened alive to a wooden cross.'" He passionately cherished through life the idea of the actual physical crucifixion, and constantly strove to keep fresh in his mind the thought of its anguish by a variety of ingenious mechanical devices. At one time he actually had himself crucified for three hours by means of ropes. But at all times he practised the most painful and degrading mortifications—such as causing himself to be lashed to a column and scourged, having his brother monks spit in his face, washing and kissing their feet—if, indeed, the kissing did not come first. Infinitely revolting, one says of these things, but apparently Lacordaire found his account in them. They possessed an exquisite adaptation to the species of culture to which he had subjected himself, and there is no species of culture that this marvellous human nature of ours will not patiently endure. One thing is plain, that, whether very proud or very humble, Father Lacordaire is made, in the volume before us, the object of an intensity of homage which in these days falls to the lot of very few persons. He was, in truth, a very remarkable man, but he was less remarkable than at first sight he appears to be. Father Chocarne exhibits to us all that he possessed; but who will exhibit all that he lacked? No one, assuredly, is competent to the task. We have but to look about to the world, to the age, and to the swarming elements of our own lives, and we will get a faint impression of it. Cut a man off from all human responsibilities, from society, and from his time—free him from the shackles and embarrassments which wait upon the moments of him who honestly attempts to live—simplify his career to this degree, and he will be a sad weakling if he cannot show you some fair achievement as the fruit of his hours. From the beginning to the end of these records of Father Lacordaire's life, there is hardly a faint echo of the sounds and movements of our age. He ignored it. He averted his head and cried that it was not worth looking at. One may say, therefore, that he quite failed to understand it, and that the most vigorous attempts to work upon it from his standpoint will be of necessity mere sword-thrusts in water. For our own part, accordingly, we feel no uncertainty as to the worth of Father Chocarne's estimate of the destinies of his friend's influence.

Recent Republications.—We do not now recall any book of travels with which to compare this boat-log of Thoreau's *—now a quarter of a century old, and more—unless it be, in striking contrast, the unrhetorical, unimaginative, almost unreflecting canoe-log of the Rob Roy, in all the months and thousand miles of which the muscular Christian saw not so much as Thoreau observed in one of his seven precious days. Few men both loved and knew nature so well as the Concord surveyor, and very few have ever rivalled him in describing landscape, for which he united the insight of the naturalist, the sympathy of the poet, and the dexterous handling of the artist. "The shallowest still water," he remarks of Concord River, "is unfathomable. Wherever the trees and skies are reflected, there is more than Atlantic depth, and no danger of fancy running aground. We notice that it required a separate intention of the eye, a more free and abstracted vision, to see the reflected trees and the sky, than to see the river bottom merely." Painters know how difficult it is to represent these phenomena together. Of a shoal of minnows he says, fancifully, "they swept by as if moved by one mind, continually gliding past each other, and yet preserving the form of their battalion unchanged, as if they were still embraced by the transparent membrane which held the spawn." Among the shadows and the fish Thoreau was perfectly at home. "There is in my nature, methinks, a singular yearning toward all wildness." "In my Pantheon, Pan still reigns in his pristine glory. . . . Perhaps of all the gods of New England and of ancient Greece, I am most constant at his shrine." There lurks in this last expression his theological heresy, which is prominent in each of the seven chapters of his diary, and particularly that headed "Sunday." He wants tact in his assertions of dissent and unbelief, and there is often a gruff insouciance about him that repels needlessly the reader. He affects an untutored frankness and an extravagance of conceit which permit us to call him an intellectual and polished Walt Whitman, as might be verified by quotations of verse, if we had the space. As for the narrative in this book, it is a mere pretence. Nobody cares, and nobody will remember, where the voyage as such began and where it ended. Every object suggests a reflection of some sort or other, and at every turn the poets are lugged in, and so the day is spun out, for the most part agreeably. No one, however, for all the dry humor, and exquisite coloring, and abundant information, and antiquarian lore, and metaphysical speculation—no one, indeed, because of these—can read this book consecutively. Read at intervals, with leisure to think, to digest, to admire, and to differ, it is a permanently delightful chronicle, in spite of a certain affectation, occasional puerilities of style and even of thought, and obscurities not always worth lighting up.

Timeliest of all reprints, certainly, is this of the famous and as yet unequalled reports of Horace Mann, as secretary of the Massachusetts Board of Education.† They are all here—the statistics alone being omitted, by which Massachusetts might be compared with herself from 1837 to 1848—in a compact volume, preserving the arguments and illustrations with which Mr. Mann gradually wrought a complete reformation in the school system of the State, and gave to it that impulse towards a higher development which has sufficed to this day and will ever be his glory. Theologically, he was esteemed much more of a radical then than he would be now; and for that very reason his writings will commend themselves and prove peculiarly useful to the friends of education abroad, among whom both the extent and kind of education to be furnished by the state are now exciting unwonted attention. The conflict between the classicists and the advocates of a scientific training, the speeches of Mr. Lowe, Earl

* "A Week on the Concord and Merrimac Rivers. By Henry D. Thoreau." New and revised edition. Boston: Ticknor & Fields. 1868. Pp. 415.

† "Life and Works of Horace Mann. Edited by Mrs. Mary Mann." In five volumes. Vol. III. Boston: Horace B. Fuller. 1868. Pp. 758.

Russell, and the Duke of Argyll in England, and the action of M. Duruy in France, portend a revolution in established modes and institutions of learning. The shining example of the North, the even more striking example of education among the freedmen, convey a political lesson of the highest and also, fortunately, of the plainest significance. In the practical wisdom of Horace Mann those who mean to let down knowledge among the hitherto untaught, and therefore dangerous, classes, will find an invincible armory of reasoning and facts. To all such, wherever battling for popular education, we hold up this volume as America's best contribution.

Fine Arts.

PICTURES AT BOWDOIN COLLEGE.

We have received, from a gentleman connected with Bowdoin College, a letter concerning a collection of pictures in the possession of the college, elicited by our remarks on the Jarves collection in the Nation of Dec. 26. The substance of it is as follows:

Bowdoin College has long possessed one of the rarest and most valuable collections in the country. Named for the courtly Huguenot who founded and partly endowed it, the college received also from his generous hand a collection of ninety paintings which he had been gathering for many years in Europe, and among which he had secured some originals of recognized value. A later donation, by Col. G. W. Boyd, increased the collection to upwards of 130 pictures. It is not possible within the limits of a letter to give any adequate description of this gallery; but a few of the pictures may be mentioned as being of especial interest.

Rubens is represented in this gallery by four of his most successful pictures—one of Diana and Endymion, one of Ceres offering fruit to Venus, one of Achilles at the court of Lycomedes in female dress, discovered by Ulysses, according to the well-known story, and one of St. Simeon in the Temple holding the child Jesus. This last-named picture was well known in London when Sir Joshua Reynolds was president of the Royal Academy, and is the picture referred to in his lectures as one of the finest examples of Rubens's best work.

Vandyke has in this collection but a single painting; but that is in the line in which he won his special renown. It is a portrait of a governor of Gibraltar. The custodians of the gallery have been assured that this picture would find many purchasers in England at an appraisal of five or six thousand pounds.

"Mary and Elizabeth, with the infants Jesus and John," is attributed to Raphael. It has been pronounced by good authority as exhibiting in a certain degree "all the excellences of his best pictures."

The "Continence of Scipio" is a classical painting, thought by Stuart to be an original by Poussin, or a very excellent copy. In color and attitude it is one of the richest pictures of the collection.

Another fine group is "Venus binding Cupid." The painter is unknown. The picture was brought from the Grand Duke's palace at Florence.

The gallery contains three small paintings from the pencil of Hogarth. Francesco Salviati is represented by a painting on copper of "The Women at the Sepulchre." There is also an infant "John the Baptist," by Stella; one of Snyder's famous animal pieces, and various works of painters less widely known. The collection is rich in portraits; besides the one already mentioned by Vandyke, there is an original likeness of Mirabeau, a portrait of Savonarola, one of Lorenzo de' Medici, one of Garrick, and one (supposed) of Kepler. There is a genuine Copley, a portrait of Thomas Fluker, a secretary of the Province of Massachusetts, and portraits by Stuart of Presidents Monroe and Jefferson.

These art treasures may well have escaped the notice of even well-informed people, and perhaps have remained unappreciated and almost unknown to some of Bowdoin's own children, since they have been cooped up in a gallery so ill-arranged that they could not properly be said to be "on exhibition" at all. The Memorial Hall, which is projected and for which ground is already broken, will afford them accommodation where their merits can be both discoverable and accessible.

We have no knowledge of these pictures beyond that supplied by our correspondent; and are glad to learn that there is in Brunswick, Maine, where Bowdoin College is situated, a gallery of one hundred and thirty pictures owned by an institution of learning. It is a proof of the small interest taken by the American public in matters connected with art, and of the almost total absence of a class of persons having critical knowledge of the subject, that these pictures have been so little noticed. In Europe, a collection embracing four pictures ascribed to Rubens, one ascribed to Vandyke, one to Snyder, and the rest, would have been the cause of a great deal of public discussion. The pictures to which great names are attached would have been carefully examined by many experts; a vast amount of nonsense would have been written about them, of course, but some good sense as well; and in the end they would have been fairly enough estimated.

If there is a catalogue of the Bowdoin collection, it should give the history of each picture as far back as possible, and the results of whatever critical examination it may have had before leaving Europe. This is especially the case with pictures which have been long in this country; for the general criticism of pictures twenty years ago was much less accurate and exhaustive than it has become since that time. The Jarves collection is fortunate in this respect, that it has been through the fire of European criticism as lately as from 1857 to 1860, and that very many of the pictures composing it are well known to the superintendents and purchasing-agents of the great collections, who have been and are ready to buy this one and that for the galleries under their charge. Some pictures, whether because unusually important or because of questions about them hard to answer, still remain in Europe, though ultimately destined for the Jarves collection; they remain there to be absolutely verified. It is a matter of years and of close study, and that of many men, to fix by internal evidence the authorship of a picture. Documentary evidence, whether direct or merely illustrative, is also slow to collect. The naming of pictures in most of the great galleries has been a most curious jumble of blunders. Pictures obviously of Italian origin are coolly catalogued as by Velasquez in one case—by Holbein in another; in each instance because Velasquez or Holbein was unrepresented or poorly represented in the gallery in question. Modern investigation, comparison of styles and research among documents, has exploded a great many errors, but a host of bubbles still wait to be burst. Thus, Mr. Wornum has been showing ("Epochs of Painting," 447) that Philip Wouverman only worked for about thirty years, while there are attributed to him, as if of definitely ascertained fact, and by one authority, seven hundred and ninety-three minute and elaborate pictures; or rather more than one a fortnight for his thirty years. Then come the correlative and contrary blunders: Peter Wouverman, a younger brother and pupil, worked for some forty years; a fellow-townsman, Van Hugtenburg, for a still longer period of time; they were both distinguished and popular painters; but the same authorities which have been so generous to Philip Wouverman's fame, give two pictures to his brother and one to Hugtenburg. The whole of this and of other such chapters in the history of cataloguing is curious and instructive. And as regards Italian painting, the pleasant fables of Vasari must be ground up in a remorseless mill of investigation and criticism, upper and lower millstones of the Mill of Truth, like that in Henry Morley's charming fairy tale, before any trustworthy knowledge can be got out of them. Crowe and Cavalcaselle's new and unfinished "History of Painting in Italy" is the first at all adequate book which has come of recent study; awkward in arrangement and bad in style as it is, it is absolutely essential to one who would know what early Italian painting was, and who they were that made it what it was.

This by the way. These pictures at Brunswick may be all they are held to be, and it may be demonstrable that they are so. If only one fairly good Rubens is there, and one Vandyke, America is richer in art than we supposed.

TICKNOR & FIELDS'S LITHOGRAPHIC PORTRAIT OF DICKENS.

This is a very accurate likeness, and, as a picture, pleasantly soft and grey in tone. It seems to have been copied from a quite common photographic portrait of Mr. Dickens; and this way of producing a small-scale picture is not a bad one; not so good as getting a drawing after life by a master of portraiture; much better than having such a drawing made by any but a master. The photograph gives a likeness in feature and form beyond anything that the work of man, as we generally see it, can attain; but it gives, too, the no-expression of fixed attitude and motionless glare. Then the common portrait photographs produced in Europe and America are always harsh in contrast of light and shade, and in tone of color; and although a very few pictures have been made in Paris which are comparatively good in shade and in tone, they are not to be had for asking. Now, this picture, which Mr. Eytinge has drawn in crayon, is a great improvement upon any producible photograph of Mr. Dickens in pictorial beauty, while as a likeness it seems to be as satisfactory as any. The admirer of Dickens may have a photograph of him, but should not hang it up, it will be a blot upon his walls; this lithograph he should have neatly framed and hung where it can be seen.

The Nation.

VOL. VI.—NO. 134. THURSDAY, JANUARY 23, 1868. { Five Dollars per Annum. Twelve Cents per Copy.

CONTENTS.

The Week 61

Editorial Articles:
Who are the "Cowards?" 64
The Political Prospect in Europe 65

A New View of the Executive 66
Humanitarianism 68
England 69

Correspondence:
Bishop Dupanloup and Women's Education 71

Old-Book Catalogues 71

Notes:
Literary 71

"The Manners of the Day" in Paris ... 73
"Temple House" 74
North American Review for January .. 75
Recent Republications 76

Five Dollars per annum, in advance; Six months, Three Dollars; Forty Dollars to Clubs of Ten; Clergymen, Four Dollars.

The Nation is sent till positively ordered discontinued, and all arrears have been paid. Subscribers are particularly requested to note the expiration of their subscriptions, and to forward what is due for the ensuing year, with or without further reminder from this office.

George Street, 30 Cornhill, London, E. C., Agent for the Receipt of Subscriptions and Advertisements.

E. L. GODKIN & CO., PUBLISHERS, BOX 6732, NEW YORK CITY.

The Week.

During the past week there has not been much business done in Congress. Occasionally the debate is lively. Mr. Wood denounced the Reconstruction bill as "infamous," and the Fortieth Congress as equally "infamous," and was by a vote of the House ordered a reprimand, which was administered by the Speaker. His haughty dignity of demeanor, the scorn in his eye, and the scathing contempt revealed in his attitude and in every lineament of his face—the correspondent of the Herald says—gave him decidedly the advantage over his Radical foes. On the same day Mr. Farnsworth got himself into trouble by a display of ill-manners not very dissimilar, but escaped censure by apologizing. Mr. Bingham and Mr. Eldridge, Mr. Washburne and Mr. Ross, likewise enlivened the speech-making by personalities that would be not unamusing if Messrs. Ross, Washburne, Bingham, and the others were not representatives in Congress. On Thursday, Mr. Axtell, in the House, offered a resolution directing the Library Committee to enquire into the subject of international copyright, and the best modes of encouraging the production of cheap literature and protecting the interests of authors. Literary men will govern themselves accordingly; and not impossibly a report not dishonorable to Congress, if not a law honorable to Congress and the country, may be got before the adjournment. On Friday and Saturday reconstruction was again talked about in the House. The Senate was not in session those days. On Monday it was not long in session, and discussed the case of Mr. Thomas, and, incidentally to that case, the whole range of reconstruction legislation.

The new Reconstruction bill, converting the South into a single military district, and putting General Grant in control of it, passed the House on Tuesday, the principal speakers in its favor being Messrs. Boutwell and Bingham. Mr. Boutwell denounced the reactionary movement at the North, and said the result of it would be that opposition candidates would be returned to Congress at the South, and "the gates would be opened to allow repudiation and the assumption of Southern debts." He thought, however, that the reaction at the North was but temporary. It may be temporary; but we greatly fear it may last long enough to do more mischief than he will be able to repair. Mr. Garfield also made a speech, in which he gave the usual promise that the majority "would take no step backward," declared the President "the subordinate of Congress," and announced that Alabama would be in the Union, clothed and in her right mind, by February next, and that seven more States were now holding conventions, and two had ordered conventions to be held. We are quite satisfied the present majority will take no step backward. It is not for want of courage that anybody finds fault with them. What we fear about them is, that they are acting in such a way as to let the Democrats into power, and then the Democrats will take two or three steps backward, which will amount to just the same thing for all practical purposes as if the Republicans took them. For instance, have the Ohio Republicans receded from any position they ever held? Not an inch; yet there is a Democratic majority in the Legislature which has just taken a very decided step backward, by repealing the resolution ratifying the Constitutional Amendment of last year. What practical difference does it make who does this sort of thing, provided it is done? And what is the use of the Republican leaders bragging to us of their "courage" if their "courage" simply hastens the delivery of the citadel to the enemy? Some of them have become so befogged that they really seem to feel that the struggle at Washington is a kind of tournament carried on in the main for the honor and glory of the party, and not to secure certain practical political results.

Mr. Bingham's last speech on the bill was very effective, and appears to have thrown the Washington correspondents into ecstasies, but it reads exactly like a college "oration," and touched nearly every point except the one on which the country needs to have light thrown. It was, as reported in the daily papers at least, entirely devoted to proving what has been proved from one thousand t ofifteen hundred times during the past two years, that the war destroyed the local governments at the South, that it is the duty of the general Government to reconstruct the local governments on the basis of freedom and equality, and that the work of reconstruction has to be done with the aid of the military arm. But then we were all agreed about these things long ago, and three bills have been passed already for the purpose of reconstructing on these terms, and the first one has been in operation for nearly a year, and the work of reconstruction under them has been, we are assured, both by the press and the politicians, going on satisfactorily. General Garfield, to whom Mr. Boutwell yielded the floor, in this very debate gave the best possible account of its progress. He expects one State back in the Union in February, and says seven others are preparing to come. What the public wants to hear about this last bill, therefore, is some proof of its necessity. We know all about "the guilt of the rebellion," "the inalienable rights of man," the opinions of "that profound thinker Montesquieu" on the judiciary, etc., etc. What we want to know now is, What are the precise reasons for bringing in this Reconstruction Bill No. 4? Have the others proved failures? Is reconstruction not going on under them? What has Mr. Johnson or General Hancock done to retard reconstruction which this new bill will prevent or remove? Is not the mere introduction of it, without strong and palpable cause, calculated to shake the confidence of the North in the wisdom of the majority and the confidence of the South in its sincerity? What new facts have come to light about Mr. Johnson since last July which make so great and sudden a change as this bill involves even desirable? If Mr. Bingham will answer these questions, which we ask in perfect honesty and simplicity, we promise to "crowd round him during the delivery of his speech," as the correspondents say, "and congratulate him warmly at the close."

There was a very amusing tussle in the House on Thursday between Mr. Eldridge and Mr. Bingham, the former wanting to know what "pre-existing government" Mr. Boutwell proposed to guarantee by the new Reconstruction bill, and the latter trying to answer, but, as his custom is, in tropes and similes, and Mr. Eldridge refusing to allow him. Mr. Eldridge is not himself a master of rhetoric by any means, inasmuch as on this very occasion "words failed him to denounce the bill with the feelings and emotions which inspired him," whatever this may mean. But he did good service in trying to prune Mr. Bingham's oratory. It is really too luxuriant for this latitude and these times. There is unquestionably a close connection between the state of a man's mind and the language in which he expresses himself, and nobody, we assert without hesitation, can have the mental balance, the respect for facts, and the discipline of faculties necessary for the profitable discussion of the great questions now before the country whose brain is as much burdened with metaphors and epithets as Mr. Bingham's. No statesman—that is, no man whose opinion on political affairs is carefully formed—talks in this way in our day. Orators were flowery and involved and stately in the seventeenth century, but this was excusable in men who learned and thought and wrote in Latin. In our time such talk simply argues mental inflammation, and puts everybody on his guard who believes language ought to express thought.

Democrats and people of Democratic leanings seem to have been, during the past week, greatly troubled lest Mr. Stanton should not resign, and by way of inducing him to do it, they have painted in dark colors the "bad taste" of staying in when the President did not want him, and they appeal feelingly to his "gentlemanly instincts." If Mr. Stanton were to resign now, however, out of regard for the convenances, it would put his conduct in refusing to resign when the President first asked him in a very ridiculous light, as it would suggest the inference that he simply stayed in to spite him, and would reduce the contest between the President and Congress on this question to a war of children for the mastery. The object of the Tenure of Office bill, we believe, was not simply to snub the President, but to prevent his using his power for the confusion of the legislature and the frustration of its policy at a very important crisis, and so far as it related to Mr. Stanton at all its object was not that he should stay in because the President did not like him, but that he should stay in to secure the proper performance of certain official duties. The stories that have been in circulation of Grant and Sherman having advised him to resign, assume that these gentlemen are not overburdened with business of their own, or do not like attending to it.

The Supreme Court has decided that it will take up the McCardle case in March, by which time it is to be hoped the friends of the bill now pending for the regulation of the court will be less anxious for its passage. The Senate will doubtless at the same time let the bill lie by for the present, and we are not without hopes that we may never hear more of it. If it be desirable to make secure of Congress against judicial usurpation in the manner proposed, let it be done in quiet times, or, if these are not within reach, at least without reference to any particular case. The New York Tribune supports the bill by the argument that inasmuch as two hundred men, many of them "better jurists" than any on the bench, concur in passing an act of Congress, it is monstrous to allow the vote of a single judge to set it aside. There is something in this, but the argument might have been made stronger. The majority in Congress is not only more numerous than the majority of the Supreme Court, but weighs more in avoirdupois. Surely this ought not to be overlooked, especially in a case in which the "political enfranchisement of a race of four millions" is involved. The consideration to which we called attention last week, that this bill, and all bills like it, are weapons which a Democratic majority will use just as eagerly as a Republican majority, and under cover of which the rights of the colored people may be grossly assailed as well as defended, is, we are glad to see, being urged by the press in various parts of the country. Nobody who looks forward a few years can help being impressed by it, and when the days of Democratic rule come Mr. Bingham's rhetoric will not help us. In fact, the fountains of his eloquence will probably be sealed up by the "previous question" or a "five minute rule."

At the South, this week, perhaps the most prominent figure is General Meade, who continues to confound the politics of the Georgia conservatives, and has made them all extremely angry. They seem to have thought that Mr. Johnson knew his man thoroughly, and that it was because of Meade's conservative opinions that Pope was so summarily ousted. Pope's disgrace caused an immediate meeting of the Democratic club of Atlanta; and these worthies passed, with rejoicing, some resolutions conceived in the worst possible taste and expressed in Confederate English. Pope was denounced in a long preamble; the President was thanked in the first resolution for removing him from command, and in the second Meade was styled a gentleman and a soldier, and a line of policy was kindly marked out for him. In short, he was given to understand that he was not only confidently expected to be anti-Republican, but that he would do well to walk heedfully in the presence of gentlemen who had just decapitated his predecessor. All the plans and expectations have failed mournfully. General Meade's address to the convention showed plainly that he is not at all what Mr. Johnson would call a Johnson man, or Mr. Seymour a Democrat, or Mr. Vallandigham a patriot American. Then came his collision with Governor Jenkins and the State Comptroller, officials of the provisional government, who denounce as unconstitutional the convention now sitting by authority of Congress, and are resolved that at any rate the members shall not be paid. As regards the law, Meade seems to have as much the advantage of his antagonists as he has in fact. Mr. Jenkins is out of office certainly; and will probably stay out till the Supreme Court pronounces the reconstruction legislation unconstitutional and persuades Congress to yield its legislative power. As to the law, Governor Jenkins pleads an enactment which, as the Southern States are at present, is of so much force as it may please the military governor to give it. Governor Jenkins has lost his office by pre-deciding the question of the constitutionality of the reconstruction law, but that he has gained anything we do not see.

Mr. Humphrey Marshall, of Kentucky, has been issuing "views" on the finances which, though not valuable, are worth reading. He is in favor of paying the bondholders in currency, of course, his argument being that one promise of the Government is as good as another; but then the bond does not promise another promise—it promises cash. He also, as might be expected, is in favor of a fresh issue of greenbacks. "What we want," he says, "is high prices and low taxes, and the way to attain them is to have cheap money and plenty of it." He thinks, moreover, that by issuing plenty of greenbacks, you can bring down the interest on loans from eighteen per cent., where it appears it now stands in Kentucky. When one finds a man of Mr. Marshall's age and position laboring under the delusion that "high prices" in paper are really high prices, and that the rate of interest depends on the quantity of the currency, one does not well know what to say. But one thing we feel certain about. If we held his "views" on money, we should advocate the issue of just as much legal tenders as could be printed inside the next twelve months. Not only would we issue enough to bring interest down to seven per cent., but to nothing. We would issue enough to give every man so much money of his own that he would never need to borrow at all, and the usurer's occupation would be gone. More than this—we would issue enough to enable every man to retire from business and devote himself to self-culture. To have human beings toiling in mills and forges and on farms when a few turns of a printing-press would enable them to be their own banker and travel in Europe, is worse than a blunder; it is a crime. It begins to be clearer every day that the inflationists have discovered the philosopher's stone. Mr. Marshall tells the people they have "voices and votes," and urges them to use them. So do we; but we advise them, when asking for a fresh issue of paper, not to limit themselves to a paltry thousand millions. One hundred thousand dollars for each white head of a house is the very lowest demand they ought to make on the Treasury. Let the people speak out in tones of thunder.

If the great want of the time be more greenbacks, and if the more there are issued the better off we shall be, it is hard to see why Congress need be so much afraid of the Southerners claiming compensation for their slaves and for other damage suffered during the war. What harm could possibly result from issuing enough paper money, when once the printing-press is in motion, to satisfy them? It would either revive industry at the South or, better still, make industry unnecessary, and would diffuse contentment through a great many regions which are now the seats of strife and heartburning. Is it worthy of "practical men" to keep the South impoverished, merely by way of vengeance, when one wagon-load of engraved paper would make its people happy and prosperous?

The German immigration during the last two years has been nearly double that of the Irish, the latter, in fact, showing some signs of falling off, as if the sources were becoming somewhat exhausted. The political troubles in Germany, and the extension of the Prussian military system, have doubtless had much to do with stimulating the emigration of the Germans, and for political reasons it is highly desirable, as far as this country is concerned, that the tide should continue to flow in increasing volume. The Germans have the political sense, and they are fond of agriculture and prefer beer and light wines to whiskey, not one of which propositions can be affirmed of the Irish. The latter are gregarious in the extreme, dislike agriculture, and, both for these and for religious reasons, have a tendency to mass in the great cities and form foreign bodies, whose imperviousness to the ordinary influences of American life increase in the direct ratio of their size. They have introduced, too, an effervescing element in American politics which needs just such a corrective as the Germans supply, and they seem to have a most exciting influence on the more scatterbrained of American politicians such as the Germans do not exercise, and, in fact, do much to counteract.

The luckiest thing that ever happened to George Francis Train in his life has just happened him in Ireland. He has been arrested and for a brief period committed to a British dungeon. The only thing needed to complete his happiness was that there should be a bloody war for his deliverance, but—sad to say—he has been released. We believe, in spite of the "learning" which has been expended on the subject in some of the daily papers, there is neither in the law of nations nor in the municipal law of England any reason why Mr. Train should not be arrested in a British port if he was fool enough to go there. Koszta's case has been cited as bearing in some way on his, but it does not in the least. Koszta's arrest was contested because he was the bearer of an American consul's passport in a country in which foreign consuls have criminal jurisdiction over all persons who claim their protection. Therefore the Austrians had no right to seize him nor the Turks to deliver him up under any circumstances. Train, on the other hand, has deliberately gone to a country whose government he has been denouncing, and, being in a portion of it in which arbitrary arrest is now legal, he has been seized and put in prison. In other words, the very same law has been applied to him which is applied to natives. It only became the duty of the American minister to insist on his either being brought to trial or liberated, for the continued detention of a foreign traveller against whom no specific charge can be brought is, of course, not a thing which this Government could submit to; but in the mere arrest itself there was absolutely nothing to get up a fuss about. Train has brought a suit against the British Government for £100,000.

A large body of the Catholic clergy in Ireland have signed a declaration in which they pronounce a repeal of the legislative union between England and Ireland, and the assimilation of their relations in all respects to those between Austria and Hungary, to be the only remedy for Irish grievances. The document is calm, moderate, and well written. It acknowledges that the penal laws have caused the Irish to fall behind in the race of civilization, in that they are now inferior to both the English and Scotch in social and industrial training, and that, therefore, they need peculiar legislative treatment to raise them up—such treatment as they cannot hope for from a body so ill-informed on Irish matters, and so unsympathetic as the British Parliament. This statement of the case, if made two or three years ago, would have been either totally disregarded by the English press or have been treated with contempt; but, thanks to "Fenian outrages," it is now discussed by the whole press with gravity and respect—a fact which throws a good deal of light on the causes of Fenianism. Of course, the declaration, instead of helping the solution of the Irish question, only hinders it. The repeal of the union England will never consent to, and would spend her last man and last shilling in resisting. Then, no man who considers what kind of body an Irish Parliament elected by universal suffrage would be, can possibly believe that it would be competent for its task. Its blunders would not resemble those of the old Protestant Parliament, but they would be nearly as great hindrances to progress.

The French are still occupied with their new Army bill, but the Government, after a hard fight, sustained one bad defeat in the Chamber on the clause fixing the period at which the soldier might marry, the Chamber making it the sixth year of service instead of the eighth. Marshal Niel, who has shown considerable ability as a debater, roused a terrible storm by blurting out the proposition that the men who were pronounced physically unfit for military service were, for the most part, good enough for marriage, and that therefore the prohibition to marry during the flower of their age imposed on the 800,000 or 900,000 men of whom the French army will be composed under the new law is no great damage to the country after all. This has roused the fury of the press, and not unnaturally. The picture drawn by M. Rouher, during the discussion, of the armaments of other European nations was frightful. He made out the total force under arms of the four great powers with which France might possibly be called on to contend at 4,840,000; but M. Maurice Block, a statistician of some eminence, has attacked this estimate and reduced it by nearly one-half, showing that, judging from past experience, the total force which these powers can be expected to bring into the field in time of war is 2,743,891, and that the real measure of military strength is no longer the number of men who can be mustered under the colors, but the number that can be fed and clothed and armed and paid; in other words, that a nation's fighting power depends almost altogether on the state of her finances. It is safe to say, however, that M. Rouher's estimate represents pretty faithfully the loss to the community of the standing armies now kept up in Europe, even though it fails to give a correct idea of the force available for attack or defence. One thousand men cannot be put into the field without disabling about two thousand for industrial purposes.

The financial difficulty in Italy continues to be the great one. The Roman question can wait for a solution, the financial question cannot. The budget for 1868, which has just been laid before Parliament by the Minister of Finance, shows an excess of expenditure over revenue of $40,000,000—in gold, of course—the revenue amounting to $160,000,000 and the expenditure to $200,000,000. Various remedies are talked of; one is a tax on all flour as it leaves the mill, and on wine, oil, and silk, from all of which about $30,000,000, it is thought, could be drawn. The floating debt will probably be met by the sales of church property, which are still going on, and are very productive. This floating debt amounts to $75,000,000 represented by legal-tender bank-notes, and about $50,000,000 represented by Government bonds. The fuss they are making about the debt in Italy, however, will seem strange to many financiers here, and shows how far behind the age poor old Europe still is. All the Italian Government has to do in order to get rid of all its difficulties is, as we here know, to issue enough legal-tender bank-notes to pay off everything. With five dollars worth of ink and five reams of thin paper, not only might the national liabilities be entirely wiped out, but a handsome surplus eft in the treasury. Why do the simpletons not send a commissioner over here to consult General Butler or Humphrey Marshall?

Articles on any of the subjects usually discussed in this journal will be received from any quarter. If used, they will be liberally paid for; if rejected, they will be returned to the writers on the receipt of the requisite amount of postage stamps.

All Communications which pertain to the literary management of THE NATION should be addressed to the Editor.

WHO ARE THE "COWARDS?"

If anybody will take the trouble to look into the files of any of the daily papers appearing during the summer and fall of 1865, he will find that foremost amongst the arguments used by leading Radicals against the admission of Southern senators and representatives to Congress without conditions, was the danger that if admitted they would join hands with the Northern Copperheads in an assault on the public credit. They would, it was said, either openly repudiate or else vote such enormous amounts by way of compensation for damages sustained during the war as to plunge the Government into bankruptcy. The very earliest arguments, too, used in advocacy of negro suffrage were drawn from the supposed necessity of an alliance between the Republicans and the negroes for the protection of the public credit, and many of our readers may remember that the first and most anxious enquiries made by Northern men when the South was first opened to travellers touched the state of Southern feeling about the public debt. At that time the public debt—and in gold and silver, not in irredeemable paper—was spoken of by all Republicans as a sacred thing. In fact, to speak of it with reverence was one of the Republican characteristics, while to denounce it, and predict it would never be paid, was the mark of a Copperhead, and loyal men used to listen to Copperhead utterances on this subject as to blasphemy or obscenity. The bondholder, too, instead of being held up to loathing as a heartless usurer, was spoken of as the ancient Egyptians might have spoken of the sacred bull, as beings whom it was a pleasure as well as a duty to pamper.

We have no doubt whatever that the same state of feeling would have lasted till now had the reconstruction process gone on well. What it is that has hindered or retarded it everybody knows. Mr. Johnson has unquestionably had the largest, and by far the largest, share in the work of obstruction, but then he was not wholly to blame. Some of the Radical leaders must, as we have often said, shoulder some portion of the responsibility. We do not find fault with any of their leading measures. We believe that, on the whole, Congress has advanced from stage to stage in the process with great wisdom and prudence; but the majority, in the pride of their strength, overlooked one thing, and that was, that the harder and more complicated their task became, the more necessary it was to carry the public with them. In a popular government, it is not enough to conceive and carry wise measures; popular support must be secured for them in order to ensure them against being defeated or repealed by a reaction. This part of their business the Radical leaders almost wholly neglected. There was nothing in the training or antecedents of any of them to entitle them to the complete confidence of the public in undertaking the solution of so tremendous a problem as the pacification of the South. Mr. Lincoln left no statesman behind him who had in this matter earned the public faith and confidence. Neither Mr. Stevens nor Mr. Boutwell, for instance—and we say this of them without meaning the slightest disrespect—had ever offered any proof of competency for any such undertaking. They had, it is true, been zealous anti-slavery men, but this was no more a proof of fitness for the task of devising and carrying out the work of reconstruction than their having labored in any other field of philanthropy. Their political experience had been simply experience in the working of parties in Washington, which, for the treatment of the Southern question, was worthless, and perhaps worse than worthless. But to one thing their prominence in the anti-slavery struggle and during the war did entitle them, and that was the first trial at the new business. Nobody in political life had given any greater proof of fitness for it than they, and their long-tried zeal and devotion undoubtedly gave them a claim to the first innings.

The work once begun, there was only one thing that could have released them from the duty of fully discussing before the people and with the people every detail of it, debating it till debate was exhausted, hearing its adversaries patiently, replying to their arguments elaborately, and exhausting their resources, in short, at each step, in order to secure public approbation before taking another step—and that was either the inspiration of the Reconstruction Committee, or the possession by some member of it of a revelation from on high setting out the whole process in full. Every politician who cannot say he has drawn his wisdom from supernatural sources is bound to come down into the arena and submit his measures to discussion, hear what his adversaries have to say against them, elicit the popular feeling about them, and, if the popular feeling is adverse, win it over by argument. He has no right to pop out of a committee-room, summon a majority, and say, "Here's your bill; it is all that is necessary; we shall allow no debate on it; if you are silly and wicked enough to insist, you may take five minutes for your foolish rant, but no more; as to the people, we cannot wait for its opinion; but we know it's all right; it has confidence in us; the time's up; take the vote." Legislating in this way is discounting the future, like living on money you expect to make; you may make it, but you may not, and your position is exceedingly awkward if you do not; and yet this is the very way in which most of the reconstruction legislation has been done. The consequence is, that the public has not been carried along in support of it; it has kicked and hung back more and more violently every month; and for the last six months the majority has been in the very unsatisfactory and somewhat desperate position of trying to save the nation against its will. The confidence it expected to find showered upon it by this time is not forthcoming. The symptoms of disorganization in the party, which showed themselves last fall at the State elections, increase in number and gravity, and there is every day greater and greater anxiety with regard to the future.

It was the growth of this feeling of weakness, of the sensation that things were not going well with the party, that first caused some of the Republican politicians to fall away from the primitive faith on the subject of the public debt. On seeing the ranks waver before negro suffrage, General Butler and Mr. Stevens bethought them of the old device of promising their followers plunder. The Democrats, they saw, were gathering in recruits very fast by holding out this prospect; when the dodge was so successful in the hands of the friends of privilege, why should not the friends of equality use it? The plan of taunting those who refused to follow them with "cowardice" was tried, but with very limited success. Its absurdity was too patent for it to succeed. As we have said before, there was nothing in the antecedents or attainments or character of many of the Radical leaders to warrant them in calling on anybody to follow them blindly in such a business as reconstruction. They were entitled to a patient and attentive hearing, but they were not entitled to implicit submission without argument. We all know as much about "eternal justice" and "inalienable rights" as Mr. Stevens does, or Mr. Boutwell, or Mr. Bingham, and none of them has anything new to tell us about "the guilt of the rebellion." What we have always wanted to hear from them was, therefore, not general disquisitions on the rights of man, but their reasons for thinking their plan of reconstruction a good one—i. e., one likely to succeed; but of these they have been uncommonly sparing.

Finding now that the public is not as strong in its support of their reconstruction plan as is desirable, some of the leaders are seeking to revive their popularity, as we have said, by preaching a disguised form of repudiation, though the disguise is so thin that it serves no purpose whatever. If they imagine that anybody will be deluded into believing that the public debt is honestly paid when it is paid in greenbacks, they deceive themselves grossly. Everybody who gets this kind of money for his bond will not only think himself cheated, but will be made furious by the presumption that he is a fool, on which this mode of paying him is based. Downright repudiation would be every way more creditable and far more polite. We see in the whole scheme, however, a shining example of the real cowardice of which these men, who are so ready to fling the charge at others, are capable. They are not afraid—we know what the proverb or the poet, we forget which, says about the audacity of fools—of violent and extravagant courses, of absurd propositions, of sudden changes of counsel, of aimless and senseless defiance of reason and experience; they are not afraid of advising that the nation should dishonor itself by repudiating the representations of its own agents, and construing its own acts to the fraud and detriment of those who trusted it with their money in the hour of its need. But the kind of "courage" we want in public men is not the kind which Wendell Phillips so loudly calls for, and which Messrs. Stevens and Butler so lavishly display—the courage to be unscrupulous, dexterous, reckless—but the courage to be right under all circumstances; the courage to stick to principle not in one thing, but in all things, and to stick to it come what will; the courage to be just and honorable not towards the negro only, but towards all men—to be faithful not simply to pledges made to blacks, but to pledges made to white men; to act in the spirit and not in the letter of their promise, not simply towards the freedmen who fought for the country, but to the poor and widows and orphans who lent the money to feed and arm the freedmen, and who lent it when many of the shrewdest doubted whether a cent of it would ever be paid, even in General Butler's "money." We advise the "cowards," too, who refuse to follow these "great leaders," to be of good cheer. No man was ever wanting in his duty either to his party or his country who was afraid to be tricky and made no secret of it. When they see "grand public men" "leaping ahead" and encouraging them to follow by the assurance "that revolutions never go backwards," let them remember that even if revolutions never do go backwards, they often fall into the ditch and remain there for many a day, a curse and not a blessing to humanity, the scoffing and scorn of many generations. They need brains and discretion to conduct them just as much as does the regular progress of government.

There is one other thing which Republican politicians who feel disposed to go into the repudiation business would do well to remember, and that is, that if they should succeed in winning the party over to their way of thinking, they will gain nothing by it. Whenever the people has been worked up to the degree of unscrupulousness necessary for the denial of its moral obligations, the mechanical part of the business—the job of sending the public creditors away with bits of paper instead of gold, and laughing at their chagrin—will not be committed to Republicans. Whenever repudiation is deliberately adopted as a policy, the task of carrying it out will be entrusted to the Democrats. It is their idea; they originated it, have studied it, and know how it ought to be done. The Stevenses and Butlers are mere amateurs and imitators; and as soon as their preaching had produced the desired effect would assuredly be cast aside without either gratitude or remorse, and would have to make their way back to the place of beginning over a path strewed with the bones of foundered politicians of tricksters who lost their faith in righteousness before the promised land came in sight, and wandering off in search of a short cut, perished miserably among the beasts.

THE POLITICAL PROSPECT IN EUROPE.

THERE is an important change going on in European political sentiment which promises to make the events of the next ten or fifteen years extremely interesting and important—and that is a steady and apparently permanent reaction against imperialism, or "personal government," or that, whatever it may be called, which lodges the direction of national policy in the hands of one man. After the failures of 1848–49, the shrewdest observers both in England and on the Continent began to look to the imperial system—thrones resting on universal suffrage—as the ultimate destination of the whole of the civilized world. It was by that time quite evident that aristocracy, as a political force, was ruined—that privileged classes were things of the past—that "the masses" would govern; and even men of as philosophic a turn of mind as De Tocqueville thought that after having, during a few years, tried to govern and failed, they would seek safety and repose in the establishment everywhere of a "one-man power." During the ten years from 1850 to 1860, this opinion gained force steadily, through the spectacle of Louis Napoleon's administration in France, and it may be said to have reached its maximum strength in 1861, at the outbreak of the rebellion here. What speculators then saw in the future was, first, a brief attempt at republicanism in nations which had not already tried it, and, secondly, the division of the civilized world among a batch of imperial dynasties, which were to make up for the inevitable appearance, now and then, of a stupid Cæsar by a highly organized, all-pervading, all-providing system of administration, permitting a high degree of literary culture and unlimited scientific research, diffusing material comfort by every means in its power, and, in fact, making the perfecting of material life the highest object of its ambition.

Nor was this expectation based simply on the success of the Imperial régime in France. There were certain phenomena in England which afforded a good deal of support to it, such as the increasing demand on the Government for greater centralization, owing to the constant failure of the system of local independence; the growing tendency to commit to it the telegraphs, the railroads, the education of the poor; to exact from it more assiduous and organized interference with charitable institutions, public conveyances, the hours and other conditions of labor in mines and factories; and, in fact, the strong current of public sentiment which has now been running for ten years against complete individual freedom in anything but trade. If these things, said the imperialists, are to be witnessed in England, the country in which the principle of individualism and local self-government has been almost worshipped, what may we not expect to see in the rest of Europe? America still remained an apparent exception to the rule, but she was held to have been brought under it by the rebellion. The outbreak of the war, it was said, meant, of course, the rise of standing armies, the centralization of the government, the disappearance of State lines, and the gradual melting down of society into one solid mass.

Moreover, the desire ot material comfort, which had grown in our day into a passion, it was evident could be gratified no longer by individual enterprise. To supply men's wants on an adequate scale and with adequate efficiency we have to have now great corporations or combinations of capitalists, employing whole armies of agents and subordinates, and through this and their enormous wealth wielding great political influence. No society would, it was said, ever consent to be ruled by bodies of this sort (they did not think of New Jersey), and, therefore, to keep them in check and hold them to proper responsibility and make them do their work efficiently, the state would have to be armed with great powers of interference and supervision. To exercise these powers a vast and complicated administrative system would have to be devised, the machinery of which could only be entrusted to highly trained hands, and which it would be found eventually could not be managed or controlled by deliberative bodies, but would have to be given over to one head. Therefore, even in America, supposing the war had never broken out, the prevailing rage for material enjoyment would, in the long run, have sapped the popular love of freedom and self-government, and prepared the way for the enlightened despot. The love of "liberty" was, in fact, dying out in the modern world, owing to the declining intensity of feeling on all subjects. Nobody any longer felt very strongly about anything. In the age in which "liberty" was looked on as the highest good, men went to the stake or sent others to it for points of doctrinal belief. They are not such fools now. They want ease of mind and ease of body, and are tending towards the form of government which will best secure these; and they are no longer dazzled by the sayings and doings of classical times.

The new régime has, luckily for us all, now been tried, and failed. France has furnished the corpus vile for the experiment; but the result has been tested pretty thoroughly in other countries also. The use which the Imperial Government has made of the army and of the treasury has satisfied thinking men all over Europe, in England, France, and Germany, that imperialism, so far from being the government of the future, has been proved totally unsuited to modern society; that, far from being what great political and social complications call for, political and social complications make it utterly worthless; that the social state to which it is suited is that of ancient Rome or of the Middle Ages or modern Russia; that, where you have an industrial and commercial community, it cannot be governed by one man without the most disastrous consequences. In the first place, the physical force which is now placed by a modern state in the hands of its government, the force of money and of men, is enormous, such as no ancient or mediæval ruler ever dreamt of. It is so great that no man can, in the present state of human culture, find himself in the possession of it without having his head turned. Louis Napoleon is, it is true, a great advance in moral training on any Roman emperor, except, perhaps, the Antonines. He not only knows more, but he has himself under far better control, even if his desires are no better, and he acts under the invisible but powerful pressure of a force of which the Roman emperor knew nothing—the opinion of the civilized world. But then his powers of mischief are so greatly increased that his slight aberrations are more dangerous to the community than Nero's madness. He is still a man; he has foolish ambitions, personal spites, prejudices, and fears; and when he goes to war, instead of disappearing amongst remote barbarians, as the Roman general did, and leaving the state behind to go on very much as before, he convulses society in his own dominion, and fills the civilized world with alarm, paralyzes the trade and industry on which the larger portion of its population lives, and disarranges the vast and elaborate mercantile calculations by which the work of progress is in our day largely carried on. The Italian war, the Mexican expedition, and the German war, and the uncertainty which they have all left behind them, have established the principle that the governments of modern communities must be deliberative governments, must be carried on under the supervision of public opinion, not so much that the public may be able to influence events—though this is important—but that it may know what is going to happen. The timid trader, who cried out so loudly in 1848 for "the man on horseback" to save him from the revolutionists, now acknowledges, after twenty years' experience, that under the man on horseback business is almost impossible, because you can never tell what he will do next.

Moreover, "personal government" has been shown to be fatally incompetent to deal with financial questions, owing to the large standing armies it requires. Owing to the size of these standing armies, there is at this moment not a single government in Europe, except England, able to meet its annual expenditure by taxation. In France, which has furnished the great example of the imperialist system, the public debt has increased 130 per cent. in thirteen years, and taxation is increasing with it, while population remains stationary. Now, what makes standing armies necessary is undoubtedly the personal fears, jealousies, and ambitions of the sovereigns. In modern societies there is no large class, as there was in mediæval societies, which likes fighting in the field and wants to serve in the army. There is no class in France, for instance, which longs to cross the Rhine and ravage Prussia, and no class in Prussia which would like to do as much for France. The middle and working classes in our day want peace and security and light taxation, and this want is, if left to act freely, fatal to military ambition and wars of conquest and revenge. But the personal ruler has his little jealousies and ambitions with regard to other personal rulers. He likes to frighten them, or snub them, and make them feel their inferiority and succumb to his influence, and he is constantly afraid that if he gives them a chance they will come and attack him; he therefore has to provide himself at any cost with the means of reaching them, and persuades the nation that it is their honor he is defending and their safety he is providing for in doing so.

This fact, also, is becoming better and better known and recognized, and of late the leading German and French writers have drawn attention to it with great emphasis. The new Army bill in France will probably give additional point to their arguments. The theory with regard to the future government which is now finding most favor is, that it will be that of a highly educated democracy, in which wealth will exercise great influence, and in which politics will be largely subordinated to the production and preservation of wealth, and in which property will be protected, as it was not in the ancient democracies, by a greater knowledge on the part of the poor of the conditions on which production and distribution depend. If this does not succeed, the world will have to give up trading and go back to agriculture and pasturage, because neither under untaught democracy nor under unbridled despotism can commerce and manufactures flourish.

[COMMUNICATED.]

A NEW VIEW OF THE EXECUTIVE.

Those who have read Mr. Walter Bagehot's papers on the English constitution, as also those who have not, will find in an editorial in the Economist of December 7 (Mr. Bagehot is editor of the Economist, and presumably the writer of this editorial) an interesting discussion of the difficulties between Mr. Johnson and Congress; or, perhaps we should say, between our executive and our legislature, since the writer waives all examination into the merits of existing questions, looking merely at the relation of the one branch of government to the other. The idea on which the observations in this article are based is a comparatively new one in England, while it is so absolutely novel in this country as to have excited no attention whatever among us. The author is either Mr. Bagehot or some one inspired by his book on the constitution to which we have referred.

If any American child of the high-school age is asked to state, in a few words, the theory on which the machinery of our Government is constructed, he replies, without any hesitation, that there are three branches of government—the legislative, the executive, the judicial; that these three are one, but that no one of them can be all three; or, to put the matter less abstractly, that Congress may pass an act, yet the President may veto it, and that the President may veto an act, yet Congress may, by a certain majority, pass it, his objections notwithstanding, while Congress and the President may pass a law, yet if it is unconstitutional the judges of the Supreme Court will interfere and annul it; that in this way each branch of government is a check upon the folly, ignorance, or malice of every other branch. And, if the supposed child (we prefer to suppose a child, as regarding politics from a much more theoretic point of view than an adult) is so precocious as to have a knowledge of the British constitution, we may be sure beforehand that he will tell us of the existence of the same system of checks and balances in England: that the Crown, Lords, and Commons have been from time immemorial the three co-ordinate branches; that the Crown calls to its assistance a certain gentleman who forms a cabinet; and that this gentleman and his colleagues represent in the Parliament the interests of the Royal department; that the House of Lords arrests the hasty impulses of the Commons; that the Commons check any retrogressive movement of the Lords, while the Crown balances both, or, it may be, joins with one to the defeat of the other.

Such is the theory, hastily stated, of "checks and balances," a theory held true and believed to exist in practice by all Americans, and almost all Englishmen. And yet Mr. Bagehot, after a careful enquiry into the operation of the British Government, has come to the conclusion that this theory no longer explains the principal political facts which he sees about him, but merely confuses the mind in examining those facts. He points to the confessed weakness of the Crown, patent in the disuse of the veto; to the timidity of the House of Lords; to the increasing energy of the Commons; and, more than all, to the strange fact that the cabinet, theoretically representing the interests of the executive in Parliament, is really an executive committee, chosen by the party dominant in the lower House, and absolutely independent of that power whose special servant it is supposed to be. This analysis reduces English government to a legislature of one house, electing from time to time its executive, and the important result with which we are here concerned is, that there can evidently, in such a condition of political affairs, be no checks or balances at all; that the moment power really changes hands in the House of Commons, that moment sees a corresponding change in the body which executes the laws; that the nomination of a cabinet by the reigning sovereign to further political ideas peculiar to himself is no longer possible; in fine, that, as a political agent, the English king or queen has hardly more influence than one of our own presidential electors. Nor is Mr. Bagehot dissatisfied with the existing order; on the contrary, he sees so much good in it that he is anxious, or at least the Economist is anxious, to see the experiment tried in this country, to see an executive obedient to the will of the dominant party, and not gifted with powers which enable him to bring the machinery of government to a dead-lock.

The argument is this: the executive is he who executes the laws, not he who enacts them, and should, therefore, be one who is thoroughly in sympathy with the enacting body. If he is not, as at present in this country, he will at first thwart it secretly, then openly, then perhaps secretly again, and the result might very easily be, in certain critical moments, a dead-lock. We had one of these moments a few months since. Congress had passed the reconstruction laws—had passed them over the President's veto—but the President, of course, was unwilling to execute them if he could avoid in any way a duty so disagreeable. The Supreme Court was appealed to, and if the court had held the law unconstitutional the result must have been inaction distressing to every one, and filling many of the more impatient with dangerous thoughts of revolution. Fortunately the court refused to entertain the motion, and the crisis was avoided. But though such threatening obstacles may be removed, and tumult not ensue, no American who has led the uneasy, watchful life of the past three years can help regarding with anxiety even the chance of a dead-lock. Let the cry for impeachment speak for itself. We lately heard a lawyer suggest, with great sobriety of tone and moderation of expression, that impeachment might, if used now, form a valuable means hereafter of obtaining changes of executive whenever Congress and the President could not agree—that is to say, that the charge of "high crimes and misdemeanors" might, by a convenient fiction, be used pro formâ, and impeachment become one of the ordinary pieces of political machinery. Such an opinion serves to show the terribly anxious state of feeling to which an obstruction in the political processes brings us. The Economist article does not propose any remedy as violent as this, but aims at showing that political movement in this country can never be smooth until we admit that the executive should be so elected as to represent the changing will of the majority in the legislature. It is a poor plan, says the writer, not to say an absurd one, which makes the servant of the people its master, which makes the doer of the people's behests their obstructor, which makes the action of the government lag far behind the intention of the governors. How would it be if the sheriff had the right to oppose at every stage the execution of laws to which he was opposed on party grounds? How would it be if the cabinet in England (taking Mr. Bagehot's explanation for granted) were to oppose the majority in the House, and attempt to retain their seats? To Mr. Bagehot's mind it seems hardly intelligible how so shrewd and business-like a people as the Americans should continue a system fraught with so much inconvenience and even danger.

Mr. Bagehot's argument is thoroughly practical, resting its claims to reception on proof of the distress and delay occasioned by the practice it seeks to overthrow, and on a suggestion of the business-like rapidity which would attend political movements in case of the adoption of the proffered alternative. To this argument ab inconvenientiâ we hope to be able to reply by hinting at a few considerations which seem to be overlooked in it, but we do not hope to do more than hint, for the matter is so intricate (involving both the science of politics, about which very few persons know anything, and the details of political management, about which everybody knows too much), that its final solution must be far distant. Premising, then, a candid admission of the incompleteness of our answer, it is this: that the objection urged against our American arrangement of co-ordinate departments, mutually independent, is, in reality, the great argument in its favor. Unless the Federal Government is to be changed into a machine for registering the rapid fluctuations in popular sentiment, faithful as mercury to the changes of temperature, delay at Washington appears to us of much greater value than mobility; and the chief way in which we have thus far been able to obtain moderation in political measures has been through that very system of division and opposition which it is proposed to overthrow. The authors of the Federalist, foreseeing (with some alarm) the development of popular power which has since taken place, were at pains to explain the checks and balances which the framers of the Constitution had connected with the political machinery, and it is very interesting to observe that, according to their explanation, haste was the thing they chiefly sought to prevent. The fact that Hamilton and Madison wrote before the strictly modern epoch opened increases the value of their opinion, as their suggestions bore reference quite as much to the future as to their own time. But let us examine the question more in detail.

In a free country, generally pervaded by education and intelligence, interesting questions are subjected to immediate discussion and rapid decision. The current of popular feeling sets strongly in one direction, while all the agencies of public expression urge it on. The debate begins to-day, is at its height to-morrow, and will be succeeded by another on the day after. The Trent affair was an instance of this; and in small matters the momentary excitement occasioned by each fresh railroad disaster may furnish others. Indeed, it is this well-known peculiarity of free communities which has brought upon them the reproach of fickleness and levity. As an ancient example, the Athenian decree against Mitylene is familiar to every one, while in modern times the rising against the Mormons in the West is a fair specimen of the surges of popular feeling of which we speak. In order that changes of public opinion may have their due effect, a popular body, re-elected at short intervals, sits at Washington, well adapted to reply quickly to any claims of constituents. It has, in fact, at length reached a point of subservience which its founders did not anticipate, and would not have been glad to see. The House of Representatives will generally be found, we believe, in accord with what it thinks the prevalent opinion out of doors.

But this is by no means the whole case with regard to the activity and responsiveness of the House. We have spoken of generally interesting questions; but the number of these at any one time is very small compared with the number of generally uninteresting questions; yet these last are not wholly unimportant. For instance, taxation has been quite a dry matter until very recently; but taxation still affected the country. Now all matters like this, not involved in the issues of the moment, are in the hands of a House which must deal with them in one way or another. The consequence is, that the few persons who are directly interested in them, the manufacturers, the miners, or the brokers, come to Washington, and find such docile responsiveness that they not unfrequently make a little law here or there for us instead of our appointed legislators. The lobby is well understood to be the lowest—or the highest—House. It is not necessary to enter here into an examination of causes; it is well known that on important matters the House echoes the cry of its constituents, and on what are called unimportant matters it echoes the less loud but equally potent voice of the lobby. The general constitution of the House may be most readily appreciated through a consideration of the fact that, in nine cases out of ten, nothing is known of a member by the majority of his electors, save that he has adopted their party platform.

But there are two other bodies at Washington of a different character; the Executive and the Senate (we do not take any account here of the judiciary), being elected for what must in America be called long terms of office, are known and responsible bodies. For we do not agree with those who believe it settled that the President of the United States must always in the future be a nonentity, in order that his party may not waste its strength on a dangerous nomination, and no one will dispute the fact that the Senate is the ablest legislative assembly in the country. Whatever the cause, it still remains true that our senators are more able, more conscientious, and more representative than any other political class among us. Now, it is one of the functions of these two bodies—a function foreseen, intended, and constantly exercised—to restrain the excesses of the popular body of delegates who sit in the House of Representatives, and allay, by the coolness of reason, the fierce heat of their constituents' zeal. Frequently may a hasty popular excitement carry a wave of emotion as far as the House; but if it is a factitious excitement or a temporary burst of feeling, the doors of the Senate do not open to it, and its death is as sudden as its birth. But if the tide is too strong, and even the Senate yields, we have still the President to oppose unnecessary alarm or anger. Thus placing two obstacles between the people and their passions, we avert much pernicious legislation.

The executive never has been with us like the English cabinet, and in most cases, as we have said, the delay occasioned by our system appears to us an advantage. Two or three instances may serve to show what we mean, though we do not rely on them so much as on the general considerations adverted to, since, in the present condition of political study, instances may be made the servants of almost any theory. When Mason and Slidell were arrested on board the Trent, a popular tumult arose which bid fair to hurry us into a disastrous war, and if at that time we had had an executive chosen under the English system, we might to-day be still confronted by rebellion. And again, if after the reverses of 1862 we had chosen an executive anew, it would probably have been such an one that we should in six months have chosen another. And though the absurd use of the veto during the past two years has accustomed men to look upon popular decrees as final, and upon Congress as the true expounders of the people's will, we may well doubt whether numerous sensible men are not looking forward with some pleasure to probable exercises of this power on the part of the President to be elected in 1868. The veto of a strong American executive will generally be received with respect, and with greater respect by the educated and reflecting than by any other class. On the other hand, what sort of an executive should we have if the House, or even the House and Senate combined, elected one? Changes in its own body would probably occur every six weeks, while changes of policy would be kaleidoscopic in rapidity. We should not be troubled with sloth; we should be as quick as death or a South American republic. It is whispered that in Australia, where the English system prevails, it requires an astute man to know of whom the cabinet at any given time consists, so shrewd are the inhabitants of that country in changing their leaders to suit their changing needs. And then what an astonishing personnel would our cabinet exhibit! What a rollicking, roystering blade of a prime minister should we have in General Butler! There would be no obstruction here. On the contrary, we should move so fast that we should all be bankrupts or thieves in a week, unless, indeed, the executive should happen—a not unlikely chance—to be turned out in less time. And then we should have General Banks and a Fenian policy, and Mr. Stevens and a confiscation policy, and somebody else with an annexation policy; and, finally, sickened and dizzied, we should elect by general suffrage a board dictatorial, with powers plenipotentiary to the dictators, their heirs and vendees, to finally reconstruct the distracted Fatherland; which dictators would, under the new system, probably be gentlemen prominent as ex-executives, say Bennett, Wood, and Morrissey.

The "dead-lock" which Mr. Bagehot anticipates and dreads will hardly appear to most Americans a probable chance. The politicians of this country are not that independent, obstructive race which would make dangerous clashes ordinary phenomena. Even Mr. Johnson has as yet given no evidence satisfactory to the public that he ever contemplated revolution, and Mr. Johnson's is certainly an extreme case. In fact, there never has been any dead-lock at Washington, and it is curious to observe that the only two real cases of obstruction in our political machinery have occurred not in that part which we have been considering, but in the intricate system which connects the Federal Union with the separate States—we mean, of course, nullification and secession. These were real obstructions, and one of them very nearly fatal. But the others are difficulties in the way of "business" which sober Americans rather welcome than object to, for they represent that conservative force which still prevents the momentary whim of the people from passing into action. To sum up what we have said, the great advantage in the present system seems to us to be found in that very delay which is urged against it. If America were England, the matter might stand the other way, and we can readily understand how a writer, who sees before him a government not too sensitive to changes of outside opinion, but containing one branch eminently fitted by its popular character to govern wisely, with two other branches eminently unfitted to do anything of the kind, should rejoice to observe that the former is absorbing all the functions of state into itself. It is plain to any one who reads Mr. Bagehot's instructive book that the system of checks and balances, as we understand it, is out of date in England. But the question for Americans appears to us a totally different one. Haste and recklessness are our political as well as our social vices, and what we should aim at is rather to obtain time for consideration than rapidity of motion. To make any change for the sake of greater political precipitancy seems unwise, and our shrewdness will be more apparent in attempts to check popular extravagance than to assume that no popular movement can be extravagant. And should England ever become democratic, and the House of Commons degenerate from an independent, self-regarding body to a dependent chamber of delegates, we can imagine a state of things in which there would be great danger in an executive elected by that House, and in which the more ancient forms might be found to have peculiar advantages. May not the late career of Disraeli show one of the dangers to which the English system will be exposed with increasing democracy? It is true, however, that he has prevented a dead-lock.

HUMANITARIANISM.

THE form of social evil against which Christianity has warred most vigorously, ever since its foundation, has been men's indifference to the suffering of their fellows. Cruelty and impurity were the vices of the Roman world, but cruelty was the most striking, and hardest to eradicate. In a society based on slavery it is easier to make men and women chaste than to make them humane, though not very easy to do either, and Christianity itself met with only indifferent success in the work of social reform till it got the barbarians to operate upon. During the Middle Ages it did a great deal to raise the value of human beings, and to elevate moral above brute force; and though the Church introduced cruelties of its own which in the amount and intensity of the suffering they caused probably far surpassed the cruelties of the pagan empire, still the practice of torturing or killing men and women for heresy or witchcraft was an immense advance on the practice of torturing and killing them "to make a Roman holiday." But the great work of the Church in all ages, that in which it has been most steadily devoted and in which it has produced most results, has been the spreading of the feeling of brotherly love, of the sentiment of the dignity and value of men, as men simply, and of the greatness of the place occupied in creation by even the meanest and most despised member of the human family. The spirit, too, which it has brought to this work has been diffused amongst all classes of reformers, even amongst those who repudiate all connection with Christianity. The great aim of even the movements for political reform during the past two hundred years has been the promotion of human comfort—making men's lives easier for them, removing obstacles to the gratification of their desires, relieving them from fear, from insecurity, and from chagrin.

Moreover, neither the Church nor the political reformers have had much liberty of choice with regard to their work. The sin by which modern as well as ancient society has been most beset has been the sin of oppression, of indifference to human suffering. The political system of nearly every country in the civilized world, down to our day, has been based on the principle that the few ought to have power over the many, and ought to use it for their own benefit, and that one of the great uses of the many was to keep the few in good condition. Nearly all the "abuses" which reformers in Europe have been assailing for the last three centuries will be found, in the last analysis, to consist in the legalized plunder or oppression of somebody by somebody else, in virtue of his office or birth or social position; in the legalized infliction on persons of one class or condition of some injury in mind, body, or estate at the hands of persons of another class or condition. The rage for equality which broke forth with such violence in the French Revolution, and which is still pulverizing society in every country in the world, is due largely to the fact that inequality has everywhere involved the exposure of a large portion of the community to vexation of some sort at the hands of the remainder. We do not deny that the passion for equality may have, as some philosophers say it has, its root in human nature. But just think how long civilization lasted before it showed itself—for how many thousand years men not only bore with "superiors in station," but loved and clung to them; how society has run to castes and classes, or orders, and refused to have them broken up. Think, too, of the force of the feeling of "loyalty" to king or chief or landlord; a feeling which may be called the religion of inequality, and under the influence of which the bravest spirits of all ages and nations have shown themselves ready to do or dare or suffer all that men have ever done or dared or suffered in any cause whatever, and which has had its saints and martyrs, too, by the thousands. Assuredly, admitting all that can be asserted of the natural tendency of modern civilization to produce equality, the revolution would have been vastly less easy if bitter experience had not made inequality a synonym for oppression, and if "superiors" had not become associated in everybody's mind with the endurance of some sort of physical or mental suffering.

The long war in which religion and morality have been engaged against mere oppression and brutality has caused reform to run in a kind of groove. Accordingly, the reforming agencies of our day, from Christianity down, are almost entirely devoted to the task of making people comfortable. The social duty most strongly inculcated in our time from the pulpit, the platform, and in the press is brotherly kindliness towards our fellows. In two-thirds of the novels of the day, too, the obligation laid most impressively on the soul of man, next after marrying the girl he loves, is the obligation of kindness to the poor and helpless and desolate and dependent. When the hero has come to deep grief of any kind, the consolation which is provided for him is very often work in a hospital or as a city missionary. The choice girls are nearly all either engaged in some such philanthropic labor, and allured from it with considerable difficulty, or else take to it at some stage in the story, either through disgust with the world or as a great upward step in moral life. The Catholic Church still preserves her earlier traditions in the midst of nineteenth-century civilization, and not only prefers voluntary almsgiving as a means of relieving the poor to any organized system of charity, but places it in the first rank of Christian virtues. The Ritualists run in the same direction. Their ideal Christian life is to spend in the relief of distress whatever time you do not spend at church. When Dr. Arnold was tormented by doubts at Oxford, his High Church friends advised him not to meddle with them, but to smother them in "holy living"—holy living meaning of course, in the main, labor amongst parochial poor.

We do not go over the above ground for the purpose of throwing discredit on the humanitarian tendencies of the age, or for the purpose even of insinuating that charity has done its work, or will ever have done its work. There is still enough misery in the world, and will probably always be enough, to give work to a thousand times as many philanthropists as will ever face it, and we have no doubt that the "enthusiasm of humanity," which plays so large a part in modern progress, will continue to be, as long as our civilization lasts, the most powerful, the purest, and most conservative of its forces. But this must be said, that, although it is right that charity should cover a multitude of sins, it is in our time allowed to cover too many sins for the good of society; that the growth of law and security and public opinion have, in all civilized countries, removed many of the evils on which the spirit of humanity used in past ages to expend its force, while others peculiar to this age have grown up to which neither the Church nor social nor political reformers can as yet be said to offer any organized or effective resistance. For example—the strong man in our day does not rob on the highway or keep serfs; he thieves in business or on the stock exchange, or swindles the government. Bad propensities rarely find vent in acts of brutality; they find vent in acts of knavery. A case of suffering or destitution finds instant relief, on being made known, from a thousand purses, but probably one-half of them are purses filled with ill-gotten gains. The churches are filled with men who would not harm a fly, and whose hearts are tender as women's towards all forms of physical or moral suffering. They give largely to charitable institutions and all institutions having for their object the elevation of the people, but they are either not over-nice in business transactions or do not think hardly of their friends if they are not over-nice. We are not now describing the state of things in any country in particular, but the characteristics of all society in the commercial civilization of our day. In a word, the age in which the moral tone of Christendom was formed was an age of violence, while the present age may be called an age of fraud; and the moral tone which was very effective in the one is very ineffective in the other. We hate slaveholders, aristocrats, rowdies, and all perpetrators of high-handed violence or oppression, but we do not feel unkindly towards an expert speculator or a tricky showman or a fraudulent trustee, if he be a temperance man or an anti-slavery man or a friend of education, or kind to the poor and the young. The Church and society are both equally indulgent to him.

In fact, this feeling of indulgence for all kinds of immorality which may be covered by the term "smart," has become so great that the law is rapidly losing the support from public opinion which it must have in order to make its sentences effective. It is getting more and more difficult to have a swindler or defaulter brought to justice; and not through remissness on the part of judges or juries or public prosecutors, but on the part of moral and religious business men, who are constantly denouncing politicians and officials for their corruption. Bank frauds, on an enormous scale, are of constant occurrence all over the country, but we hardly ever hear of the offenders being prosecuted to conviction. In fact, in a large number of cases, those who ought to put the law in motion either shut their eyes or actually assist the criminal in escaping. A case of this kind occurred in Connecticut very recently. It is not very long since a series of outrageous forgeries were brought to light in New York, and the perpetrator was with much difficulty convicted, and received a very light sentence; but so debauched is public sentiment in this matter that a petition to the governor for his pardon, which we have seen and read, was put in circulation and signed by many of the leading clergymen, lawyers, and merchants, in which all the circumstances which on any theory of moral responsibility we have ever heard of tended to aggravate the guilt of the offender—such as his wealth, his social position, his domestic happiness, his good education, his high religious standing—were produced as excuses for him—a doctrine which, if accepted by either judge, jury, or governor, would break up society.

We commented some months ago on the way in which this excess of good-nature—this humanity-run-wild, if we may call it so—operated in politics to elevate into most responsible positions, requiring a combination of the largest skill and experience with the greatest natural ability, men who had absolutely no claim whatever to prominence except what they derived from their services as humanitarians. The political mischief which this diseased state of the judgment has done during the last few years has been very great; but it cannot be compared for a moment to the social mischief which it works. It is every year lessening the commercial and social value of integrity—that is, of truthfulness, fair-dealing, scrupulousness, and simplicity. There is, in the first place, in every commercial community a tendency, and a natural and in some respects laudable tendency, to admire the man who is successful in getting, rather than the man who is ready in foregoing. In our civilization none of the recognized virtues has fallen so low as self-denial, and its downfall has in a busy age, of course, been facilitated by the fact that it is not one of the readily perceptible virtues. We all see the results of one man's success in business; but we do not see the sacrifices to conscience and character which prevented another perhaps equally able and equally fortunate man from achieving the same success, and we have not the time nor inclination to enquire into it. In the next place, when a man has drawn one of the great prizes of life by amassing a fortune, even if he be well known to have helped himself by fraud or trickery, our humanitarianism comes into play and enables him to purify himself simply by giving freely. If he subscribes handsomely to charitable objects, and associates his name with some philanthropic movement, he silences all cavillers about his character and antecedents.

Moreover, we are all engaged more or less in the pursuit of material comfort; we accordingly sympathize with everybody else in his pursuit of it, and enter into his feelings of disappointment, if he fails in reaching it, with a warmth of which mediæval philanthropists knew nothing. Accordingly, when a man grows over-eager to reach the goal, or over-impatient under his disappointments, and embezzles or forges for purposes of speculation, or walks off with bank funds, very few people feel hardly towards him, not much more hardly towards him than if he had lost heavily at play. The public reads with avidity the newspaper accounts of his "gentlemanly manners," his "culture," his "high social position," and his strong domestic affection, and half hopes he may escape the police, and would think it cruel of his victims to follow him up too closely. Sometimes, in remarkable cases, the newspapers are flooded for some days by his friends with "theories" of his crime, which usually ascribe it, as in the case we have already mentioned, to the very advantages he enjoyed, even to his good moral training itself. Sometimes the offence is laid to the account of a general law. There has to be, as we know from Buckle, a certain number of swindles committed every year, and somebody must commit them; then why be too hard on the poor fellows who are foreordained to share in the job? In a recent bank fraud in this city the newspapers, we do not know with what truth, but with perfect gravity, made the president of the bank ascribe the offence to the unsettled condition of the currency and the national finances. Now, the defaulting cashier had nothing to do with the condition of the currency, then why vex him for walking off with the funds of the institution? Moreover, the humanitarian treatment of offences has received powerful aid from what may be called the congenital school of social philosophers, of whom Dr. Holmes may be said, in this country, to be the chief. According to them, everybody inherits the greater number of his propensities, and these propensities education can only modify in a small degree; therefore, it is almost impossible when anybody robs a till to fix the exact degree of his moral responsibility; almost every till-robber could, if he could produce his genealogical tree, point to an ancestor who gave signs of moral weakness, and who knows but the descendants may have derived it from him?

We have no wish to make the picture any darker than the facts will warrant. We acknowledge that one reason why knavery and fraud were rarer one or two hundred years ago than they are now is, that there was not the same opportunity for them. It is only in communities where great trust is imposed that great frauds can be committed, just as it is only in complex commercial communities that financial panics can occur. But, after making all due allowances, it is impossible to avoid the conclusion that in the old whipping and branding days, bad as they were, society supplemented the law with heavier penalties than it now visits on cheats and tricksters. The moral sense was a good deal narrower, but it was stronger, and the sense of personal dignity was deeper, although men were undoubtedly more cruel and unrelenting in temper. Certain detestable types of character which are now becoming very common were then unknown, or, if known, certainly had no chance of social respect and consideration. One of the very valuable social features of Puritanism was the weight of its moral yoke. It made right living so stern and hard, so full of self-denial, that the cheats fled from it, and sooner than assume the burden gave up all claim to the good opinion of their neighbors.

ENGLAND.

LONDON, January 3, 1868.

AT this time of year it is customary for the chief London newspapers to fill many columns with the history of the past year. If they could give us the merest glimpse of the history of next year, it would be more interesting. However, the plan has its advantages; and perhaps you will allow me to comply with it so far as to take a very slight survey of our present position. I am neither a historian nor a prophet; but there are certain signs of the times which those who run may read. I may say, then, at once that we have not for a long time entered upon a new year with so many gloomy forebodings. The legislative work of the last year amounted simply to passing the Reform bill. As the new elections are not held till 1869, we shall be left for some time to come without reaping any fruits from the measure, except the advantage of having put a perplexing question out of the way. There are, indeed, certain fag-ends of the reform question still to be wound up, which will waste a good deal of time. We have still to pass a Scotch bill and an Irish bill, and the clumsy mode in which the question of the franchise was complicated with the system of parochial rating will probably necessitate a certain quantity of patchwork to mend past boggling. In fact, it is the beauty of Parliamentary legislation that every new act involves another act or two to make it work properly. Meanwhile, we have a year's respite before the democratic deluge bursts upon us; or, another year's delay before we can expect the new element admitted into our constitution to put a little more energy to the work of bringing up arrears.

Let us see what there is to be done of pressing importance. I reckon it amongst the greatest advantages of the Reform bill that it has already forced upon the attention of all thoughtful men the question of education. Every branch of our educational system wants a thorough overhauling. As for the lowest classes, it has become plain that our future masters must be educated. The question is darkened and perplexed by a whole whirl of theological difficulties. The clergy object to have the matter taken out of their hands, and, at the same time, they won't educate dissenters unless they are allowed to make them orthodox. That is the short account of a dispute which diverges into infinite squabbles and recriminations and personalities, until there is danger of losing sight of the real points at issue. There is a vehement cry against secular education, and one of your bishops has come over to tell us that crime is increasing fearfully in America, because your children are taught to read and write by teachers who do not at the same time impress the catechism upon infant minds. I am incompetent to express any opinion upon that subject; but one thing is plain, that the state must take education out of the hands of any sect whatever, and insist that, in one way or other, English children shall be rescued from their prevailing state of utter intellectual stagnation. The higher branches of our system are in almost equal need of reconstruction. The middle-class schools are detestable; and there is no technical education worth mentioning for our artisans and men of practical science. English manufactures are beginning to suffer because the Continental workmen have such superior means of acquiring the knowledge necessary to their craft; and the want of appropriate schools is thus telling upon that sensitive part—our pockets. The universities and great public schools for the highest classes again require a thorough reform, chiefly in the direction of a wider and more intelligent course of study. Seventy per cent. of the pupils, it is said, are absolutely idle, and most of the remnant receive nothing but a narrow training in Greek and Latin, with a sprinkling of mathematics.

A question in some respects closely connected with this is that of the National Church. It is one of the difficulties in the way of reform, as well of the highest as of the lowest parts of the educational system, that it is closely connected with a Church which is in name national, but which has in reality ceased to be more than the Church of a majority. The whole question, however, of a national church is becoming more and more perplexed. The High Churchmen and Ritualists tell us plainly that a state church is an abomination. The other extreme of opinion falls in with them; the divergence of parties within the Church makes it daily more difficult to drive so refractory and so discordant a team; and the difficulty of keeping the Church wide enough to admit all parties, and of at the same time making it satisfactory to each section of those parties, is threatening to become insuperable. There is danger of a disruption from within as well as of an assault from without. The end is probably far off, but it is plain that a whole series of ecclesiastical questions are coming up for solution which will find ample employment for the reformed Parliament. Whilst such questions as these are presenting themselves, we have to face another set of dangers which much increase the difficulty of a harmonious conclusion.

The whole commercial and manufacturing industry of the country is suffering more than it has done for years. For the first time for several years past the revenue has this quarter lost its elasticity. The income tax, which had been steadily increasing since 1848, has suffered a trifling decline; and this is only one symptom of a widely-spread distress. The commercial depression of the past year is beginning to tell sensibly upon the resources of the country. Railways are all in a bad way, partly from the mismanagement and reckless expenditure of which so many disclosures have lately come to light, partly from the general badness of trade, which, of course, affects their prosperity. The iron trade is bad; we are being undersold in foreign markets, and lost contracts where we should have had an undoubted advantage. The cotton manufacturers, again, are said to be working at a loss. The whole East End of London is out of employment, and a vast city is there on the verge of pauperism. All this, of course, implies a widely-spread distress. We have had three days of frost—the first in our mild English winter (for which, I may remark in passing, our climate seldom receives the credit it deserves). As I write, in a quiet part of London, I hear the melancholy chant of little bands of laborers who perambulate the streets, monotonously repeating, "We're all froze out, we're all froze out, we've got no work to do!" It is a disgraceful thing that two or three days' severe weather always produces this phenomenon. It seems as if the lowest classes considered every recurrence of frost to be due to a special miraculous intervention, and that there is nothing to be ashamed of in having made no more provision for such a catastrophe than for an earthquake. Of course, these howling beggars are the worst of their class, who prefer begging to suffering—a preference which is unknown to the better London poor. Many of these last prefer starving to taking charity, and I have no doubt that some of the howlers are mere impostors as well as improvident persons who have been in receipt of good wages during the summer. The "froze-out" men, however, are outward and visible signs of a great mass of misery which is lying and, I fear, increasing in our back lanes and alleys. Pauperism is at a higher point than it has reached for years. The existing distress is due to causes in which the legislature has a very slight and indirect share; but it brings out another set of evils which urgently require reform. The poor-law regularly breaks down under any excessive and unusual strain. At the West End of London we are tolerably comfortable, and the poor get a fair share of relief. At the East End, where everybody is poor, the relief is ineffective altogether, or is administered so as barely to keep the poor man's head above water for the time, when perhaps a more liberal assistance would have enabled him to scramble out of his difficulties. Workhouse exposures are things to which we are becoming accustomed, and in truth the machinery, which was originally calculated to repel all persons not actually in need of relief, now seems to work in the direction of further degrading those who accept it. It frightens away beggars who could do without begging; but it also lowers the morals of those who are not frightened away, and they are unfortunately numerous.

Turning for a moment abroad, we have now got to that pleasant position that we can look on at all European affairs as unconcerned spectators. The position is perhaps more agreeable than dignified; but at least it gives us leisure to give King Theodorus a lesson in manners. It will only cost a few millions, and help to rub up any part of our military organization that may have grown rusty since the Crimean war. That we have some of the old capacity for mismanagement has been hastily inferred from the facts that we have lost already a large proportion of the mules which had been bought up regardless of expense, and that the delay consequent upon this and other misfortunes seems to give us a prospect of a campaign for two seasons. However, the army seems to be in good spirits, and we hope that their English pluck will bring them through somehow in spite of some English blundering. Without referring to other questions—including that little Alabama controversy, which, I may say without prejudice, every one would be glad to see satisfactorily settled, only that "satisfactorily" is a word of rather indefinite meaning—I must add that English attention is for the present very little given to foreign affairs. Fenians, Fenians, Fenians, might be the permanent heading of every newspaper. They are plundering gunmakers' shops in Cork, surprising martello towers—absurd little forts erected in the last war to hinder a French landing, and now guarded by two or three gunners—and threatening to blow up all kinds of buildings in every part of England. The Queen has written a letter to say she is not at all afraid in Osborn, and indeed the Fenians must be possessed by more than Fenian madness if they should attempt any insult to her Majesty. I hear, however, that she has been advised to alter her times of driving out—which would mean that some report of possible insult has been credited by the authorities. And what are Englishmen saying? One correspondent of the Times this morning regrets that the prosecution of Gov. Eyre has made martial law impossible; I am thankful that the atrocities committed under his authority put any such act of tyranny out of the question. In various less audacious forms the same cry is reflected with more or less energy. Meanwhile the other extreme—represented by Mr. T. Hughes—proposes something like a confiscation of all Irish landed property to satisfy the tenants. I cannot say that his scheme strikes me as very statesmanlike, though doubtless well meant. The Irish priests, or a part of them, have taken the opportunity to put out a manifesto assuring us that any such proposal would be useless. Their remedy appears to be nothing short of a repeal of the union and a recognition of the separate nationality of Ireland. In short, one party would be content with nothing but forcible suppression of the whole Irish people, and the opposite will be content with nothing but complete independence. Is any compromise possible? To find one will at least tax the abilities of our best statesmen.

If I were to sum up the impression derived from this cursory survey, it would doubtless be in some respects unfavorable. Yet I feel a confidence that the present difficulties of our position will probably lead to better things. The truth seems to be that we have gone on so long in a stupid complacency and boundless satisfaction with our old institutions that we suddenly find a large arrear of work upon our hands. The old semi-aristocratic forms are no longer suited to the day, and a thorough break-up of some kind must take place. We are on the eve of something like a revolution. I do not for a moment mean that we shall have any repetition of the scenes of 1789. There is no danger of seeing the guillotine erected in Trafalgar Square or the Thames full of aristocratic corpses. And one reason is that the governing classes are as fully convinced as others of the necessity of some profound changes. It may be that when they mean to give an inch we shall take an ell, and that they will find it hard to relax their grasp without having their fingers forced open altogether. When we once begin to change, it is hard to say how soon we shall stop; but that great changes are impending seems to be generally agreed, as also that they will be brought about in a constitutional manner. Nor do I see, in spite of many grievances and much conservative stupidity, that the country is at all wanting in the talent or the energy which is necessary to secure the desired results. We shall have an era of excitement very unlike the quiet indifference characteristic of the Palmerstonian era; and, if no unexpected contingencies occur, I think we may have sanguine hopes that the fermentation will end before long in producing a far better social and political state of things than we have lately enjoyed.

Correspondence.

BISHOP DUPANLOUP AND WOMEN'S EDUCATION.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Allow me to beg that you will correct a singular mistake in your issue of January 2, in which paper, I have lately noticed, you say: "One of the most singular manifestations of the hostility of the priests to modern ideas is the opposition of the French clergy, headed by the now famous Bishop of Orleans, M. Dupanloup, to the movement for the higher education of women. All attempts to teach women to think, to give them any other education than what is called the 'education of the heart,' and which is supplied by priests, they treat, and rightly, as a blow struck at the supremacy of the Church," etc., etc. Nothing can be more incorrect than this statement concerning Bishop Dupanloup; you might with equal truth say that the Republican party of the United States, with Thaddeus Stevens at their head, had united in opposing negro suffrage; for Thaddeus Stevens is no greater advocate of colored men's voting than is Monseigneur Dupanloup of the education and cultivation of women. Of this you can easily convince yourselves by reading his excellent article, published in the October and November numbers of the Catholic World, on "Learned and Studious Women." One more able, complete, and instructive you could scarcely find; or one, I should say, judging from the reformatory views you have expressed in your paper, more likely to meet your entire approval. In order to confirm my assertion, I will make a few short extracts, although I feel that you can obtain but a poor idea of the beauty of the whole from these disconnected fragments:

STUDY REGARDED AS A DUTY.

"The rights of women to intellectual culture are not merely rights—they are also duties. This is what makes them inalienable. If they were only rights, women could sacrifice them; but they are duties. The sacrifice is either impossible or ruinous. This is the point of departure for all I have to say. I declare unhesitatingly that it is a woman's duty to study and educate herself, and that intellectual labor should have a place reserved among her special occupations and among her most important obligations."

PIETY WITHOUT INTELLECTUAL CULTURE NOT SUFFICIENT.

"I have no hesitation in saying—and how many experiences have contributed to fortify my conviction—that there are times when piety itself does not suffice. Work, and sometimes very serious intellectual work, is required. Drawing and painting are not enough, unless the painting be of a very elevated character. What the hour calls for, is a strong and firm application of the understanding to some serious work, literary, philosophical, or religious. Then will calmness, peace, serenity be restored. Let us acknowledge the truth. Rigid principles and empty occupations, devotion combined with a purely material or worldly life, make women destitute of resources in themselves, and sometimes insupportable to their husbands and children. But allow a woman two hours of hard study every day, during which the faculties of her soul can recover their balance, perplexities assume their true proportions, good sense and judgment resume their sway, excitement subside and peace re-enter the soul, then she will lift up her head once more; she will see that the intellectual life to which she aspires, in accordance with a craving implanted in her being by God himself, is not denied to her."

LOVE OF DRESS THE GREAT OBSTACLE TO STUDY.

"The objection of want of time, the grand objection so often brought forward, remains to be examined. Have women the time to devote to intellectual pursuits? Let us be honest and confess that there are two obstacles to the leisure: talking and dress. Yes; the great misfortune of women is, that they indulge in long hours of conversation among themselves, and about what, if not dress, gossip, and housekeeping?

"Now, nothing lowers the mind and soul like talking about trifles for hours, and there is but one method of remedying the evil—increase the time devoted to study, thus shortening in an equal degree the hours frittered away in conversation, and supplying mental food far superior to the vulgar subjects that now exhaust so many minds and souls.

"As for dress, too much cannot be said against it, not only as a cause of ruin to women of the world, but a dissolvent of all earnestness even among virtuous Christian women. Dress! That is what wastes the time and exhausts the spirit of women; that is what takes them from their domestic duties, and not these poor, calumniated books. Every attentive observer will recognize, as I do, that it is a taste for the world and for dress that detaches them from home interests far more than a taste for study."

From these extracts you can see how very far Monseigneur Dupanloup is from being opposed to the "higher education" of women. I do not, of course, for a moment charge you with intentionally misinterpreting his sentiments, in order to add to the prejudice existing in the minds of many against the Roman Catholic Church. I am too well assured of your liberality and freedom from bigotry to imagine such a thing, but allow me to say that I should not have expected to find in a journal of the ability and intelligence of yours an instance of so great carelessness. I do not think any one should have attempted to comment so severely upon the Bishop of Orleans's position until he had made some effort to ascertain what that position was—no very difficult undertaking, I should suppose, in the present case. In conclusion, let me add that I think, apart from the well-known excellence of Monseigneur Dupanloup's character, courtesy is particularly due to him at our hands, from the fact that in our late civil contest, when there were so few noted men in Europe who did aught by voice or pen to assist the cause of the North, he was one of those few, and I consider that he is entitled not only to the respect and admiration of all Catholics, but of all loyal Americans.

Caroline E. White.

412 Spruce Street, Philadelphia, January 19, 1867.

[We admit that we may have done Bishop Dupanloup injustice. The article in the Catholic World was noticed in the Nation in terms of strong commendation at the time of its appearance. Our impression that the bishop was opposed to "the higher education of women," as we understand the term, was derived from his violently denunciatory letter to M. Duruy, which we have, unfortunately, not preserved, but which would have justified, it seemed to us, even stronger censure than we expressed, and which was criticised by the French and English press in the same spirit as by us. We have since seen, however, an explanation by Cardinal Bonnechose, if we remember rightly, that the letter was written under a mistaken idea of the object of the minister's circular. While, however, regretting that we should have done the bishop injustice, either through oversight or misunderstanding, we must add that we still believe if we came to enquire what he really means by "the higher education of women," and under what conditions he would have it carried on, we should find there is a fatal difference between our understanding of the term and his. The Austrian clergy, and even the Pope himself, proclaim themselves at this moment the best friends of education in the world, but then the Austrians and Italians do not believe them, no matter how many articles they write and sermons they deliver, nor do we. When an Austrian or French bishop talks of "education," he talks of something utterly different, not in degree only but in kind, from what we understand by it. Perhaps their conception is the better of the two, but this is not a question we can discuss here.—Ed. Nation.]

OLD-BOOK CATALOGUES.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Dear Sir: Our attention has been called to an article in your paper of this week, subject "A Catalogue [issued by this house] of Old Books."

The manuscript for the catalogue in question was made and prepared for the printer by the owner and proprietor of the books (a born Frenchman). We have nothing to say in the matter excepting so far as the inferences and intimations contained in the article may tend to injure our business. We do not profess to be very deeply versed in classical literature, but we know enough to copy a title-page (dates and all) accurately, and to distinguish a "folio calf" from an octavo sheep, or a duodecimo turkey. We remain your obedient servants,

Leavitt, Strebeigh & Co.

Notes.

LITERARY.

Messrs. J. B. Lippincott & Co. have in press three works: "Naphegyi's Album of Language, Illustrated by the Lord's Prayer in One Hundred Languages;" a new book by Hepworth Dixon with the title "Spiritual Wives;" "Annals of the Christian Commission," written by the Reverend Lemuel Moss; "A Manual of United States Surveying," by J. H. Hawes, who has practised the rectangular survey of public lands in the West; a novel called "Abraham Page, Esquire;" and a work announced as "The Science of Knowledge," by J. G. Fichte—a new translation, we presume, of the celebrated philosopher's "Ueber den Begriff der Wissenschaftslehre."——A letter which has got into print informs us of the establishment of a new publishing house under the name of J. B. Ford & Co., and that its first venture will be the safe one of publishing a "Life of Christ," by Mr. Beecher, who says he has long meditated it.——Messrs. Hurd & Houghton add to their list "The Charities of New York," by a writer who keeps his name unknown; "Letters on International Copyright," by Henry C. Carey; the twelfth volume of Mr. Charles Allen's "Report of Cases Argued and Determined in the Supreme Court of Massachusetts;" and four books reprinted from London Society, all in paper covers and all illustrated. Their titles are as follows:

"Beautiful Miss Johnson;" "May Eaglestone's Lover;" "Sketches of Club Life;" and "Sketches of Society and Travel," by the "Lambeth Casual."

—We have received a catalogue of the library left by the great philologist Bopp, lately deceased at Berlin. Trübner & Company have them for distribution. The books are not to be scattered under the hammer, but are offered for sale all together, bids to be received until March 1. We hope the executors may be justified in their confidence that the collection can be successfully disposed of in this way. It is always sad to see a great man's library dispersed to the four winds of heaven; and there can be but few others in existence which have such a unique value as this, as a gathering, in great part, of testimonial volumes. The authors' autographs and inscriptions which it contains ought themselves to be worth no small sum. Why should not, as in many a like case before, some American institution step in and carry off the prize from European competitors? Even if our longer-established libraries are restrained, by scantiness of means, or by their possession already of a part of the works composing the collection, from bidding for it, there are others which, like the Peabody Institute in Baltimore, or the Cornell University, are just beginning, with more ample funds, and which, by seizing the opportunity here offered, would at once place themselves in an enviable condition as regards the department of linguistics. The sale is for the benefit of the widow, who, as we are informed on the best authority, is left in straitened circumstances. The great master, whom all the world looked up to and admired, was treated by his Government with a niggardliness which is apt to characterize their dealings with their literary and scientific servants; and in his later years of partial invalidism he was obliged to eke out an insufficient salary by drawing upon his small store of savings in better times. It is not our duty to make up the shortcomings of the great Prussian monarchy; yet there would be a satisfaction in helping to fulfil what must have been the last wishes of a man who has earned a title to the gratitude of all coming generations. Trübner & Co., of London, have catalogues, which may be had on application, and we observe that they offer to receive tenders for the purchase of the library.

—"The Old Roman World" is reviewed in the last North American by a critic who forfeits his title to the praise of geniality. The author reviewed is Doctor Lord—Doctor John Lord, let us say, for there is a David N. Lord. The latter has written one volume of an uncompleted epic on "Visions of Paradise," but ought not to be confounded with the author of "The Old Roman World." The North American reviewer puts into parallel columns passages quoted from Doctor Lord's book and passages which he happens to have read in Professor Philip Smith's contributions to Doctor William Smith's "Dictionary of Greek and Roman Biography." He applies his method to several cases of [columnar] parallelism, but it will be sufficient to exhibit one of many. Dr. Lord informs us that "His (Polygnotus's) pictures had nothing of that elaborate grouping, aided by the powers of perspective, so much admired in modern art. The figures were grouped in regular lines, as in the bas-reliefs upon a frieze."

Professor Smith says that

"His (Polygnotus's) pictures had nothing of that elaborate, yet natural, grouping, aided by the powers of perspective, which is so much admired in modern works of art. The figures seem to have been grouped in regular lines, as in the bas-reliefs upon a frieze."

It will be seen that the words in italics are not to be found in Doctor Lord's remarks. As the critic himself confesses, Doctor Lord has put on record his contempt of a pedantic display of learning, yet the criticism cites not only quotations from Professor Smith's articles, but passages from an essay written by Doctor Arnold—one which but few people have ever thought of reading. It is a relief to turn to a "genial notice" which is published in the Methodist Quarterly Review.

"Doctor Lord," says the second critic, "surveys the character of the consecutive ages with penetrative glances. The train of moral causes and effects is traced in the spirit of a true Christian philosophy. The style flows in perfect consistency with the subject in a grand, powerful, majestic, transparent current. The last three chapters, in which he answers the questions, Why did not Paganism arrest the ruin?and, Why did not Christianity arrest the ruin? and describes the legacy of the early church to future generations, are particularly original, vigorous, and truthful. The work is entitled to take a high place among our popular standards of Roman history."

There is a difference, that the reader will at once perceive, between the way in which these reviewers treat their author. Under the one system of criticism merit is recognized, honor is freely given to honesty, industry, and ability. Under the other, there is no geniality; literary charlatanism grows rank; honest, valuable workers are depressed and discouraged.

—One of the small secrets of literature, as Mr. Anthony Trollope calls them, is revealed by the Bookseller for December. It concerns the Owl, a comic paper published in London, of which few Americans know anything, and of which most of us who know of it at all only know that it was on the side of the late Confederacy during the war of the rebellion. That it should have been so will not seem strange, now that the story of its origin is made known. At about midnight, one Saturday, some gentlemen were standing in the recess of a window in Lady Palmerston's drawing-room, and were busily talking together. Lord Palmerston came up to them, and asked what it was about which they were deliberating. Somebody answered that they were considering the possibility of establishing a new paper, in which his lordship and whatever was to be found in her ladyship's drawing-room—love, marriage, and diplomacy—should be heartily quizzed. "What next?" Lord Palmerston is represented as saying. "A conspiracy in my own house! You owls!" So the establishment of the new paper having been decided on, Lord Palmerston's term of reproach suggested a title, and on the same night, at the St. James's Club, the distribution of parts for the first number was made. There was no thought of profit, so the financial arrangements were soon made, and a small news-vender was installed as publisher. Among the early contributors were Messrs. Borthwick and Laurence Oliphant, the Honorable Evelyn Ashley, Lord Palmerston's private secretary, Lord Houghton, Max Schlesinger, Odo Russell, and the Honorable E. Ponsonby. Its deep insight into all impending marrying and giving in marriage in high life procured for the Owl celebrity and expensive advertisements, so that it was at once pecuniarily successful, and it was successful in another sense by reason of its wit and humor. But Palmerston died; the contributors were scattered, some going to India, some to Canada—leaving the kingdom on which the sun never shines for all parts of the empire on which the sun never sets—and the paper ceased to be what it had been. The editor of the Morning Post, however, who was one of its founders, stuck to it, and it is still profitable to its owners, though the public calls it dull.

—Such male Americans as have been giving to women what they suspected to be too great respect and civility will be pleased to find that, after all, their conduct has been not without reason. La Liberté discovers a sufficient justification for them. They are conservators, it seems, of the traditions of our colonial times. Once women were rare among us; so what more natural than that, being little known, they should be valued, liked, petted? Well, then, it was so that it happened, and so it still happens; for on the western side of our giant Republic always there are new States in which women are few, and the old colonial tradition in regard to their value is always kept in full life and strength. So La Liberté goes on. There is nothing beats a Frenchman at philosophizing—except a philosopher—and it may be worth while to hear from our writer what it is in our present condition that we owe to our inordinate deference to woman. In the first place, our men of science look to feminine approbation for a career, for place, honors, riches, glory. Feminine influence is felt even in colleges and universities. Women invade the libraries, conservatories, museums. It is necessary to prepare for them beautiful saloons, ornamented with all sorts of curiosities, whither they lead their admirers, where they chatter and prattle. In the United States the professor cannot succeed unless the American woman is pleased with him. There is serious danger that she will import into his severe domain trouble, feebleness, frivolity, superficiality. Even the astronomer of the Republic is not undevout; women demand of him that he shall show them the rings of Saturn, the satellites of Jupiter, and he submits and does it. This last assertion seems incredible.

—We mentioned some weeks ago the discovery by Mr. Charles Edmonds of a unique copy of a hitherto unknown edition of Shakespeare's "Venus and Adonis." It was found in the house of Sir Charles Isham at Lamport, Northamptonshire, and that gentleman has consented to the printing in fac-simile of a few—we believe one hundred—copies of the work. The volume contains, it will be remembered, not only the "Venus and Adonis," but also a collection of pieces known as the "Passionate Pilgrim," "Epigrams and Elegies" by Sir John Davies and Christopher Marlow, and Marlow's "Ovid's Elegies." In the same lumber-room where this precious volume was discovered Mr. Edmonds found many other works of the first degree of rarity, belonging to the Elizabethan era, and of some of these, too, Sir Charles will permit a reprint to be made. Bibliographers will also be interested in learning that by application to Joseph Smith, author and publisher, at No. 2 Oxford Street, Whitechapel, they may obtain "A Descriptive Catalogue of Friends' Books." It contains more than two thousand octavo pages, and describes, with occasional critical remarks and biographical notices, all books written by Quakers.

—The number of new books, pamphlets, and other publications of a single year in Great Britain is now about four thousand. This is exclusive of reprints. In 1867, for example, there have appeared 4,144 new books and new editions. In 1866, the number was 4,204. In 1760, the new works published in Great Britain were about 93 in number. But this number is, exclusive of pamphlets and tracts. From 1800 to 1827, the average number had risen to 588; in 1836, it had risen to 1,332; and now, as we have said, it is not far from 4,000. So England reads about forty times as much as it did in the days when George the Third was king, or rather when he began to be king, and seven or eight times as much as it did in the end of his reign—the palmy days adorned by Byron, Wordsworth, Scott, Lamb, Wilson, and the others. As to the constituent parts of this mass of literature, it is thus divided: of religious works there are 849; of novels there are less than half as many, the number being 410; minor works of fiction and children's books come between novels and books of a religious character, and number 535; then come 257 volumes of annuals and serials, 212 works of travel and topography, 210 of English philology and education, 193 historical and biographical works, 196 on European and classical theology and translations—whatever "European theology" may be—150 books of poetry and the drama. Next follow, in nearly equal numbers, works on politics and questions of the day, on science, on medicine and surgery, and on law. Books on trade and commerce, horticulture and agriculture, art and architecture, naval and military subjects, and books classed as miscellaneous, fill out the list, and make the total number 4,144.

—A very fruitful comparison has been undertaken between the smallest and the largest republic of the world by Prof. Rüttimann, of Zürich, in a work entitled "Das nordamerikanische Bundesstaatsrecht verglichen mit den politischen Einrichtungen der Schweiz," of which the first volume is mentioned by the Chronicle. The author's interpretation of our fundamental law is shown by his rejecting Calhoun's theory of nullification, and the freshness of his information by his remarks upon the evil effects of an elective judiciary, illustrated by the example of New York. The second volume is promised for this year, "giving an account of the whole material resources of the federal power."——A. Bastian's book on "The Nations of Eastern Asia" (Die Völker der östlichen Asien) is a valuable and timely contribution to the geography and ethnography of that once remote continent. The fourth volume, just published, contains the author's account of his journey through Cambodia to Cochin-China. He intends to treat, in the next volume, of Japan, China, and the Archipelago (more especially Singapore, Batavia, and Manilla), and in the sixth volume of Mongolia and Siberia, and his return through the Caucasus, Southern Russia, and Galicia. The final volume will contain an essay on Buddhism.——The third section of the third volume of Wilhelm von Giesebrecht's "Geschichte der deutschen Kaiserzeit" (History of the Times of the German Emperors), which has just appeared, relates to the rule of Henry V., and gives, as usual, copious references. The work occupies the front rank among German histories.——"Das deutsche Land," or Germany, in its characteristic traits and historical relations, by Dr. T. Kutzen, is written in a warm and genial spirit, but presupposes an acquaintance with the history and geography of the country.

"THE MANNERS OF THE DAY" IN PARIS.*

THE common aim of French littérateurs at the present moment seems to be to out-do Juvenal on his own line, and M. Feydeau has bent his bow last, and, we may say, shot furthest. It is hardly needful to say that his story is a tale of the seventh commandment, as that injunction is handled in French fictitious literature. It is filled with all manner of indecent episodes, and terminates in an incident so monstrous that its exact nature is not even hinted to us, and the heroine, in consequence of her share in it, is despatched by her husband to a madhouse. We can imagine the indignation of M. Feydeau's confrères at his having been beforehand with them in this charming contrivance. The next one who writes a novel will have, under penalty of seeming insufferably prudish, to invent something still more exasperating; for the public desires are irritated with each successive dose of its stimulus, and it is not easy to see what they will finally require. The hero of M. Feydeau's work is a young professor, "the hope of the university," whose life is made wretched by his passion for the Comtesse de Châlis, "one of the three or four women qui donnent le ton to Europe." M. Feydeau concludes triumphantly in favor of a literal interpretation and a strict observation of the seventh commandment aforesaid. Toward the close of his story the hero is made to exclaim: "Who does not dream at twenty of having a married woman for mistress? C'est si flatteur! et si camarade! But it drags us through shame until, at the end, we despise ourselves." It has been only a subordinate intention of the author, however, to lead us to this undisputed conclusion. His chief purpose is to show how degraded—how (in its own language) "encanaillé" the tone of the best society must have become when such women as Madame de Châlis are its queens, and such creatures as a little beast of a prince, who is another of her lovers, its paladins. The work is of a happy length; it is anything but dull; the character of the Countess, in its utter ignobleness and triviality, leaves a vivid impression; the incidents are highly ingenious, and hideous enough to gratify the most fastidious taste. The moral passages, although numerous, are short, and in the last degree entertaining. When, for instance, soon after the beginning of the hero's intimacy with the Countess, he undertakes to wean her from the vanities and follies which have hitherto occupied her attention, this is the way he does it: "Raising my finger to the stars, I explained to her, in language which I strove to make as clear as possible, the most formidable problems which have impassioned humanity. I began by retracing the history of the probable formation of the worlds. I told their number, their distance from the earth," etc., etc., for a page. "An hour was enough for me to condense in a rapid improvisation the discoveries of Galileo, Copernicus, Kepler, Newton, Laplace. It took hardly another to pass in review the labors of Geoffroy Saint-Hilaire, Lamarck, Lyell, Vogt, Darwin." He then sketches for her the history of humanity, "toujours émouvante quoique toujours désolante;" how empires have succeeded empires and perished "by the exaggeration of the principle of invasion. India," he continues, "Egypt, Mesopotamia, Persia, Carthage, Greece, Rome, passed each in turn through my recital, with its escort of great men. But there was needed a conclusion to so many incoherent events, and this conclusion, as I thought, could only consist in principles of fixed morality, leading to a rule of conduct." This rule the speaker proceeds to unfold, in a voluminous manner, through eight more pages, in the course of which, by the way, he attributes the social corruption of Paris to the "infection of the manners of foreigners," who flock thither "by virtue of that attraction which the French character has always exerted on neighboring nations." The upshot of it all is that the Countess straightway modifies her manner of life, and under his direction devotes several weeks to teaching her children to read, enjoys "the pleasure of giving, the most noble which the human species knows," visits the humblest cottages, and hovers over "nauseous beds where misery tossed side by side with suffering." He, meanwhile, subjects her to a course of sound reading, "striving to maintain her in a sort of intellectual juste milieu, equally removed from rigorism and from license," and, in fine, to combine instruction with amusement.

If an American were to write the history of a woman's conversion in this supremely flippant way, we should not know what to be most amused with, his puerility or his pedantry. And yet to the average French mind the sentimental portions of M. Feydeau's narrative will doubtless seem very natural and touching. Even to such a reader, however, they must yield in reality and interest to the more repulsive portions. So long as the exploits of vice are so clearly described, so long will books of this class continue to be read for the sake of their pictures of vice. It is true that accurate descriptions of deformed natures and perverted feelings may do a certain amount of good. No doubt, by their vivid representations of the extreme of certain illicit paths, they inspire fresh young minds with a mistrust and a loathing which stiffen their limbs against the first easy steps. We feel certain that that very superior work, "Madame Bovary," for example, has done in the aggregate a vast deal of real service. But to minds which have once parted with their freshness and youth, works even more sternly didactic than the one just mentioned, so long as they pretend to teach exclusively by example, will be sure to do more harm than good. Such books are useful only as they stimulate thought, and the great objection to them is that prima facie—for superficial readers—they tend to repress thought. One may say that the great mass of readers are superficial, that it is only here and there that they possess sufficient moral vigor to react against the subtle drowsiness of conscience which accompanies the perusal of the works to which we allude, and one is therefore almost led to write them down. But one ends by feeling the pulse of his own conscience, and, finding it steady, concludes that, on the whole, in the interest of art it is good policy to prohibit nothing which makes a claim to artistic merit.

* "La Comtesse de Châlis; ou les Mœurs du Jour. Par Ernest Feydeau." Paris Michel Lévy. 1868.

M. Feydeau's novel goes beyond this, and makes a claim to be considered as a work of edification. Under this head, for the reasons we have suggested—for the want of substance and penetration in the moral element of the narrative—we consider it a total failure. Viewed as a work of art, it is not much better. It has no originality or beauty, and no particular charm beyond the luck of having come out of a good literary school. Thanks to their Juvenalian literature (among other things), the citizens of the French capital are winning an odd reputation in unsophisticated foreign lands. It certainly seems unfair toward a poor sinner to take advantage of his peccavi to ventilate your own superior virtue, but it takes a vast deal of magnanimity to prevent one from doing so. One may almost say, indeed, that it is the sinner's fault if you do. What business else had he to be full and so graphic in his avowal? Still, we shall be none the worse for closing up the interview by a speedy absolution. The desire to properly qualify one's mind for an enlightened abhorrence of vice by the perusal of such books as the "Comtesse de Châlis" seems to us by no means the least reprehensible trait of the "manners of the day," and any thing but a symptom of reaction against them. But we cannot help believing that, in the great city where they have reached the extravagant pitch registered by M. Feydeau, a reaction is destined to come, either in peace or in violence. Meanwhile, in other great cities where things are fortunately not quite so bad, we can very well afford to let Parisian chroniclers pile up documents for future antiquarians without trying too hard to keep our own contemporaneous researches on a level with our natural enthusiasm for propriety—lest some day they should get ahead of it.

"TEMPLE HOUSE."*

THE chief figure in "Temple House" is Argus Gates, a man of the sort which female novelists, considered as intellectual beings, have been for a long time asking us to admire. Next is Sebastian Ford, a man of the sort which female novelists, considered as creatures of sentiment and poetic passion, depict as all but irresistible. Then we have John Carfield, who addresses himself to the animal side of female novelists. There are other male personages in the book, and there are several female figures—Roxalana Gates, Temple Drake, and, most important, Virginia Brande, whom the tall, florid, deep-voiced, insolent, and sensual Carfield desires to marry, who loves or thinks she loves Argus Gates, icy, misanthropic, blaspheming, proud, sceptical, middle-aged, poor, scornful, cigar-smoking, epigrammatic, bitter; whom, finally, the olive-tinted, dreamy, sympathetic, hot-blooded, beautiful Sebastian seems to love, and who, if we do not mistake Mrs. Stoddard's intentions, is going, in turn, to love the creole.

If we do not mistake the author's intentions, we say. We may as well secure the reader of the story from a possible disappointment by informing him that "Temple House" is a story that has no end. Properly enough, too, for it has almost no plot, and should have no catastrophe—no ultimate result to which various actions tend. Not, for the matter of that, that it is uncommon to find writers as clever as Mrs. Stoddard putting into the last pages of a novel some inconsequent event, calamitous or fortunate, which is to be accepted as the natural upshot of the events of the other pages. But Mrs. Stoddard, whatever other mistakes she has fallen into, has not fallen into this one. We hardly know why. She has an inveterate habit of dealing in hints and innuendoes; perhaps that is the reason; perhaps to her the conclusion seems perfectly intelligible, though we make nothing of it, or, if we make anything, it is this—that a woman needs two men. But we are not willing to say that the novel is meant to teach this lesson, and say sincerely that we distrust our own judgment in the matter. For we found very many single sentences, epigrammatic and philosophic, as we read through the book, of which we could not get the meaning, and we suppose that, in the case of a writer so perspicuous in style as Mrs. Stoddard, this is to be attributed to our inability to follow the subtle shiftings of her thought. Sometimes we understood her clearly and easily, but sometimes only with difficulty and vaguely; and though we paid her the compliment of always thinking she was saying something worth hearing, and of trying to comprehend what it was, yet sometimes we understood her neither fully nor partly, neither clearly nor obscurely, but simply not at all. The book may, therefore, really have an end which we missed finding. But we think that it either ought not to have any end, or ought logically to have the one—hardly supposable as meant by the author—which we have mentioned—Virginia ought to marry Argus, and have in Sebastian a lover. If we say that Argus, out of his friendship for Sebastian, probably yields him Virginia, still we have on our hands Virginia's long and powerful love for Argus, to say nothing of the love existing between Sebastian and Temple Drake.

But, on the whole, we think it not quite fair to presume that the author had plot or catastrophe seriously in mind when she wrote her story. "Temple House" is intended as an attempt at the painting of character, or a gallery for the exhibition of pictures of Argus, Sebastian, Roxalana, and the others. Argus is of an old New England family, has been a sea-captain, is now forty years old, was always poor, but just before the story commences is still further impoverished by the extravagance of a rascally brother, and lives meanly in the ancient house of the Temples, a decaying old building in a decayed town which, we are told, is in New England. Argus is a self-contained, cynical philosopher. He smokes continually. He drinks at a sitting two and three quarts of brandy. He is at times brutally and heartlessly coarse and cruel in his speech, though he never loses his temper; he makes the pleasing remarks of Rochester with the coolness of Mephistopheles. At other times his manners are even courtly in their finish. Indifference he carries to its highest pitch. Mrs. Stoddard does not say so, but we know his whole family: he would kill his only surviving grandmother every day in the week in a perfectly easy manner, a kind of a casual way, and then with a cigar—which we should "instinctively feel was of the best quality"—would walk among the shrubbery and scent the evening air, expressing doubts as to the immortality of the soul, and making severe remarks on woman and the clergy. We quote a passage in which at one and the same time this being of iron and ice exhibits his profanity, his independence, his brutality and his suavity, his knowledge of the world and his empire over others. Let us remark first that his niece Tempe bursts into the house one day where Argus is sitting with Roxalana, and announces angrily that she wants pocket-money, and requires to be informed why she is kept so shabbily. Argus ventures to offer this suggestion: "I will tell you why you cannot have money. Your father robbed me of so much that I shall never be able to be generous to his daughter."—"It's a lie!" Tempe interjects.—"And I will tell you a way to get money. Marry it." Thereupon Tempe marries a rich young man who shortly afterwards dies. Argus is present at the wedding, where he is, as regards Miss Virginia, polished, though dreadfully cynical, as may be seen in the quotation below, but where, as regards John Drake, he "sits down on him," as they say, with severity:

"Tempe is going on a journey," she says. "You will miss her."

"I have just been speaking with that blonde puppy, her husband, about it. I have no idea that I shall suffer in her absence. How do you think he will enjoy himself in my society? They are to be with us, you know."

"I am almost sorry to hear that."

"Why are you sorry?"

"I like the house as it is; the intrusion of a stranger may change its aspect."

"This is one of your whims. You remind me of those French women who retire to a convent for a week or two of prayer and bread and water. When they return to the world their lovers' oaths have a new charm, and their wine a fresh sparkle."

"Don't hurt me."

Argus looked at her, and his eyes blazed with a quick mischievous fire. It was impossible for her, with all her sense of conventionality, not to show that she felt his glances.

"I like to hurt you," he said.

John Drake appealed to them, and smilingly nodded to Virginia. His bright silken hair spread wildly round his head; his delicate face was deeply flushed, his mouth was half open, and as he approached his gait was uncertain.

"Damn you," said Argus, "you are drunk."

Virginia rose, and drew John's arm towards her.

"Come," she said, "I want to see your mother's celebrated cactus plants. I know where they are; will you show them to me?"

Argus, of course, possesses—let us say this in the interest of the female producers of fiction, who often construct a hero who is a sad fool, but never one who has not some really manly traits,—Argus, of course, possesses the courage of a paladin, as much nerve and strength as if he were not a loafing smoker, and, when roused, as much energy as an earthquake. One day he sits and reads comedies—Wycherly's, we fear, or Mr. Congreve's. His women-folk and a most astonishing creature of a sailor urge him in their various ways to take a stroll down to the harbor-bar and save a shipwrecked crew. What does he do? He smiles superior, he lights a cigar, he looks at the weather, and returns to his comedy. By and by, however, this man who knows everything, who can do everything, who is never at a loss, who is always cool, looks at the weathercock, makes a subtle, mocking reference to his winding-sheet, goes down to the beach, and saves a young man's life. It is Sebastian Ford, a young gentleman of half-English, half-Portuguese blood, who flees from home because he discovers his mother's guilty connection with a priest, knocks about the world, having guilty connections of his own, and is finally cast on shore in Kent harbor. Argus takes him, insensible, into his house. It is on this same night that we discover the possible tenderness of the bitter, world-weary man. Sebastian, waking from his swoon, finds Argus watching by his bed, and thus these two converse, swearing friendship, or rather finding it inexplicably made to their hands:

* "Temple House. A Novel. By Elizabeth Stoddard." New York: G. W. Carleton & Co.

Sebastian, aware of the physical strain he had gone through, was amazed at his increasing brightness and deep refreshment.

"How do you do it, Argus?" he exclaimed.

"I don't do it. Do you suppose there will be such a storm again?"

"You are a strange man."

"Because I observe you through a number of glasses? It is my telescopic way. I am a marine, you know—one of the shelved monsters of the deep. Have you a fancy to start a museum?"

"Yes,—and begin with that curiosity between men—our friendship."

"I said, 'your friend.' I am not inclined to twist my mouth with repeating a phrase I have not used for forty-one years."

"Heavens! how old are you?"

"Forty-one."

Sebastian pulled his moustache with the air of solving a problem, and Argus walked up and down the room as if there was no problem left him to solve. Each observed the other furtively, and both felt a sentiment new to them.

"I have provoked Nature into a conspiracy," said Argus at length. "I experience something akin to the Ideal. I have refused to learn it from ordinary circumstances—she has thrown you towards me."

"And I," replied Sebastian, "find something in the Real, which I have struggled against. I'll try a few steps on the floor, too."

He slipped from the cot, and stood dizzy and reeling.

"Steady," said Argus, approaching him; "you still have on your sea legs."

Sebastian flung his arms round the neck of Argus, and kissed his cheek.

We may as well have done with Argus at once; so we give a scene which shows him when Virginia Brande is impelled to make her love known to him. He is sitting asleep, or apparently asleep, in a summer-house:

She watched the light playing over his cold, steadfast face; his bowed head and long drooping hands, so fixed and motionless in their pale hue, reminding her of the pictures in illuminated missals. Stooping towards him, she softly put her hands in his, and was caught in an iron grasp. Argus stood up, wide awake, and drew her close to him; their eyes met, and instantly he disengaged his hands.

"Why, my girl, Virginia," he whispered, turning his face away; but, she struck him slightly, and said:

"Look again, Argus, and read me something."

He was obliged to meet her eyes again, and as he did so a faint streak of color passed over his face. It seemed to him that he was recalling something that had happened long ago—events, or incidents, which perplexed him when passing, although he did not know it till now. He shook his head involuntarily. Virginia started backwards as if frightened, and her hat fell off, dropping between them. Argus frowned at it, and said, "Damnation!" then picked it up. As she took it from his hand she moved towards the door of the summer-house, still facing him; she looked so sweet, and sincere, and so indescribably dignified withal, that he felt a pang of regret to have her go, and said, "Damnation!" again.

"Only oaths, Argus?"

Her face looked set now, and there were hurt smiles in her beautiful eyes. He sprang to her.

"You would have me confess, Virginia, that I am a man, after all, and that I know I am touched by the flame burning in you. Does it please you to hear me? As for oaths,—come here—put your head over my heart,—it swears by what it must reject."

Argus we have seen and Sebastian we have seen; it remains to let Mr. Carfield come into view. He has been living for some time at Mr. Brande's, has lent the old gentleman money, and is everywhere looked on as the accepted suitor of Miss Virginia. On one occasion, just before intruding himself into the lady's chamber with intent to compromise her so fatally that she perforce must marry him, he discourses to her after the fashion, which would please or has pleased, Mr. Whitman:

"It may be absurd, but do you know that I expect to marry you? When your father came to see my father, his old friend, worth—let me see how much—say three hundred thousand dollars—I heard him describe his daughter and his Forge, one as handsome, talented, free, the other as an ugly fixture, restricted, encumbered. I believed him; so did my father, a clever, sharp old man. He said, 'Go to Kent.' I came, and am not sorry for coming. There is a hundred thousand dollars of my money here; every day of my stay has cost me hundreds. I gamble with the Forge for your speech, your gestures, your attentions, your presence, for you. I love you. Do you know what that means? Do you understand men, my princess? We are procreators, providers, protectors, but we are lustful, acute, selfish for you women; the best, wisest, most tender hero is also what I say. What would be the form of society if it were not so? When our functions cease, let us be children again, and gentle, fulfilling the charities, and bridge our way to heaven. Be my wife, give me children; divide with me the goods of this world; change the look which is in your eyes sometimes—an expectation of the thin, airy goods of the next world—and meet mine with that hope which allures weak men to madness and death, and incites strong men to pluck the jewels from the crown of life, and wear them as kings."

NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW FOR JANUARY.

THE North American has, we see, formally discarded its old rule, and in this number, except as regards the critical notices, gives at the end of the articles the author's name. To this there can be no objection; for, whatever they once were, quarterly reviews are nowadays only quarterly volumes of essays, and the arguments, weighty or otherwise, against the anonymous system as applied to writing in daily and weekly periodicals, have no application to the case of reviews, which no longer serve, and but very seldom aim to serve, any particular party. The corrector of the press, by the way, would do well to watch closely in future for a confusion of the plural and singular forms of the first personal pronoun, two or three instances of which we observed in reading through the articles.

The writers in the number for January are Mr. C. F. Adams, Jr. ("Boston"), Mr. W. D. Howells ("Francesco Dall' Ongaro's Stornelli"), Mr. Samuel Eliot ("Fraser's Report on the Common School System"), Mr. A. S. Hill ("The Character of Jonathan Swift"), Mr. E. L. Godkin ("Co-operation"), Mr. A. G. Browne ("Governor Andrew"), Mr. Sidney G. Fisher ("Nominating Conventions"), Mr. Lowell ("Witchcraft"), and the anonymous writer of a paper entitled "Railroad Management."

Mr. Lowell's article is unsigned, he being an editor of the review, but of course his hand is unmistakable. The article is not to be called anything like exhaustive or very well compacted. As a whole, it is not carefully finished, but it is carefully finished and fine—of course, again—as regards the style merely, and the wit of it leaves possible no doubt of its authorship. It may be described as telling stories drawn from many curious books on witchcraft, and has, perhaps, less to do with the book—Upham's "Salem Witchcraft"—which gave occasion for its production than one could wish. For who knows old or new New England so well as Mr. Lowell? and all the good and bad of old New England, and much of the good and bad of new New England, was in Salem in the end of the seventeenth century. But besides its wit and the out-of-the-way reading which it shows, and with which it makes the reader partially acquainted, the article has many remarks which display insight into human nature, moral and intellectual, and to read it without profit is almost as impossible as to read it without lively pleasure. And it is suggested to us to say, although we take Mr. Lowell's warning against scorning our ancestors, that one cannot look on this picture of what was believed, especially of what was consequently done, a couple of hundred years ago without taking hope for the future of the race, and something more of comfort in the spectacle of the present. This is not an entirely delightful age, but, after all, we shall never see Chief-Justice Chase and the other justices ordering to the rack old women charged with having assignations with Satan, and making Mr. Forney, say, howl in a neighboring chamber, as if in great torment, in order to terrify the accused into confession.

Mr. Howells has written two or three articles partly biographical, and in greater part critical, on modern Italian minor poetry—on modern Italian poetry, indeed, for it is not injustice to call it all minor poetry. In this latest essay we learn about Francesco Dall' Ongaro. Mr. Howells does not confine himself and us to sympathetic criticism—criticism acute sometimes as well as sympathetic—but gives translations of some of that series of poems in which Dall' Ongaro did for the Italian struggle of 1848 and 1859, and of to-day, for that matter, what Dobell and Alexander Smith did not nearly so well—hardly well at all—for the English Crimean war. Thus we are ourselves enabled to make a fair judgment of the poet—a judgment at any rate that is not too unfair; for whatever else poets lose in translation—prettinesses, beauties even—they do not lose much in weight in essentials. A pleasant and instructive volume might be made out of Mr. Howells's essays on these later poets, and the essay on Italian comedy which was not long since published.

Governor Andrew's fervent, large, simple nature is very well revealed in Mr. Browne's character of him, which will strongly confirm those who knew him in their high opinion of that able and good man. The article is very cleverly composed, if it is what it is by design, for its simplicity and the absence of pretension in it are quite in harmony with its subject-matter. It is to be hoped that Governor Andrew's biographer, in writing the forthcoming life, will draw largely upon Mr. Browne's recollections; and if Mr. Browne can do as well by the historical as he has done by the personal side of the governor's biography, it seems as if the life of his chief might have been as well done by him—though he is evidently an unpractised writer—as by any one that could have been selected.

Articles of more or less value, none of them uninteresting, but all of less interest than those previously mentioned, are that entitled "Boston," that on "Nominating Conventions," that on Mr. Fraser's book, and that on "Railroad Management." The one last mentioned is thus far valuable, that it gives some facts concerning the relative merits as regards speed, cost, and safety of American and foreign railroads. Having set his facts before us, the author ends with advice to the corporations, counselling them to make use of all inventions which will make fuel cheaper, improve the road-ways and give better machinery, and to adopt a system of regular promotion, only advancing such officials as have rendered faithful and efficient service. This is good advice, but such, we imagine, as the unaided average director must have already often given himself. Still, the article, though it does not treat of those questions touching railroads in which the general public are most interested, is sound and instructive, and by stockholders, at least, will be pronounced interesting. Mr. Adams's article is of more interest to Bostonians than other people; but we are all more or less Bostonians. He recounts the well-known story of the city's comparative decline, and recounts it in vigorous language, but he does more; he is a voice crying in the wilderness, but also he is a voice which directs to paths. Boston, he thinks, may yet be restored to a place among cosmopolitan cities, may be saved from impending provincialism, from becoming merely a seat of commerce with the Dominion of Canada, and an exchange for merely New England merchants. He believes that if there were to be appointed a board of commissioners, whose duty it should be to study the causes of Boston's commercial decadence, as Horace Mann and his coadjutors studied the failure of the Massachusetts school system, as the Harbor Commissioners have studied the condition of the harbor, as several other Massachusetts commissions have recently addressed themselves to various subjects, a way would be found to raise the city to her old rank. The efforts towards that end which have been made hitherto, have been, he says, spasmodic, and therefore of no effect. A commission would, he thinks, find out precisely what is needed, and Boston could then go to work intelligently. It seems not impossible that something of the kind might be done. Bostonians have helped to make many other cities great, and certainly worse things could be wished for the country than that the influence of Boston should be increased.

Mr. Eliot's review of Mr. Fraser's excellent report is useful and readable. Mr. Eliot, while admitting the full weight of some, very successfully meets others of Mr. Fraser's objections to our school system—that one, for example, which urges that in American schools there is not enough of religion. We take a passage from a late account of the condition of children in a certain English mining district:

"Although it is painful to do so, we give a few illustrations of this ignorance on religious subjects, taken from the answers of children: God is 'a good man,' or the 'man in heaven.' 'I've heard of Christ, but don't know what it is.' 'Don't know where God lives, or about the world being made or who made it.' 'The Bible is not a book.' 'Have not heard of Christ.' 'Don't know if I am a Christian, or what it is or means.' 'The good and bad go to heaven alike.' 'Them as is wicked shall be worshipped.' 'When people die they are burned, their souls and their bodies.' 'All go into the pithole, where them be burned.' 'They never get out and live again. They have not a soul. I have not one.' 'The soul does not live afterwards. It's quite an end of people when they die.' 'The devil is a good person; don't know where he lives.' 'Christ was a wicked man.' 'Don't know what prayer means, or who it is said to.'"

In making this quotation, we are as far as possible from the spirit which indulges in a tu quoque. The kind and fair tone of Mr. Fraser's book would disarm even a disputant badly addicted to that substitute for argument. But one reads such things and sees a reason why English Christians may be more anxious than Americans can be to make their schools give definite instruction in religion, and for another thing, such statements of facts suggest the thought that any instruction whatever that a school teacher could give such unfortunate children must be, in a high degree, religious.

Mr. Fisher's essay is an attempt at answering the question which the Philadelphia Union League some months since propounded. Mr. Fisher would secure the nomination of good men by establishing boards of nominors. These he would have composed of native American white citizens, not less than forty years old, educated according to a standard fixed by law, possessed of a certain amount of property or income, regularly elected, sworn to the faithful performance of their duty, and liable to a stated punishment if convicted of unfaithfulness. Then he would have it ordained by law that any man wishing to hold office should send in his name to the nominating boards, and that then these should, or should not, present it to the electors. The adoption of this scheme is, of course, hopeless. If it could do what it offers to do, it would be rejected. But we are persuaded, had this State made it into law on the first of the current month, that before the first day of January, 1869, Mr. Fernando Wood's name would be found in the list of New York nominors. To raise the voter is the way to get good men raised into office.

Mr. Adams Hill, in his article on Swift, earns the praise due to industry. A good deal—perhaps all—of what Swift's friends have said in his favor Mr. Hill states, and in good enough English. To what can justly be said against his client for the nonce Mr. Hill pays too little attention, and we get no complete view of the man. Indeed, the paper is so unjudicial in tone that one gets from its perusal not quite so much satisfaction as might be wished.

The literary notices in this number are none of them less than fairly good, and some are to be highly praised—as the review of Maudsley's "Physiology and Pathology of the Mind;" of Dr. Peabody's last work, and of the "Old Roman World" of Doctor John Lord. Doctor Lord, we should say, will hardly publish many more books. Moral indignation is not poured out by his reviewer; but facts are brought to bear on him in a way that makes one pity him almost more than a Christian ought to bear.

Recent Republications.—There is a good deal of very clever writing of the keen and witty controversial sort in English religious journals, and in the pamphlets which are constantly published by one or another sectarian champion. We, over here, however, most often do not understand the merits of the particular controversies, so the writing of which we speak is almost wholly unread among us. Indeed, it is not far from being unreadable; the learning and acumen of the writers are apt to seem to us as if wasted on things essentially trivial, or, at best, of much less than vital importance; the wit is in great part unintelligible except to the clerical reader well up in the quarrels which constitute the late history of the Church of England, and then, too, sharp as much of it is, it very often is marked by a sort of small spitefulness, an unmanly littleness and bitterness which are pretty sure to sicken the lay reader—the reader, at any rate, who is a layman of some other Church than the English Episcopal, and who has no special reason for hating a "Latitudinarian" more than he hates an "Attitudinarian" or a "Platitudinarian." There were many thousands of people in England who took extreme unchristian pleasure, we suppose, in a recent conundrum which asserted that Eve before she fell was Eve-angelical, but afterwards took to vestments; and there were thousands of others deeply pained and grieved by it. But nearly all Americans would have to take a course of Sundays with the young gentlemen up at St. Alban's before they would see the heinousness of it, or why it was thought to be a good joke. This pamphlet,* then, may perhaps be imagined dull in a high degree, when we say that it gives the substance of a debate which is supposed to have taken place in convocation between the Very Reverend Deans Blunt, Pliable, Pompous, Primitive, and Critical; the Venerable Archdeacons Jolly, Theory, and Chasuble; the Reverend Doctors Easy, Viewy, and Candor; and the Reverend Messrs. Lavender Kidds, Athanasius Benedict, the Professor of History, and the Professor of Theology. The pamphlet is, however, so far from being dull that it is most readable; readable, because of its humor, sometimes sly, sometimes—as whenever Lavender Kidds is brought on the stage—farcically broad, sometimes gravely ironical; because of its wit and its logical conclusiveness; and is worth reading, if for no other reason, because of its spirited, clear delineation of the muddle in which the Anglican Church now is because of its relations with the state, its mixed, compromising body of doctrines, and more particularly because of its relations with the Romish Church of past and present history.

The question proposed for discussion on the first day of debate relates to the doctrine of authority:

Dr. Easy rose to propose the question of which he had given notice at the previous sitting of Convocation: "Would it be considered heresy in the Church of England to deny the existence of God?" It had occurred to him that he should perhaps adopt a form more convenient for the present debate, if he put the question thus: "Would a clergyman, openly teaching that there was no God, be liable to suspension?"

Archdeacon Jolly thought not. What the Church of England especially prided herself upon was the breadth of her views. No view could be broader than the one just stated, and therefore none more likely to meet with the sanction of the Privy Council, which, he apprehended, was the real point to be kept in view in the discussion of this interesting question. (Hear, hear.)

Dean Blunt concurred in the opinion that Breadth and the Privy Council were kindred ideas. Still, it might be asked, could even the doctrinal elasticity of that tribunal become sufficiently expansive to embrace the enormous hypothesis of his learned friend? He ventured to think that it could. Let it be supposed that some clergyman of the Church of England —say the Archbishop of Canterbury—should publicly teach that there was no God. The case being brought before the Privy Council, it might be reasonably assumed that that supreme Arbiter of Anglican doctrine would deliver some such judgment as the following:

* "The Comedy of Convocation in the English Church. In Two Scenes." Edited by Archdeacon Chasuble, D.D. New York: The Catholic Publication Society. 1868.

"We find that the Church of England is not opposed to the existence of a God. At the same time, we cannot overlook the fact that the nineteenth Article, in affirming that all churches, even the Apostolic, have erred in matters of faith, obviously implies that the Church of England may err also in the same way. Therefore the Church of England may err in teaching that there is a God. We conclude that whilst, on the one hand, the Archbishop has taken an extreme or one-sided view of the teaching of the Church, on the other, for the reason assigned, it is undoubtedly open to every clergyman either to believe in or to deny the existence of a God."

We have no space to do more than indicate the line of argument. The discordant views brought forward by the various speakers are shown to be perfectly incapable of reconcilement. On the second day of debate the question under consideration is the nature of Holy Orders in the Church of England—a question neither so interesting in itself nor so conclusively answered as the one which was discussed on the preceding day. Lastly, we have some satirical portraits of various kinds of clergymen—the "high and dry," the "sensational," the "ritualist," the "amatory," and so on, and they are put before us at least as vividly as in the works of the novelists and social essayists to whom they have been a prey for several years past. On the whole we do not know why "Anglo-Catholics," or "Ritualists," or "Bible Episcopalians," or clerical "Broad Churchmen," "High Churchmen," "Low Churchmen," or other Churchmen should be at all pleased with the pamphlet, except as each may see the others depicted in it. The Anglican Establishment generally—as outsiders will think—is very successfully attacked in it. The Romish case as against other Protestant communions the author does not present. We have not space to say so much about the pamphlet, nor to let it say so much about itself, as we willingly would; but we expect for it a general perusal. As for its authorship, we do not know to whom to attribute it. Father Newman has been credited with it, and need not, so far as his reputation is concerned, resent the imputation. It is not his, we should say, and we know too little of late English Catholics to even conjecture to whom belongs the honor of producing so clever a satire.

NOW READY. PRICE 25 CENTS.

Part I. of the New Series of the PEOPLE'S MAGAZINE.

CONTENTS:

Full-page Chromo-lithograph from J. E. Millais's "Little Red Riding Hood."
Full-page Sir Edwin Landseer's "The Pet."
1. Contrast; or, The Schoolfellows. A Tale.
2. The Annual Inundation of the Nile.
3. The Christian's Future—to Follow Christ. Sermon by the Lord Bishop of Lincoln.
4. Chateau Gaillard, "The Saucy Castle" of Richard Cœur de Lion.
5. Tanlongbo's Wallet. Chapter I.—Cowslip Day in Sheneland.
6. Physiology for Practical Use. No. 1.—The Faculty of Hearing.
7. Church of England Worthies. No. I.—Bishop of Mackenzie.
8. Parables of Animals. No. 1.—The Travels of Queen Lory.
9. Colliery Explosions.
10. Without a Character. Part I.
11. Home Thoughts for Working-women and Mothers' Meetings.
12. Vegetable Autographs. By Sir John Herschel.

With Poetry, Short Notes, and Seventeen Wood-cuts. Sixty-four large pages.

Single numbers by mail, prepaid, 25 cents.

Subscription for the year, $3; three copies, $8 50; five copies, $12 50; ten copies, $25, and an extra copy free.

Liberal inducements offered to canvassers and agents. Send for a circular.

Subscribers are requested to send their remittances direct to

POTT & AMERY, Publishers,
29 Cooper Union, New York.

 A sample number sent free on application to any one wishing to form a club.

THE NATION.—"I wish it success from the bottom of my heart."—Rev. Henry W. Bellows.

THE CHRONICLE:

A London weekly newspaper, devoted, in politics, to a right understanding and just treatment of the Irish question; in literature, to the expression of the opinions of scholars who are authorities in their respective departments. Special attention paid to Continental contemporary literature.

Terms: $9 per annum; $4 50 for six months; $2 25 for three months—in gold, all postage prepaid and included. Subscriptions received by

E. L. GODKIN & CO.,
Nation Office, New York.

 Specimen numbers forwarded on request.

PUTNAM'S

MONTHLY MAGAZINE

OF

LITERATURE, SCIENCE, ART, AND NATIONAL INTERESTS.

Contents for February, 1868.

I. Too True: A Novel. Chaps III. and IV.
II. Broadway.
III. Dante and his Latest Translators.
IV. Diary of James Fenimore Cooper.
V. A Talk with our Next President.
VI. The Mystery of the Gilded Cameo.
VII. Ilium Fuit.
VIII. The Coming Revolution in England.
IX. Making the Most of One's Self.
X. Life in Great Cities: Rome.
XI. The Republic of Elsewhere.
XII. A Sea-View.
XIII. The Venus of Milo.
XIV. Fitz-Greene Halleck; with Portrait from drawing by Horatio Greenough, engraved on steel by Burt.
XV. The Outcast.
XVI. Monthly Chronicle—
1. Occurrences. 3. Fine Arts.
2. Literature. 4. Table-Talk.

Putnam's Magazine for 1868:

The reissue of Putnam's Magazine has been hailed with acclamation in every section of the country, and the publishers are gratified at being able to acknowlege almost innumerable expressions of pleasure and good-will from readers and friends of the first series of "Putnam's Monthly." It is their purpose, in their new enterprise, to leave nothing undone to meet the expectations and desires of the public.

Terms: $4 per annum in advance, or 35 cents per number. Two copies to one address, $7; three copies to one address, $10; ten copies to one address, $30. Putnam's Magazine and Riverside Magazine for Young People (price $2 50) for $5 50; Putnam's Magazine and the Round Table (price $6) for $8; or with any other journal or magazine in the same proportion. Special premiums for Clubs.

G. P. PUTNAM & SON,
PUBLISHERS,
661 Broadway, New York.

L. W. SCHMIDT,

GERMAN BOOKSELLER,

24 Barclay Street, New York,

Imports regularly all the leading Foreign Publications, including Periodicals.

Foreign works noticed in The Nation kept constantly on hand, or procured to order.

Lippincott's Magazine

OF

Literature, Science, and Education.

FEBRUARY NUMBER:

1. DALLAS GALBRAITH: An American Novel. Part II.
2. LOOKING SEAWARD.
3. LIFE AND ITS ENIGMAS.
4. THE CHRISTIAN COMMISSION.
5. LOVE ON THE OHIO.
6. EUROPEAN AFFAIRS. The Roman Question—Fenianism.
7. RISTORI AS MARIE ANTOINETTE.
8. ALASKA. What is it Worth? With a Map.
9. THE OLD SLATE-ROOF HOUSE. II.
10. THE NATIONAL FINANCES.
11. REMINISCENCES OF FITZ-GREENE HALLECK.
12. THE ORANGE TREE.
13. ECHOES OF MELANCHOLY.
14. OUR MONTHLY GOSSIP.
15. LITERATURE OF THE DAY.

TERMS:

Yearly Subscription, Four dollars. Single numbers, thirty-five cents.

Specimen numbers sent to any address on receipt of thirty-five cents.

Subscribers will please be careful to give their post-office address in full.

NEW BOOKS:

THE VOICE IN SINGING. Translated from the German of Emma Seiler. 12mo, tinted paper, bound in extra cloth, $1 50.

HAROLD, the Last of the Saxon Kings. By Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton. Globe Edition. With Frontispiece. Tinted paper, cloth, $1 50.

EVERHART'S POEMS. Poems by James B. Everhart, author of a volume of "Miscellanies." 12mo, tinted paper, fine cloth, $1 25.

 For sale by all Booksellers, or will be sent by mail, postage free, on receipt of price by

J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO.,
Publishers, Booksellers, and Importers,
PHILADELPHIA.

READY TO DAY:
READ IT! READ IT!

The New and Remarkable Novel,

DAWN.

A work of rare excellence and of the most intense interest from beginning to end. It presents an originality and strength of thought, a freedom and boldness of expression, a liberality of views, and a series of new characters and new relations which cannot fail to attract universal attention, and render it the most widely read book of our city.

Price Two Dollars.

For sale by all booksellers. Copies mailed post-paid.

ADAMS & CO., Publishers, Boston.
O. S. FELT, 445 Broome Street, New York.

THE AMERICAN LAW REVIEW

FOR JANUARY, 1868.

VOL. II., NO. 2,

IS JUST PUBLISHED BY

LITTLE, BROWN & CO.,

BOSTON.

I. Liability as Partner.
II. Anomalies in the Law of Bailments.
III. Marriage as Affected by the Conflict of Laws.
IV. Sunday Laws.
V. The Internal Revenue System.
VI. Case of the Ring—Salvage.
VII. Digest of the English Law Reports for August, September, and October, 1867.
VIII. Digest of Cases Decided in the Supreme Court of the United States.
IX. Selected Digest of State Reports.
X. Book Notices.
XI. List of New Law Books published in England and America since Oct. 1, 1867.
XII. Summary of Events.

Subscription price, $5, payable in advance; single numbers, $1 25. Back numbers supplied. Vol. I., bound in law sheep, $6.

NEW LAW BOOKS IN PREPARATION:

THE FIRST BOOK OF THE LAW; or, An Introduction to Law Studies. By JOEL P. BISHOP, Esq.

CRIMINAL ABORTION. Considered in its Social, Medical, and Legal Aspects. By Professor HORATIO R. STORER, M.D., and F. F. HEARD, Esq.

OVERRULED CASES. A Collection of Cases Overruled, Doubted, or Limited in their Application, with Criticisms of the Text-writers and Reporters, taken from the English and American Reports. By F. F. HEARD, Esq.

NEW PUBLISHING HOUSE.

WYNKOOP & SHERWOOD,

18 BEEKMAN STREET, N. Y.

SHORT STUDIES FOR SUNDAY-SCHOOL TEACHERS.

BY REV. C. S. ROBINSON, D.D.

1 vol. 12mo, $1 50.

This is just the book to stir the heart and mind of the Sunday-school Teacher. Sprightly, fresh, full of thought, condensed, suggestive, and all aglow with the sacred fire, it is a book that cannot fail to do good. Every Sunday-school Superintendent and Teacher should own a copy.

SELECT HISTORICAL COSTUMES.

Contains thirty Lithographic Plates, highly colored by hand. Bound in English cloth, gilt, $10; turkey morocco, $15; extra, $18.

 All new books sent post-paid, on receipt of publishers' advertised rates.

CARMINA YALENSIA.

A new Collection of College Songs and Music, with Pianoforte Accompaniments, comprising all the old popular and standard college songs, with numerous pieces not hitherto published. The famous "Wooden Spoon Lancers," arranged by Helmsmüller, and the "Song of the Spoon;" also the celebrated "Christmas Anthem," as sung by the Beethoven Society of Yale, are included in this collection.

Large octavo, extra cloth, price $1 50. Sent by mail, postage paid, on receipt of price.

TAINTOR BROTHERS & CO.,

PUBLISHERS, 229 Broadway, N. Y.

THE NATION.—"I have never taken a weekly newspaper which, in all its departments, is so satisfactory to me as THE NATION."—Hon. J. D. Cox, Gov. of Ohio.

MOORHEAD, SIMPSON & BOND

HAVE JUST ISSUED:

I. PATHOLOGICAL ANATOMY OF THE FEMALE SEXUAL ORGANS. By Prof. JULIUS KLOB, M.D., of the University of Vienna. Translated from the German by JOSEPH KAMMERER, M.D., Physician to the German Hospital, and BENJAMIN F. DAWSON, M.D., Assistant to the Chair of Obstetrics in the College of Physicians and Surgeons. Vol. I. Affections of the Uterus. Price $3 50.

II. LIGHT: ITS INFLUENCE ON LIFE AND HEALTH. By FORBES WINSLOW, M.D., D.C.L., etc., etc. Price $2.

"A most charming work upon a most important subject."

III. THE PRINCIPLES AND PRACTICE OF LARYNGOSCOPY AND RHINOSCOPY, in Diseases of the Throat and Nasal Passages. With 59 Engravings on Wood. By ANTOINE RUPPANER, A.M., M.D. Price $2.

IV. THE GLAD NEW YEAR, and other Poems. By ETHEL WOLF. Price $1 25.

All the above sent by mail, postage paid, on receipt of price.

ON THE 1st OF MAY NEXT

we will begin the publication of a new Quarterly Journal, entitled the American Journal of Obstetrics,

AND DISEASES OF WOMEN AND CHILDREN.

Edited by EMIL NOEGRATH, M.D., and B. W. DAWSON, M.D.

This Journal has long been much needed, and will be contributed to by some of the most eminent obstetricians in the United States.

MOORHEAD, SIMPSON & BOND,

PUBLISHERS,

61 Duane Street, New York.

THE NATION.—"As a journal truly national, and democratic in the best sense, it has no superior."—Ashtabula Sentinel.

DAVID C. FRANCIS

(FORMERLY C. S. FRANCIS & CO.),

DEALER IN NEW AND OLD BOOKS,

506 BROADWAY (UP STAIRS).

Priced catalogues of books in stock issued from time to time, and will be forwarded free to any address.

Orders for any obtainable books promptly filled.

Binding executed in any style.

THE NEW ECLECTIC.

EDITED BY

LAWRENCE TURNBULL AND FRIDGE MURDOCH.

CONTENTS OF FEBRUARY NUMBER:

Frontispiece Portrait of Thomas Carlyle.
I. Music and Architecture—The Fortnightly Review.
II. Aunt Anastasia on Society—Tinsley's Magazine.
III. Mr. Arnold and Mr. Swinburne—The Contemporary Review.
IV. A City Apologue—St. Paul's.
V. Phineas Finn, the Irish Member—Anthony Trollope.
VI. Democracy, Carlyle, and Whitman—The Round Table.
VII. Ireland for the Irish—Tinsley's Magazine.
VIII. The Companionship of Books—The Saturday Review.
IX. The Comedy of Convocation—The Catholic World.
X. Scientific—The Nation.
XI. Reviews—Selected.
XII. Recent Publications—Publishers' Lists.
XIII. Miscellany—Our Exchanges.
XIV. Editorial.

For sale by the AMERICAN NEWS COMPANY.

NOW READY,

THE RIVERSIDE MAGAZINE

FOR YOUNG PEOPLE.

NO. XIV.—FEBRUARY, 1868.

CONTENTS:

The Moon. By "Fern Lodge." With a page-drawing in tint of the "Man in the Moon," and smaller illustrations, by the Author.—The Young Virginian. Chap. I. By Porte Crayon. With three illustrations by the author.—My Last Adventure.—Life in a German Village. By B. G. With four illustrations from drawings by the author.—Hunter and Tom. Chaps. IV.–VI. By Jacob Abbott. With an illustration by Courtland Hoppin.—The Great Snow-Storm. By M. S. B., Jr.—Griselda Goose. By Phœbe Cary. With a page illustration by H. L. Stephens.—Kaleidoscopes and Burglars.—Little Lou's Sayings and Doings. Chaps. IV.–VI. By the author of "Susy's Six Birthdays." With an illustration by E. B. Bensell.—Stories from Shakespeare. V. Macbeth.—Ainslee's Valentine. By Helen C. Weeks. With an illustration by Sidney L. Smith.—Books for Young People. Recent Publications.—Patch-work. By the Editor and his friends.—Song, Happy Days. Music by Karl Reden.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION:

$2 50 a year, in advance; three copies, $6 50; five copies, $10; ten copies, $20, and an extra copy gratis.

Specimen copies of the first number sent by mail, pre paid, on receipt of twenty cents.

HURD & HOUGHTON,

PUBLISHERS,

459 Broome Street, New York.

 RIVERSIDE MAGAZINE, Vol. I. (1867), cloth, $3; cloth, gilt, $3 50.

Canvassers wanted, to whom liberal terms will be given.

THE NATION.—"The best American, and, of its kind, for Americans, the best existing periodical."—Brooklyn Union.

PRANG'S AMERICAN CHROMOS

Are fac-similes of Oil and Water-Color Paintings by the best masters. They are artistic copies; and, in most cases, fully equal to the originals. An eminent critic says of our Chromos of Tait's Groups:

"Mr. Louis Prang, of Boston, of whose efforts to disseminate through the country faithful copies of our wild flowers, butterflies, moths, and birds, in such pretty forms and so cheaply as to drive out of the market all inferior publications, has just issued a chromo-lithograph in oils of one of Mr. A. F. Tait's clever little pictures. The chromo-lithograph is a perfect fac-simile of the original painting, reproducing not only the brush-marks, but the very lines of the canvas, in a way that surprises by its ingenuity. Mr. Prang tries with all his might to make his imitations absolutely deceptive, not for the purpose of deceiving, but in order to put faithful copies, 'as good as the originals,' within the reach of small purses. He brings to the work knowledge, business energy, and enthusiasm, and, what is more, a generous spirit towards art and artists, which is very pleasant to meet with. He has our cordial thanks for what he has already done, and our trust that he will do his best to educate the class he works for in the love of what is true as well as beautiful."

GROUP OF CHICKENS (10 x 12 inches), . . . $5
GROUP OF DUCKLINGS (10 x 12 inches), . . . $5
GROUP OF QUAILS (10 x 12 inches), . . . $5

Ask for them at the Art Stores. They will be sent, free of expense, to any address on receipt of the retail price. Our "Journal of Popular Art" describes how these pictures are made, and contains articles and letters by several eminent Americans. Mailed free. Address

L. PRANG & CO.,

FINE ART PUBLISHERS,

Boston, Mass.

THE NATION.—"I appreciate THE NATION far above any of the issues of the day."—Edw. McPherson, Esq., Clerk U. S. House of Representatives.

MADISON
PUBLIC LIBRARY

The Nation.

VOL. VI.—NO. 135. THURSDAY, JANUARY 30, 1868. { FIVE DOLLARS PER ANNUM. TWELVE CENTS PER COPY.

CONTENTS.

THE WEEK 81

EDITORIAL ARTICLES:
Congress and the Freedmen 84
The Supreme Court Bills 85
An Odd Story 87

Deterioration in American Manners ... 87
Paris Gossip 88

CORRESPONDENCE 90

NOTES:

Literary 90

General Greene 92
Hinton's Historical Costumes 92
The Magazines for February 93
Recent Republications.—My Prisons.—The Story of My Childhood.—O-Kee-pa.—Greek Elements.—Condensed French Instruction ..... 95—96

Five Dollars per annum, in advance; Six months, Three Dollars; Forty Dollars to Clubs of Ten; Clergymen, Four Dollars.

THE NATION is sent till positively ordered discontinued, and all arrears have been paid. Subscribers are particularly requested to note the expiration of their subscriptions, and to forward what is due for the ensuing year, with or without further reminder from this office.

GEORGE STREET, 30 CORNHILL, LONDON, E. C., AGENT FOR THE RECEIPT OF SUBSCRIPTIONS AND ADVERTISEMENTS.

E. L. GODKIN & CO., PUBLISHERS, Box 6732, NEW YORK CITY.

The Week.

THE week's work in Congress has been somewhat broken up by the necessity of eulogizing members recently deceased—Mr. Hamilton, Mr. Hise, Mr. Noell—framing the customary resolutions, and adjourning. But on the 21st instant the House voted down Mr. Butler's amendment to the consolidating military bill, and an amendment which would have given to the Southern conventions, now sitting, the power to appoint State officers instead of leaving that function to the people at large. Mr. Butler, Mr. Stevens, and Mr. Kelley spoke in behalf of the amendment, but 112 members, Republicans and Democrats, voted against it, leaving Mr. Butler in a minority of 53. The original bill then passed by a party vote, 123 to 45, and goes to the Senate, where it may very likely stay for some time. Senator Doolittle, on Thursday, delivered a long oration against it, which is variously characterized by various journals. Mr. Trumbull, Mr. Nye, Mr. Morton, Mr. Wilson, and other senators have since made speeches in reply to it. On Wednesday the Senate debated Mr. Thomas's case. In the House, Mr. Chanler, of New York, called Mr. Julian a coward, and Mr. Julian having invited Mr. Chanler to test that question whenever he liked, Mr. Chanler signified his intention of doing so at an early date. On Friday there was debate on the consolidating bill in the Senate, and in the House a bill to prevent the payment of damages for Southern railroads seized during the war, and for lands seized for military purposes, was debated, and on Monday was passed. On Saturday Mr. Sitgraves, of New Jersey, discussed the state of the Union "from a Christian stand-point;" debate on the Prodigal Son and on Eve then followed. On Monday, in the Senate, there was more speech-making on reconstruction. In the House, a bill regarding the protection of American citizens was reported by Mr. Banks.

Reconstruction Bill No. 4, as just said, is still in the Senate, and has been debated during the week. It abolishes, as our readers may remember, all existing civil government at the South, and substitutes a military dictatorship under General Grant. We designate it by a number imply for convenience, and not by way of exhibiting our disrespect for it, although we confess we do not respect it, and never shall, until some member of Congress gets up in his place and tells the country, in a straightforward way, why it was introduced. Nobody has as yet done so. All the speeches that have been made in its favor are simply arguments showing the necessity of Reconstruction Bill No. 1. No. 1 we supported; Nos. 2 and 3 we also supported, because the haste and recklessness with which No. 1 was pushed through both Houses made them absolutely necessary to give it effect. We shall also support No. 4, when we hear in what respect it excels its predecessors, and why they have failed, if they have failed. But we cannot support all of them at once, and would not even if our support had far more value than we claim for it. Everybody owes something, even in the most exciting times, to his own character and intellect, and we shall not stultify or degrade ourselves, or seek to stultify and degrade our readers, no matter what the consequences may be. If the first plan of reconstruction was a good one, this last one is not; we can stand by either one or the other, but not both together. We are still of the opinion, which we expressed last week, that the public is of our way of thinking, and many of the most influential Republican journals all over the country begin to speak their minds out. One of the most marked signs that things are going badly with the party is the increasing desperation of the New York Tribune, which already shows symptoms of one of those frightful fits of immorality to which it is liable immediately before election, and at other times when hard pressed. It calls on people to stand by Congress through thick and thin, and accuses everybody who does not like Congressional doings of crying or feeling "Down with the nigger!" There is nothing like having things made plain. Moreover, as its temper is getting very ugly, we advise the "weak-kneed" to confine themselves to their houses for a few days.

The principal speeches on the bill have been made by Mr. Doolittle against it, and Mr. Trumbull for it, and the discussion could hardly have fallen into better hands. It was begun by Mr. Doolittle's moving that in any bill relating to reconstruction a clause be inserted providing that negro voters must either have served in the Federal army or know how to read and write, or possess a certain amount of property. He supported this in a long denunciation of the whole plan of reconstruction, and by arguments with which the public is very familiar. For the benefit of those who do not know the trick by which speeches such as this are made to wear a plausible air, we may mention that it consists in a careful suppression of a long string of essential facts. For instance, the recent liberation of the negroes from slavery is dwelt on in glowing terms as a reason for not admitting them to a share in the Government; but the fact that this very circumstance renders them peculiarly exposed to oppression in various forms is carefully concealed, and so, also, is the fact that the very first use the whites made of their newly-recovered legislative power, after the war was over, was to make a series of elaborate arrangements for "keeping the negroes down." There was one part of Mr. Doolittle's speech which was almost amusing, and that was where he expressed his horror at the eagerness of the Republicans to use the Southern vote to keep their party in power, and at the frankness with which Mr. Stevens avowed it. We confess we share strongly in this eagerness, because parties mean principles and policy, and a party's being in power means that a certain line of legislation will be pursued. It is because we think the Republicans are not careful enough of their power, and, we fear, are endangering it, that we find fault with their recent enactments. Mr. Trumbull spoke ably, and with a great deal of feeling, and pricked several of Mr. Doolittle's bubbles very effectively; but the discussion had no special bearing, as we have said already, on Bill No. 4. Why, we want to know, is it necessary to make a military officer a dictator, and set the President aside completely?

"Historicus" continues to write to the London Times on the question of "indefeasible allegiance," and his last letter is an elaborate charge of inconsistency against American politicians for the loudness with which they are urging on the adoption of Great Britain doctrines on the subject of naturalization which this Government has never adopted itself. He shows, as it is quite easy to show, that the American doctrine on this subject, both as laid down by the courts ever since the foundation of the Government and as expounded by the elementary writers such as Wheaton and Kent, is, that allegiance is indefeasible, and that when a man who has been naturalized in a foreign country returns to the country of his birth all the duties and obligations from which his departure relieved him descend upon him again in full force. General Cass was in fact the first American diplomatist to throw any doubt on the correctness of this view of the law, and he was not a very weighty authority. Therefore, as we pointed out some weeks ago, the agitation which is now raging on this subject should be directed towards procuring a change in the law and practice of this country as a preliminary to all attacks upon other countries. It is time that the American doctrine of allegiance were authoritatively revised and restated, and we wish Congress would address itself to the work under the guidance of sensible men who know something about the subject. The Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs ought to have taken the matter in hand before now and we hoped it would do so. The Committee of the House, however, has now unfortunately got the start of the Senate, and another of Mr. Banks's great "reports" is already out. We shall doubtless before long have his "great speech." We have as yet seen only a newspaper abstract of the report, so it would be unfair to criticise it very fully. It appears to state the case between this country and Great Britain fairly enough; but, the Fenians being dragged in, Mr. Banks is himself again, and gives way to the feelings of his too impressible nature. Two passages the abstract reproduces in extenso, and they are of their kind perfect. In one Mr. Banks attacks feudalism and plays shocking havoc with that unfortunate institution, in the other he eulogizes the German Confederation in a very patronizing manner. We never felt really sorry for feudalism till we read his scathing exposure of it. He says "the feudal claim is absolute over the mind as over the body. It denies liberty of conscience and of thought by the same title that it proscribes the right of locomotion. It dwarfs human capacity and reason, and corrupts the nature of man and society. As a subject, the life of Bacon is an offence; as a scholar, it is the glory of his race. Shakespeare is known to the law as a criminal; in the world of letters and of liberty he is revered as an immortal spirit." Nobody who has the credit of the nation at heart can read stuff of this sort without real sadness, especially when he remembers that Congress and the country swarm with men who do understand the subjects on which Mr. Banks speaks and reports, and who could, if they were allowed, treat them with force, clearness, and common sense

Supreme Court Bill No. 3 absolutely forbids the Supreme Court to take jurisdiction of any case in law or equity arising out of the Reconstruction acts, and the bill is framed under the clause in the Constitution which provides "that the court shall, in cases not affecting ambassadors and consuls, and in which a state is not a party, have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and to fact, with such exceptions and under such regulations as the Congress shall make." The latest commentator on the Constitution—and he is a very radical one—Judge Timothy Farrer, interprets this as a grant of power to Congress to remove certain cases from the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, but denies, and with great force, the right of Congress to remove any case arising under the laws and Constitution of the United States from the jurisdiction of all legal tribunals whatever, or to remove it from that of the Supreme Court without providing for its final settlement by some other court, as this bill does. Be this as it may, the press, both Democratic and Republican, seem disposed to admit that the bill is constitutional, and do not conceal their admiration of the ingenuity which contrived it. Its expediency is another question, and for thinking it highly inexpedient we give our reasons elsewhere. The Springfield Republican suggests reasonably enough that the "exceptions" should be made larger, so as to embrace all acts passed by the present Congress. If this game of "exceptions," as an instrument of party warfare, be once fairly entered on, we venture to say that, in the course of the next twenty years, the constitutionality of half the statutes at large would be withdrawn from the cognizance of the Supreme Court. It is luckily three years before the Democrats can get the upper hand in Congress, but when they do, there will be some wonder-working legislation.

A direct attempt at inflation has at length been made in the House by Mr. Ingersoll, who proposes to issue $45,000,000 fresh greenbacks, so as to bring the total amount in circulation up to $400,000,000. This, or something like it, has evidently, judging from the buoyancy of the stock market, been expected by the speculators for the last week or ten days. There is something symmetrical and orderly in the suggestion, which makes it at first sight attractive, and there is probably a large number of people who will be readily persuaded that if this concession be made to the inflationists they will accept it as a finality. But unless human nature has undergone some great change within the last year, it is safe to say that this will be found to be a delusion. Every motive which actuates those who clamor for expansion now, will impel them with even greater force to seek a further expansion a year hence. By that time prices will again have found their level; business will again begin to "stagnate;" money will begin to be "scarce" (as if the mass of men ever found it plenty), and the crops at the West will again be difficult "to move"—those crops are such solid bodies. In old times, people who found money "scarce," and their goods hard to "move," had either to use their credit in procuring it, or wait for mining operations to increase the volume of the currency; but now that the whole thing can be accomplished by "running a mill," it is safe to assert that these efforts to "expand" will be periodically renewed until either the paper currency has been made worthless—that is, repudiated—or until sound economical ideas have worked their way by some process—we know not what—into the heads of the Western farmers and traders. God has not worked a miracle, and is not going to work a miracle, for the benefit of the West, though the prairies were twice as big, and the coal-fields twice as deep; and, the West may rely on it, it will yet come full butt against the laws of nature, and find it a skull-cracking experience.

"Carl Benson," though entirely wanting in humor, is a good observer and a thoroughly fair describer, and is not a man from whom one would expect much sympathy with, or indulgence for, black politicians. An account from him, therefore, such as he sent to the New York Times of Monday last, of a visit to the Constitutional Convention now sitting in Charleston, is very interesting, particularly as the newspaper reporters pursue the old plan of making their descriptions of all such bodies as this tally with the political opinions of the paper for which they write. He says many of the colored delegates were "intelligent and respectable looking men," and asserts that the whites were fully "up to the average of political bodies at the North or elsewhere, in appearance at least—the local newspapers to the contrary notwithstanding." He says, moreover, that there was nothing remarkable about the proceedings except "a little greenness in organizing," but predicts that, the negro being an imitative animal, "he will acquire all forms of political business quite soon enough." He asks, pertinently enough, of those who decry the legislating capacity of these conventions, Whose fault is it if the whites are not represented in them?

General Butler has had many odd experiences, but none odder than the last. He was challenged at Richmond the other day to fight a duel by a Methodist preacher. The cause of this outburst of ferocity on the part of the preacher was an order issued by General

Butler in 1864, expelling him, then Major White of a New York regiment, from his department for having deliberately resigned his commission in the presence of the enemy for the purpose of starting in business as a sutler in the very camp in which he had been serving as a field officer. He was vigorously kicked out of the department in an admirable order, which, for our part, we find too mild. If, as the papers say, he has since been received into, or allowed to continue in, the Methodist body as a preacher, somebody there has much to answer for. We detest General Butler's politics, and think he is even less useful in that field than he would be in command of a seventy-four sailing ship; but his manner of dealing with rascals whom the civil law could not reach will always be one of the choicest chapters in the history of the war. His administration of the government of New Orleans was positively a contribution to civilization itself, and there will never be a true lover of his kind to the remotest ages who will not chuckle over it with delight. Would that a department could be created for him to rule in perpetuity, to which we could send all our hardened blackguards, rowdies, and snivelling cheats and impostors! They would improve under his sway, and the spectacle would be highly moral, and the nation would profit by having his vigorous and active mind withdrawn from the consideration of the public finances.

The manufacturers who have been meeting in convention at Cleveland and Worcester are doing good service by concentrating their fire on the heavy expenditures of the Government, and pressing for a reduction of taxation as the first and great step to financial revival. It is in reality the weight of the taxes which has raised the cry for inflation and repudiation. They are spreading, too, some valuable documents; but occasionally one comes across curious little bits of absurdity in them. Mr. E. B. Ward, for instance, in a vigorous onslaught on the Secretary of the Treasury, utters the following lamentation:

"Our foreign trade has drained this country of its precious metals, and is still taking every dollar produced from our rich mines. It has taken over a thousand millions of our securities, and is steadily creating a foreign mortgage on our whole national estate."

What would Mr. Ward do with the products of our "rich mines" if he could keep them? eat them? drink them? wear them? use them as money—when people prefer paper, checks, drafts, and credits? What harm does it do to have the foreigners take our securities? If they lend us money at six per cent. when we can make twenty-five per cent. on it, why in the name of common sense should we not give them all the securities they can be got to take? How will that "mortgage on our whole national estate" be foreclosed? By what process? In what court? Who will sell it—who buy it? Is not this kind of wild talk from shrewd business men misleading, and therefore mischievous?

The British never can understand our institutions. The last instance of their obtuseness which we have observed is in the London Spectator. The Spectator tell its readers of the horrible Lake Shore accident of last December, when sixty people were killed. "Let us hope," says the Spectator, "that the catastrophe will cure American railway officials of their insane custom of locking the carriages." One would suppose that the writer really was in a position to inform his fellow-subjects how the Americans manage their railways. We fearlessly call on any gentleman who has ever travelled by rail in our whole wide country, and New Jersey, to say whether or not one of the two doors is not perpetually swinging and banging backward and forward? Does not a very sensitive man frequently have moments of agony when he feels a dull jar, and suspects that one of his neighbors, walking the length of the train, has slipped down to the track and been cut up at the rate of thirty miles an hour? The fact of the matter is—and the head of the Travellers' Club or the Resident Commissioner of the Tribune will confirm all we say—the American car is rarely locked except for the purpose of keeping people out of it. They lock it when it is in the depot and people are anxious for seats. At other times it is as free as the boundless continent of freedom.

The foreign news continues to be uninteresting; the cable newsman, too, has either been changed or he has lost all his former exuberance of imagination. He now furnishes hard, dry facts—not always very important, but still facts. Of his own emotions he talks sparingly, and does not describe the feelings "which prevail throughout Europe" as freely as he once did. In France, the army bill having passed, the public mind is absorbed in speculating on the use the Emperor will make of the enormous force now placed at his disposal, and somehow nobody seems to believe that he will use it simply to keep the peace. The German and Russian press evidently look for something astounding in the spring, and the occasional savage allusions to Italy in the semi-official papers in Paris strengthen the impression that "somebody will be whopped" before long for something. There is not the least likelihood, however, that the Emperor, let him be ever so bellicose, will be able to bring the new army into use for a year at least. It has to be organized and drilled, and will not reach its full strength for six years. At present, even with the Chassepot rifle—"Saint Chassepot," as the Parisian wags now call it—the French army is no more than strong enough to prevent Prussia gobbling it up in a three months' campaign. The fact has come out in the debates on the army bill that, though it was never in better condition than in 1859, the Emperor was only able to bring one hundred thousand men into line at Solferino. It is no stronger now, and will be no stronger in spring, and therefore it is not at all likely that it will undertake the task of stirring up General Moltke.

Moreover, the army bill is intensely unpopular in the rural districts. This is not denied in any quarter, and the rural districts form the imperial strongholds. The population is stationary; there are in French families no spare sons whom fathers are glad to get rid of, or even to whose departure they easily reconcile themselves. They have rarely more than three children, and nearly every man has a father or mother or sisters to take care of; there is, therefore, very little food for cannon amongst them, and when the shells begin to break in French ranks they work a desolation unknown in almost any other army. Moreover, the financial difficulties are rapidly growing serious. We spoke recently of the rapidity with which the public debt has increased under the present régime—130 per cent. The Government is now forced, after a long run of heavy deficits, to announce another loan, of nearly $90,000,000; and, to make matters worse, the payment of the Mexican bondholders is one of the objects to which the money is to be devoted. As might be expected, the restiveness of the Government under criticism increases. The newspapers are only allowed to publish two kinds of reports of the proceedings in the Corps Législatif—one an official verbatim report, appearing first in the Moniteur; the other a condensed one, prepared under the supervision of the Presidents of the two Chambers. The newspapers do publish these; but, having published them, they naturally comment upon them, and, in commenting on them, say unpleasant things of various speakers. The editorial deductions thus drawn from the reports the Government chooses to consider garbled or distorted reports, and is prosecuting for them right and left. The remonstrances of the Liberals in the Chamber the ministers meet with that windy declamation in which French politicians delight, and in which M. Rouher excels. A good illustration of what we mean was to be found in one of his late speeches on the Roman question, in which he abuses the Italians for being troubled "because an old man stretches out his hands in prayer under the dome of St. Peter's."

In England, Fenianism, and still Fenianism, and nothing but Fenianism, occupies the public mind. The latest "outrages" are bold robberies of gun-shops. The Fenians have doubtless taken to this mode of stirring up their enemies in order to spread an impression that they are preparing for a desperate and bloody rising. But this, we take it, is simply a little joke of theirs. They do not think of fighting in the open field, or if they did, would hardly rely on a monthly robbery of a gun-shop for their armament. Lord Stanley has firmly and decidedly put an extinguisher on all hopes of a radical settlement of the land difficulty by the Tory Ministry, which makes it not unlikely that it is on the Irish question the Liberals under Gladstone will oust them, if not this year, next year, in the reformed Parliament. The only social sensation has been caused by the appearance of another volume of the Queen's book, which, it must be confessed, considering the condition of the kingdom, is strange reading.

Articles on any of the subjects usually discussed in this Journal will be received from any quarter. If used, they will be liberally paid for; if rejected, they will be returned to the writers on the receipt of the requisite amount of postage stamps.

All Communications which pertain to the literary management of THE NATION should be addressed to the Editor.

CONGRESS AND THE FREEDMEN.

IN 1865, some prominent Radicals conceived the idea that the Supreme Court might be made to do the work of reconstruction, by deciding that no government was "republican" in the sense in which the term is used by the Constitution in which men were disqualified from voting on the ground of color. The Nation, which had then just entered on its existence, opposed this scheme on two grounds: The first was, that the court would, if it did its duty, have to interpret the Constitution in the sense attached to its language by its framers, and not in the sense which the progress of the world in political morality makes the present generation wish they had attached to it; and in the former sense a state might clearly be "republican," and yet exclude men from citizenship on any ground, however absurd. The second was that it was dangerous to ask a court of law to extract a "latent spirit" from the Constitution. We said (No. 6 of the Nation): "We think the Supreme Court entirely unfit to be entrusted with any such task; we think appeals of this kind to it, at such crises as the present, are, if it responds to them, full of danger as precedents. We have already had one specimen of its legislation, and we never desire to see another. The President and Congress can do the work, in our opinion, far more effectually and with far less shock to the body politic."

This scheme of appealing to the court, we were informed, on good authority, had the approbation of several of the chief Radical leaders. We relied, however, on what is far higher authority than any of the leaders—reason, experience, and well-settled principles of political science. We knew very well that these could not be set aside for any cause, however noble, and that they would have to be followed in reconstruction as in any other political process. As no more than one opinion at a time was at that period permitted in the ranks of the Republican party, we naturally incurred a good deal of odium by our audacity. The Boston Transcript, usually a very sensible paper on political questions, had a sad attack of "holy wrath," and denounced us in good set terms. We had been in the course of the discussion so imprudent as to cite Montesquieu as an authority touching the meaning attached to political terms in the eighteenth century. This appeared to the Transcript a piece of unseemly levity, not unlike quoting Tom Paine or the "Comic Songster" in the middle of a sermon. For some weeks afterwards we received by every mail a small packet of abuse from people of whom many appeared to have a horrible suspicion that Montesquieu was a Breckinridge delegate to the Charleston Convention, and that our appealing to him was proof positive that the Nation was going over to the Copperheads.

We have lived to see all hope of using the court as an instrument of reconstruction given up. More than this, we now see denied not only its right to share in reconstruction, but its right to interpret the Constitution on any political question properly so called. Not this only; we see abuse and ridicule of the court form a prominent feature in Congressional debates, and attempts to shear it of all power and to lower it in the estimation of the public made a prominent feature in Congressional legislation. Moreover, we see the despised Montesquieu, for whose exposure in 1865 to the scorn of so many acute and comprehensive minds we blamed ourselves deeply, rising into Radical favor. He was actually quoted in the House last week by Mr. Bingham, who pronounces him a "profound thinker," and belabors the judiciary with him in good lusty style. In fact, we hardly doubt that the French jurist will, if the present controversy last much longer, take a place in Congressional esteem second only to the Globe, the "Classical Dictionary," and "Plutarch's Lives."

We recall all this not by way of self-glorification or recrimination, but for instruction and for warning, and for the justification of those who, during the last three eventful years, have honored us with their confidence. We do not claim credit for either remarkable wisdom or sagacity. We have simply trusted to the evidence of our senses, and held on to the belief that, human nature not having undergone any extraordinary change within the historic period, human experience was of considerable value at such a crisis as this, and that politics have not been studied and practised for some thousands of years without giving out a few truths worth remembering and applying. We have never surrendered, too, the conviction, which must at times be the sole support of anybody who honestly seeks to form his opinions for himself, that the political progress of the race must in the main rest on reason and not on enthusiasm, and that very little can be done for it simply by discoursing on "eternal justice," "the rights of man," by feeling humane, and occasionally giving three cheers.

We hold to-day the very same opinions about the power of the court and about the power of Congress we held three years ago. We believe it will be well for the court if it keep out of the reconstruction business of its own accord, but if it does not do so, we think Congress has ample means of making it do so without doctoring it or playing tricks upon it. We think Congress has until very recently legislated as well as circumstances would allow, but we believe that it is now, either through fatuity or through desperation, entering on a course in which it will not be sustained by the country, and in which check or failure will be ruin. We do not care to argue the constitutionality of any of its acts. The great question now is, not what does the Constitution authorize, but what will the people suffer? Congress may have power to do bolder things than it has yet attempted, but power is a curse to anybody who does not know how much of it he ought to use.

If we believed that the great struggle by which this country has been convulsed for the last thirty years would be over as soon as the negroes all had the ballot, and the delegates from the Southern States had taken their places under any of the Reconstruction acts, or that the last great danger to freedmen and Unionists would be removed when the Supreme Court had been shorn of most of its authority, we doubt whether we should not applaud any measure, however desperate. To let points of law stand in the way of a consummation for which two generations have vainly struggled and half a million of men have died, would be wasteful and ridiculous excess of scrupulousness. Unfortunately, we are right well assured that even when Grant has been made dictator, and Hancock has been removed, and the conventions have all drawn up constitutions, and the negroes have all voted, and the disloyal have been driven from the polls, and the new delegates have taken their seats in Congress, and the regular double-leaded pæan has appeared in the Tribune and Independent announcing the "regeneration" of the South, that all will not be over. The freedmen will still not be safe; the Union will not be safe; the public credit will not be safe; and the South will not be regenerated.

We have got rid of nothing by the war but slavery and the faith in the possibility of secession by which the South was pervaded. We have not got rid of the imperfection of the moral perceptions—of the hard, coarse love of gain—of the caste pride and the race prejudice which made slavery possible at the South, and which, down to the year 1860, secured it the sympathy and connivance of the North. Moreover, the victory over slavery was not—mark this—won by a majority of the Northern people. The Republican party has always been a minority in the whole Union, and, in our opinion, it will become a minority again as soon as the Union is restored. It is impossible not to see that those elements of evil in politics which the moral exaltation of the war temporarily swept out of sight are again reappearing. The decline of public sentiment on the question of the national debt, and the increasing boldness with which politicians of the Butler and Pendleton type appeal to the lower and baser motives of the community; the increasing restiveness under the business depression, and the growing reaction against the claims of the negro to equality, are all signs that the old materialism is again asserting itself—and they are signs which it would be madness to disregard. We do not mean to say that we have gained nothing by the war, that the moral vision of the nation has not been cleared by it and its moral aims raised. Far from it. We mean simply that the powers of evil are far from being vanquished, and that the old struggle with them will have to begin forthwith and be continued year after year in the old way, and that we do not yet know how much force they have in store at the South, for the South has not yet revealed its real temper. Morally and intellectually, the new South may be said to be a terra incognita to us.

There is little doubt that the leaders in Congress are conscious of all this. We question if one of them, in spite of their bold speeches and bold bills, looks into the future without foreboding. Those who are most anxious that the war should bear its just fruits feel most foreboding. But they evidently believe that they can settle the whole difficulty now, at once and for ever, by a series of vigorous enactments and a strong network of oaths. In this we think they are mistaken, and the country, we are sure, feels they are mistaken. Supposing Grant made dictator to-morrow, under Reconstruction Bill No. 4; he cannot be kept dictator. The country would not suffer such a spectacle as a permanency; and once the States were restored in form, there would not be the shadow of a warrant for keeping it up. The end of the dictatorship and of the military rule must come, the garrisons be withdrawn, and the Southern States committed to the regular civil governments set up by Congress. These governments will be composed in the main of the most ignorant, most inexperienced portion of the population, the portion possessing least moral and intellectual vigor. That with this state of things the disfranchisement of the whites could long be maintained, that the whites would not everywhere, by force of numbers, of energy, of organization, again take possession of the governments, is something that one must be visionary to believe. It is as certain as anything in politics can be, as certain as that water will find its level, that before very long the whites will reassume their old ascendency. The worst enemies of the blacks are those who deceive themselves on this point.

The whites back in possession of the State governments, and the white Radicals who are now cutting such a fine figure at the constitutional conventions having fled North for their lives, the blacks would have nothing to rely on but Congress and the Constitution and the Supreme Court. Suppose the majority in Congress to have been elected during a reaction, to be bitterly hostile to the whole plan of reconstruction as now settled and desirous of undoing it, and supposing the State legislatures of the South to attempt to regulate labor by a series of measures such as they all enacted or began to enact after the close of the war, what resource would the blacks have? There would be the Constitutional Amendment abolishing slavery, and under it, or under the Civil Rights bill, doubtless, they could appeal for protection to the Federal courts; but suppose at this point Congress were to step in and close the courts to them, by copying Supreme Court Bill No. 3, now before the House, and making all cases arising under this amendment or this act "exceptions," and forbidding the Supreme Court to entertain them. What then? Enthusiasts, "old war-horses," and even children can, generally, tell what the immediate effect of legislation will be. We expect statesmen to consider and foresee its remote effects. The immediate results may be, and often are, trifling; the remote are pretty sure to be ineradicable, and may prove very momentous.

We leave the reader—and we may safely leave him—to imagine the possible consequences to the freedman of the South of the policy of leaving him dependent for everything on the bare majority for the time being, which Congress now seems disposed to pursue. Nobody who knows how public sentiment shifts and fluctuates, what astounding and unlooked-for things happen under temporary reactions, can help looking forward with a good deal of anxiety. We have been, and are, in favor of doing everything that is absolutely and imperatively necessary to bring the South back to the Union on the basis of equal rights, and with proper guarantees against fresh secession or attempts on the public credit. But more than this—everything, for instance, which serves no purpose but to show the power of Congress or to wreak vengeance on the Southern whites or to humiliate the President or to degrade the Supreme Court and the forms of law in the eyes of the people, we look on with unmixed apprehension. We believe them to be blows struck at the weak and almost helpless race which has just been introduced into the body politic. We believe that whatever tends to place its interests hereafter at the mercy of the Congressional majority for the time being; whatever shows the Democratic party ways and means of despoiling it of its rights without hindrance from the Executive or the Supreme Court; and whatever familiarizes the public mind with legislative tricks and evasions, is simply a disguised mode of handing them over bound hand and foot to their old oppressors.

For this reason we look on the Supreme Court Bill No. 3, which has just been introduced, as simply an ingenious contrivance for depriving the blacks of whatever safety the law and Constitution, as they at present stand, provide for them; and, should it pass, we doubt not they will yet curse the day when it saw the light. Nothing could justify such a course of legislation as that on which Congress has entered during the last few days but the certainty that its acts could never be repealed, and were sure to accomplish their object. But those who think this are simply prophets, and not politicians; and with prophets there is no use in arguing, for prophecies can neither be tested by experience nor by logic.

THE SUPREME COURT BILLS.

Some friends of the freedmen think that, when they have pointed out that the object of the Congressional legislation against the Supreme Court is the enfranchisement of "a race of four millions," to say anything about its expediency is a waste of words or a mark of cowardice. But this is surely a very short-sighted view of the matter. The Tribune, for instance, argues that inasmuch as there are two hundred men in the Congressional majority, and many of them as good "jurists" as any on the bench of the Supreme Court, it is absurd to allow the vote of one judge to set aside an act of Congress. So, by way of providing a remedy for this monstrous assumption of power on the part of the court, it gives its cordial sanction to an act which makes the votes of six judges necessary to set aside an act of Congress. In other words, it affirms that as long as five judges might declare a law unconstitutional the "inalienable rights" of man were in danger of violation, but when six judges are made necessary for the job the court becomes quite harmless. Nevertheless, it still remains difficult for ordinary minds to see the difference in absurdity, if absurd it be, between allowing the decisions of two hundred to be upset by one man, and allowing them to be upset by two. If the question be one of numbers, no law of Congress ought to be allowed to be set aside till at least two hundred and ten judges have pronounced it unconstitutional, and, if this be true, the remedy provided by the present bill is simply ridiculous.

But the question is not one of numbers, we are thankful to say, any more than one of avoirdupois weight. The opinions of any twenty members of Congress on a point of judicial interpretation should no more be allowed to overrule the opinions of three judges, or two, or one judge, because the members of Congress are more numerous than the judges, than because they are heavier. Mind and training are entitled to some consideration in this as in other matters; and there are several important reasons why a legislature, however numerous or however well supplied with "jurists," is not as competent to pass on the constitutionality of its own acts as any number of judges however small, sitting during good behavior, trained to the work, and taking no active part in the political contests of the day—reasons which we shall take the liberty of quoting from the Federalist, a work evidently falling more and more into disrepute, but which yet has some good things in it, and which will throughout compare favorably even with the burning "editorials" of our own time as a specimen of careful thinking and sound reasoning. Arguing against the project of confiding the power of passing on the constitutionality of laws to a branch of the legislature itself, Hamilton says:

"From a body which had even a partial agency in passing bad laws we could hardly expect a disposition to temper and moderate them in application. The same spirit which had operated in making them would be apt to influence their construction; still less could it be expected that men who had infringed the Constitution in the character of legislators would be disposed to repair the breach in that of judges. Nor is this all; every reason which recommends the tenure of good behavior for judicial offices militates against placing the judiciary power in the last resort in a body composed of men chosen for a limited period. . . . There is an absurdity in subjecting the decisions of men selected for their knowledge of the laws, acquired by long and laborious study, to the revision and control of men who, for want of the same advantage, cannot but be deficient in that knowledge. The members of the legislature will be rarely chosen with a view to those qualifications which fit men for the station of judges, and so on this account there will be great reason to apprehend all the ill consequences of defective information; so on account of the natural propensity of such bodies to party divisions there will be no less reason to fear that the pestilential breath of faction may poison the fountains of justice. The habit of being continually marshalled on opposite sides will be too apt to stifle the voice both of law and equity."

Nothing can be sounder than this, and the obvious deduction from it is that there is something almost farcical in asking us to trust to such men as Mr. Boutwell or Mr. Bingham, in the full glow of their rhetoric, to decide whether a measure they are supporting with all the heat of impassioned advocates is, or is not, constitutional, rather than to the judges of the Supreme Court—in asking us to believe that the two hundred who jump up and pass bills like those of Mr. Banks on the neutrality laws last session, unanimously and with enthusiasm, are a judicial-minded body, under the influence of its "jurists," and can, under all circumstances, be entrusted with the interpretation of the Constitution.

We have read carefully many of the arguments in favor of the bill which have appeared during the past week, but have not lighted on one which seems to us to meet the real point. All of them talk of the court as if it were a council for the revision of laws, instead of being simply a court of justice, and as if all acts of Congress come before it to have their constitutionality tested before being enforced, whereas none come before it at all except incidentally in suits between corporations or individuals. "Why not require two-thirds of the court to declare a law unconstitutional," says one, "when juries in all civil and criminal cases are required to be unanimous in order to render a verdict?" Because a jury has to be unanimous to render a verdict either for a plaintiff or defendant. Both parties, therefore, address it on a footing of equality. What would be thought of a rule requiring only six votes to give a verdict for the defendant, while making twelve necessary to give a verdict for the plaintiff? And yet this is substantially what the bill now before Congress proposes to do, when it declares that in a private controversy before the court the person contesting an act of Congress shall have to convince twice as many judges as his opponent. The cases cited in a long and elaborate article in Harper's Weekly, as well as the case of the two-thirds vote required of Congress to overrule the President's veto, seem to us to have no application whatever to the matter now in hand. In none of them is any notice taken of the fact that the new bill affects the court in its judicial capacity. When Congress is required to overrule the President by a two-thirds vote, it is not sitting in judgment in a legal controversy; it is legislating. If the court were a legislative council of revision simply, it would, no doubt, be perfectly fair and highly expedient to impose a similar obligation on it.

But are we, then, in favor of allowing the Supreme Court to set aside the Reconstruction act? By no means. We think the court has nothing to do with the process of reconstruction, and ought not to meddle with it. The majority in Congress, however, does not go as far as we do; it acknowledges that the court may set aside the Reconstruction act, but says it cannot do it by less than six votes. For ourselves, we confess we are unable to see the value of this distinction. If six judges can undo, by their opinion, all that Congress has done, and is doing, to bring the Southern States back to the Union, we are neither reassured nor consoled by the reflection that it cannot be done by five. Every argument of the least weight which can be brought forward against the interference of the court applies just as well to six judges as to five. In fact, all that is gained by the present bill is an appearance of security for the Congressional policy, and it is gained at the cost of more valuable things than security, because it is gained by conceding the most important principle, that the Supreme Court can prevent Congress from performing one of the highest acts of legislation, an act essential to the safety of the Government, and with which the founders of the Government certainly never dreamed of the court concerning itself. With the best will in the world we are unable to get up any enthusiasm about the bill, or to read some of the speeches made in support of it without wondering what there is in the subject to evolve so much heat. It changes nothing; establishes no new principle; enunciates no old one; and, in fact, is neither more nor less than a sharp little device—we do not like to use the word dodge—for getting round a difficulty which ought to be fairly met, if met at all.

But it will be said, Think of the consequences, at this crisis, of a decision by a majority of the court adverse to the constitutionality of the Reconstruction act! Well, what would they be? The President would refuse to enforce the act. Then impeach and remove him; the court could not save him. Actions would be brought against officers enforcing the law; then indemnify them, as in the case of officers sued for acts committed in the performance of their duty during the rebellion. Besides, persons who are willing to let six judges pronounce an act unconstitutional while they look upon a similar decision by five as a calamity to be avoided at any cost, have no right to ask us to provide for the consequences of such a decision. What would they do if two-thirds of the court pronounced the judgment they so much fear? Have they made any provision for this contingency? If they have, they are fully prepared for a similar judgment at the hands of a mere majority. By whatever expedient the one is met, the other may be met. The consequences of one would be just as formidable as the consequences of the other. All the damage five judges can do the four millions of freedmen, six can do.

If the object of the present bill be the retention of the moral power of the court on the side of Congress, it only makes its condemnation all the deeper. The court, unfortunately or fortunately, now exercises very little influence through decisions bearing, however remotely, on great political questions, even when left to utter its mind in the natural and usual way, through a majority of its members. It will exercise still less after it has been manipulated by Congress to suit a particular exigency. There is a simplicity, worthy of a miracle-monger or a medicine-man, in the supposition that Congress can secure for its policy an air of constitutionality by arranging the court beforehand with reference to particular bills. Nobody who doubts the constitutionality of its policy will be won over to it by a decision which Congress itself has prepared for the judges. Nobody who is satisfied of its constitutionality will have his faith strengthened by anything the court, thus organized, says or leaves unsaid. The authority of the court does not reside in the bodily presence of the judges, or in their votes, but in their intellect, and in their liberty and in their impartiality, and there is nothing more laughable and nothing more contemptible than the spectacle of a court claiming reverence for a decision the delivery of which had already been imposed on it by one of the parties to the cause. What makes the court formidable to Congress is what, if it were on the side of Congress, would constitute its usefulness—its supposed independence. Destroy that, and it can no more help Congress than harm it. The only effect of a decision of the court in favor of the reconstruction policy, after the bill now pending has passed, will be to make its enemies more satisfied than ever of the mischief of the policy, and lead them to work harder than ever before for its reversal.

The thing for Congress to do, it seems to us, is not to corrupt the judiciary—for the judiciary once corrupted is far more likely to be serviceable to bad causes than to good ones—but to decide what is necessary to restore peace and union to the United States, find out whether they will be supported by the public in doing it, and then do it without pretending to be as good lawyers as the Supreme Court, or as scrupulous on the point of constitutionality. Nobody is imposed upon by this, while thousands are disgusted by it. If the court had decided the war unconstitutional, the war would not for that reason have been stopped. If it had launched an injunction against Grant, requiring him to desist from besieging Richmond, he would have lighted his cigar with it. Congress maintains now that what it is doing is simply closing the war up, and establishing peace on sure and lasting foundations. Let it act boldly on its own theory of its work and position. Let us have no "cowardice," no flinching, no doctoring of the court, no flimsy attempts to wring decisions from it which nobody will respect. In this we are firmly persuaded it will have the hearty support of the public. In breaking down the authority of the Supreme Court, and making it contemptible in the eyes of the world, the majority not only alienates thousands on thousands of voters at the present crisis, but secures for itself something which not enriches it, and makes the nation poor indeed.

AN ODD STORY.

A CERTAIN State had been waging war. At the return of peace, a heavy debt and the question of its payment divided the citizens into two parties, known as the Specie and the Paper-money parties. The latter desired that the difficulties of the time should be met by issues of currency, and in a short time had met with such success as to have obtained control of the government. A paper-money bank of one hundred thousand pounds was established. The bills were to be loaned to the people according to the apportionment of the latest tax, upon a pledge of real estate of double their value, and to be paid into the treasury at the end of fourteen years. In order to make things easier, the collection of the tax last assessed and a recent excise act were suspended for the time being. It will be observed that these bills were secured by a heavy mortgage. Notwithstanding this precaution, depreciation of the bills commenced with their issue, on which the government, regarding this depreciation as sad proof of disloyalty among the people, subjected any person refusing to receive the bills at par, or in any way discouraging their circulation, to a penalty of one hundred pounds and the loss of rights as a citizen. Notwithstanding this act of encouragement, disloyalty became so virulent that merchants refused not only to take the bills as they were ordered to do, but even to do any business at all. Traders closed their shops. The loyal farmers who had pledged their lands, to retaliate upon the traders, refused to bring their produce to market. A riot took place. In fact, disloyalty had become so rife that another forcing act was necessary; and when the judges at length declared the acts void, the government summoned them into its presence to assign the reasons for their decision.

Though bills were plenty, money was so scarce that rents were paid in corn, and barter became almost the only mode of trade; and eight months after the establishment of the bank the treasurer was ordered to pay off about one-fourth of the debt in bills received for taxes, this paper having already depreciated five hundred per cent. The rebellious spirit of the people had now become so outrageous that all holders of government securities were required to present them to the treasurer within six weeks, and receive five shillings in the pound thereon, or to forfeit that amount, and interest was to cease almost immediately. The judges were changed, and, with a loyal court, the government felt patriotism to be so much in the ascendant that it paid off another quarter of the debt in the same way as before, on which disloyalty increased, or, in other words, the bills of the State now passed at the rate of eight for one; they continued to depreciate, until the neighboring States prohibited the trial by their courts of any suit for debt brought by a citizen of the State of whose affairs we are speaking; and, finally, disloyalty triumphed, the legal-tender act was repealed, and the depreciation of paper bills was settled at fifteen for one.

All these things happened in the State of Rhode Island eighty years ago. There was the same cry for inflation that we have to-day, the same "necessity" for more currency in order to stimulate industry; there was the same vigorous patriotism induced by a desperate war, and the result was, notwithstanding this, and notwithstanding, too, the fact that the Rhode Islanders had a penal law against speculators which would have delighted Mr. Stevens himself, the paper money—legal tender at par—stood at a discount of fourteen hundred per cent., and then broke down altogether. At about the same time that the Paper-money party in Rhode Island held the power of the State in their hands, attempts were made in various other States to obtain the same objects, but they did not succeed. Rhode Island was the only State which attempted to alleviate the poverty caused by the war by furnishing ready-made money to the debtors. Her reputation was, as we have seen, not enviable then, and the lapse of time has not at all improved it. Mr. Arnold, in his history, speaks without any reserve of the Paper-money party of 1786 as the party which desired to pay less than it had borrowed, and, generally, he uses terms which it would be well for honest inflationists to heed. What a dominant party does may be "knavish" and "beggarly," just as well as what the dominant member of a household does, but in the latter case there are the neighbors and the police; no neighbors can pry in upon a continent, and no police can arrest party spirit. And there are two practical suggestions to be drawn from this, disregarding for the present all moral considerations—which of the two is drawn in any given case will depend, of course, upon the education and temper of the individual voter—one is, to "go in and win;" and the other is, to sit down quietly and think a little before acting, because, though there is certainly no difficulty whatever about going in, to come out, and to come out winning, is a much more arduous task.

There is one thing about this Rhode Island case which deserves attention—every precaution was taken to prevent depreciation which human ingenuity could devise. The legal-tender act was penal, and the payment of the money was secured by mortgage, and when the judges declared the forcing acts void the judges were removed, and yet, as we have said, fifteen for one was the current rate three years after the system was begun. Fifteen for one is not so bad as a thousand for one, which had been the Virginia rate at the close of the war, but fifteen for one is pretty bad. And then fifteen for one is a fact; not a theory nor an abstract idea, the speculative result of what is called "closet thinking," but a hard, stern, undeniable fact, staring the patriotic and the unpatriotic alike in the face, and bringing misery and starvation to the honest, hard-working citizen. It was a fact which meant so much that churches excommunicated members for attempting to pay their creditors under the legal-tender privilege. It meant stagnation of business, tumult, danger within and danger without; in a word, it meant all that can be meant by a resolution on the part of a little more than half a community not to pay its debts to the remainder; and the difference between this condition of affairs and that in which a man who measures six feet declines to pay the bill of a man who measures five, relying upon the difference of measurement rather than any equitable defence, is difficult for any one destitute of a very legal training to see.

DETERIORATION IN AMERICAN MANNERS.

A RECENT writer in the Galaxy asserts that "nothing is surer or, it would seem, more manifest than that during the last twenty years our manners and the tone of our society have suffered a great and widespread deterioration. Americans," he says, "are to-day less courteous than their fathers were, less deferential to age and weakness, less careful in the suppression of selfishness, coarser in their pleasures, more grossly material in all their views of life." These several ugly counts make up an indictment to which we may very well hesitate to plead guilty. In fact, one hears it, and at once puts in a more or less indignant general denial. To most Americans the truth of such a charge will seem so far from sure that they will refuse to believe it, and so far from manifest that it will doubtless seem to them flatly contradicted by all the obvious facts bearing on the question.

An age which even in its legislatures and constitutional conventions begins to talk of protecting the weakness of woman by giving her an equal share with man in the government of the state; which was, in great part, at any rate, led by a desire of protecting weakness to emancipate millions of slaves; which, from humanitarian motives quite as much as from motives of policy, begins to abolish capital punishment, and treats its criminals with tenderness of kindness, would seem at the first look to be an age which would hardly deteriorate as regards the suppression of selfishness and the payment of deference to weakness in the individual or deference to the old, who, so far as deference is not commanded but given away, get deference because the old are weak. Nor at first blush would one suppose that a period and country in which intelligence is daily spreading more and more; in which, by reason of the facilities for communication and travel, the tendency of the whole population to become urban instead of rustic constantly grows stronger; in which the growth of wealth brings the attainment of refining comforts within the reach of a regularly increasing number of households—in a period and country such as this no one would à priori suppose that the class of people most tempted to indulgence in the grosser pleasures would grow greater rather than diminish, or could readily believe that, the population generally having become richer, more intelligent, and less provincial, the manners of the people would not be better than before.

Take the special matter of amusements and the special case of New England. The last generation had New England rum and no theatres. The average young man of the last generation, even if he lived within twelve miles of Boston, very likely chased a greased pig on Thanksgiving morning; skated or "slid down hill" in the winter; in summer attended a church picnic; went fishing now and then, and on the Fourth of July fired at a mark or went to the city to see the fireworks. The average young woman went to an occasional quilting party, an occasional husking, an occasional sleigh-ride, perhaps to a "dance." To meeting she and her brother of course went regularly, and to go to the evening meeting was perhaps something in the way of amusement and was by no means a purely devotional exercise. Her successor goes in pretty regularly to Messrs. Williams & Everett's exhibition rooms or to De Vries & Ibarra's; each winter she attends a course of lyceum lectures; she sees Booth in Ruy Blas and Hamlet; she probably has a piano; she reads some of the books in a tolerable public library. Her brother's successor is also in the lyceums and on the committee to hire lecturers; indulges more freely than his father in the contemplative man's recreation, smoking; oftener runs in to the city theatre and less often goes to circuses, will have nothing to do with chasing greased pigs, and perhaps has more to do with a trotting park than his father had. Now, as amusements, we suppose one may properly call these not coarser but more refined amusements than those they have displaced. Not that there is no fault to be found with them, but condemnation of these as compared with the amusements of twenty or thirty years ago seems to us a mistake.

That we are no less deferential to weakness to-day than our fathers were, we hardly know how to prove. In the general view it seems that the facts are with us and not against, but to make use of particular instances in support of the proposition is not easy. We should certainly say, however, that the ordinary young man of to-day is as civil to women as his father was. In such cases as have fallen under our observation where both the son and his father are on the stage, the son seems to be as civil as his father now is, whatever the father may have been formerly. In regard to the respect paid to old age, as to parents by children, it is true, we think, that the children of twenty or thirty years ago will have to be praised above those of to-day. It is doubtless true that somewhat less rigid views begin to be held and inculcated by parents as to the degree of deference to be expected of their sons and daughters. Children are now less subject than formerly to severe restrictions, are treated more as if to them also, to their wishes and inclinations, great consideration were due. It is thus certainly with the relations between teachers and pupils. Not improbably the same doctrine, which bids fair to be still further developed, has to some considerable extent been carried into effect as regards the relations between young people and their elders generally. That such a process of change is for the worse we are not convinced. Still, it is easy to see that, judged by the old standard of what is proper, the conduct of the young to their parents and others their superiors in age may seem reprehensible.

We suppose it true that in certain circles of society in great cities, circles composed of the newly and suddenly rich, there is a constant display of excessively bad manners and that the whole tone of such society is low. That this is a widespread deterioration we do not believe. We believe, for example, that if Miss Fanny Ellsler, a lady with a dancer's well-earned European—private and public—reputation, were to come to-day into New York, she would hardly be enthusiastically received into so great a part of the total number of good houses in New York as when she came here and was received by New York high society some twenty or thirty years since. It is our opinion that Mr. Dickens, if he were to visit us now, would be received with all due civility and kindness, but that it is out of the possibilities that we should show so little dignity and self-respect as would have been shown if he had visited us twenty-seven years ago. This whether the "American Notes" were in existence or not. For, as we look at society, the Americans at home, take them "by and large," as the Galaxy writer says, are far less raw and provincial than their fathers; they have seen more, they have read more, they have mixed more with people of other nationalities, they have fought more and had to think more, they have spent more for ideas and given more away than their fathers ever did—in brief, the national character has been raised and dignified, and with it, we believe, the national standard of good manners. Certain persons in avenues in New York who give "cheap and hungries," are not "the American people taken by and large," and a comparison of the manners of such persons with the manners of the Knickerbocker families of the old times—of the times "below Bond Street"—the families and times and manners we all regret so much—gives no data for generalizing about the manners of the American people.

Having said this much by way of giving our view of the state of the case, and having hinted at some reasons why our view should be accepted as the true one, it remains to account, if possible, for the view which the writer in the Galaxy has taken. A man does not bring against his fellow-countrymen charges of the gravity of these we have quoted unless he seems to himself to have good reason. Looking about for a cause that would make it possible, and even easy, to fall into such an error, as we believe it, we found what we think the true one. It is not to be denied that manners as a complicated fine art, as an end in themselves, ceremonial manners, are going out of fashion; rather have mostly gone out of fashion, and the remnant of them is going with extreme rapidity. Their birthplace and home was in the courts of kings and the houses of noblemen. But kings and noblemen, and all the things that belonged to them exclusively, and all the people who imitated them in behavior, and all the people, from the finished American gentleman of the old school down to Mr. Turveydrop, who imitated the behavior of the people who imitated the behavior of the king and the nobles of the good old times—the day of all of them is all but gone. It has been with manners as with dress. Instead of cut velvet, the gentleman of to-day wears Scotch tweed; instead of high-heeled shoes, he wears thick-soled half-boots; he discards vari-colored doublets and hose, and is as dull-colored as dull colors can make him. And punctilio in manners is as dead as the use of bright colors in clothes or duelling by the code. We do not, if we are gentlemen, bow so low to the ladies; nor, if we are ladies, do we courtesy so low or so many times; nor, if we are children, do we so often say "sir" and "madam;" nor do we as men so often despatch challenges as if we had all, gentlemen, ladies, and children, lived in the times which, by ceremonious people, are thought to have been peculiarly the times of the gentleman.

This we may all confess—the elaborate style of behavior is almost entirely gone. It had a grace of its own, it had a fitness, or it would not have existed. It had an unfitness, or it would not have died. We have now a school of manners different from that which had its origin in courts. It lacks punctilious ceremonial; it makes rules for equals rather than for superiors and inferiors; it makes rules for men who work rather than for people who were occupied in idleness. But it no more encourages selfishness or unkindness or meanness or contempt for the weak or gross materialism than did that other school of manners which was illustrated by the framers of the Fugitive Slave law, the hosts and hostesses of Fanny Ellsler, the business men for whom the phrase "almighty dollar" was invented, the gentlemen whom Josiah Quincy had to fight hard before the noble amusement of the theatre could be introduced into Boston. In punctiliousness our fathers beat us—beat us so badly that we have reason to be not proud, but very proud. But we should be glad to see a reasonable nineteenth-century definition of the gentleman which would put Abraham Lincoln's constituents, as gentlemen, below Mr. Franklin Pierce's.

PARIS GOSSIP.

PARIS, January 3, 1868.

THE cold is intense, and all the gamins of the town are sliding upon the Seine, frozen over at sundry points. The shallow "lakes" of the Bois de Boulogne are solid ice; but as in so capricious a climate as that of Paris one can never count on the steadiness of the weather, the Skating Club has decided to lose no time in taking advantage of so exceptional a state of things, and will give, to-morrow night, a splendid fête on its "own particular" pond, lighted a giorno by electric suns, and winding up, about eleven o'clock, with a grand supper in its elegant Pavilion. No one but the members of the club, and guests invited by them, being ever admitted within the aristocratic precincts of this very exclusive club, a great crowd is sure to gather outside to witness the sport. The belles and lionesses of the club, mostly Russian and American, are understood to have adopted a skating-costume of velvet and fur, destined to rejoice the heart of Mrs. Bloomer, if that bold innovator be still in the land of the living.

The old year has gone out and the new year has come with the usual honors. All the military bands of Paris, joining forces, according to custom, on the afternoon of the last day of the departing year gave in the Court of Honor of the Tuileries, to the Imperial family, who listened and applauded from the overlooking balcony, the traditional aubade, or day-serenade, supposed to convey to the sovereign of la belle France the salutations of its approaching successor. On the following day the Emperor and Empress held the usual New-Year receptions, winding up a hard day's work with a grand-dinner to the members of the Imperial family; the Emperor, at all events, having earned his share of the good cheer provided for the occasion by his prompt response to the appeal of the maire of a distressed town in a distant department, in the form of an authorization to open, without a day's delay, and at the cost of his privy purse, an "economic kitchen" for the distribution, gratis, of six thousand portions of soup, meat, vegetables, and bread, daily, from now until the end of next March. While awaiting that "good time coming" when the rulers of the earth, whatever their denomination, shall devote their united wisdom to the extirpation of the various roots of pauperism and popular destitution, it were to be wished that the unfailing generosity with which the Emperor and the Empress take a leading part in all attempts to mitigate the pressure of present distress—devoting to this end a very considerable portion of their respective allowances—were more generally imitated by their "brothers" and "cousins."

The holiday crowding of the favorite shops has been unusually dense this year, confectionery being, as usual, the class of goods most generally in demand. Siraudin's receipts, for the last three weeks, have averaged 20,000f. daily; and it is computed that the quantity of sugar employed in his establishment during that time would suffice to make eau sucrée of all the water of the Seine, from the Bridge of Jena to that of Austerlitz! Of the amount of New-Year business done by Klein we know only that it has been enormous, and that his gains on the mass of elegant knick-knacks sent out by him all over Europe must be very considerable; and so with the other shops, in more modest proportions. As for the cheap novelties, of which one or two usually create a sensation every Christmas, the favorite ones for this year seem to be the new puzzle, consisting of two little bits of steel in the form of a point of interrogation, hooked together at their rounded end, and at which half the children of Paris are now laboring hard to get them apart; a wonderful new top which, set in motion as usual by the aid of a string, emits a number of little tops, reabsorbs the same, and does various other curious things, all explicable upon "mathematical principles," but which fill with amazement the unsophisticated minds of their youthful possessors, and furnish no little amusement to many "children" of a larger growth; and the new doll, extensively advertised in "religious journals" under the heading of "A large supply of Infant Jesuses, in pasteboard, wax, or gutta percha, with mechanism and music, at prices varying from one franc twenty-five centimes to one hundred francs."

The theatres are all putting the last touches to their New-Year buffooneries, in the hope that this favorite form of Parisian folly may bring back the crowd to their now half-empty benches. Mlle. Patti, who has been crowning herself with fresh laurels in all the more ambitious rôles in which she has recently appeared, is to marry the young and brilliant Marquis de Caux, one of the members of the Imperial circle most in favor with the court. Miss Harris, the English prima donna whom—seeing that she is English!—the Parisians are never weary of wondering at themselves for so cordially admiring, who has something of la Patti's style of vocalization, might possibly, in case of the retirement of the bright-eyed diva, be able to take possession of her vacant place. A few evenings ago, at the second performance of Martha, Miss Harris was enthusiastically encored both in the famous hunting-song and also in the charming quatuor of the spinning-wheels. Her voice is not very powerful, but is of delicious quality and exceedingly flexible; her method is perfection; and she is altogether in high favor with the highly cultivated and very exigeant public of the Théâtre Italien.

Monsieur Sainte-Beuve, finding himself absolutely given over by the princes of the orthodox school of medicine, suddenly sent for one of the leading homœopathic practitioners, and has been so much relieved that some of his friends are beginning to hope that he may recover, though the disease from which he is suffering is usually regarded as incurable. M. de Lamartine, roused from his state of stupor by the echo of the rumors which have been representing him as near dying, has come unexpectedly to Paris, apparently to show the world that it has been premature in consigning him to the undertaker. He has been sending reproachful letters to the journals; and seems half-inclined to bring a suit against them for having made him out to be so ill, and against their readers for having believed them. But, however little he may like to admit the fact, the old poet is scarcely the shadow of himself. Those who saw him being wheeled in one of the little hand-carriages, last summer, through the mazes of the now defunct Exhibition, his head sunk on his chest, his eyes dim, scarcely able to articulate a word, and unwilling to reply even to the salutations of his oldest friends, could hardly fail to recall the belief of the contemporaries of Tasso, who held that the soul of the poet during the last sad years of his life had already escaped from its earthly tenement and that the outer semblance of the man was all that remained behind. Public opinion here has long been turned, perhaps too harshly, against Lamartine, mainly from the fact that, although the most simply innocent of men in regard to all the vulgar vices by which the members of the "nobler sex" so often beggar themselves, indifferent even to the pleasures of the table, never touching a card, and careless of dress as Mr. Horace Greeley, Lamartine has, nevertheless, managed to run through several fortunes, and has "demeaned" himself by accepting, in his old age, the pension recently voted to him by the Legislative Assembly. The secret of Lamartine's extravagant outlay is to be found, if the truth be told, in his vanity. He could never, though professing the most democratic principles, forget his claims to nobility, nor forego the pleasure of making costly Eastern voyages in ships of his own, and of surrounding himself with horses, dogs, a host of servants, and a numerous train of hangers-on, who flattered his mania of playing the grand seigneur, lived at his expense, and consumed the fortunes inherited by him at different periods of his life, and the still larger sums he made by his writings.

It has been announced within a day or two that M. Vacquerie was about to publish a volume entitled "Faust." The work in question, which will not, however, see the light before April, is looked for with much interest by those who are in the secret of its scope and nature, and will no doubt excite, when it appears, its share of attention. "Faust" is, in fact, a philosophic dramatic poem, resembling the immortal creation of the great German only in name. The "Faust" of Goethe is an appreciation of the past and present, under the form of an allegory; the "Faust" of Victor Hugo's son-in-law is an attempt to divine the future. Given the motive powers and inventions of recent years, the author endeavors to deduce therefrom, by analogy, the form of the social state implied in their generalization. The remainder of the poem sets forth the writer's views on God, the soul, the future life, etc., and will, probably, be the portion of the work that will excite most interest. Whatever the ultimate verdict of the thinking world in regard to the views contained in it, it is certain that the forthcoming work—for which, of course, any one but a Frenchman would have chosen a more modest name—is of a far higher order in point of talent than anything hitherto published by its author.

There is also looming in a not very remote future a new literary undertaking of much promise, being nothing less than an "Encyclopædia of the Nineteenth Century," under the literary directorship of M. Laurent-Pichat, with the rich banker, M. Motu, for godfather and provider of funds. The plan of the proposed work is still being eagerly discussed by the group of writers—all men of mark in their several walks—who have been recruited to put it into execution. Shall the new work consist of a collection of special treatises, classed by categories, or of a series of articles following one another in alphabetic order? One point is fully decided, to wit: that each collaborator shall be called upon to furnish not so much a mere compilation of other men's views as an exhaustive setting forth of the results of his own acquirements in regard to the subject assigned to his pen. The proposed work will, therefore, be less an "encyclopædia," in the ordinary sense of the word, than a sort of gallery giving a careful and conscientious reflex of the leading personages, sciences, opinions, facts, inventions, and topics of the busy age in which which we are living.

The artist-world is much excited just now by a discovery claimed to have been made by M. Charles Blanc, brother of the London exile, and author of an admirable "History of Painters." There is at the Louvre, in the "gallery of the seven masters," a fine portrait by Calcar of a young man with an ample flaxen beard. Up to this time no one knew who could have been the original of this fine portrait, which had hitherto baffled the efforts of all who have endeavored to provide its ideal with "a local habitation and a name." The eminent art-critic, by a series of ingenious deductions, appears to have made it tolerably clear that the flaxen-bearded youth is no other than the great physician Vesale, father of modern anatomy. M. Charles Blanc has come across a letter proving that Calcar made a portrait of Vesale; he proves that the young man of the picture is the same who is represented in a variety of attitudes in the illustrations by Calcar of the earliest editions of Vesale's work on anatomy; into the picture of the Louvre is introduced a coat-of-arms with the blazon of the guild of apothecaries, and it is known that Vesale's father belonged to that corporation; and to crown the series of arguments thus adduced, M. Charles Blanc has discovered in one corner of the mysterious picture—too small to be seen without a microscope—the letters M. V. B., which, according to him, stand for Magister Vesalius Bruxellensis.

M. Accolas, who, with his friend Naquet, has just been on trial on a charge of indulging in the attempt to get up one of those absurd little conspiracies "in a tea-pot" to which a certain class in this city are so much addicted, and who has been sentenced to imprisonment for the same, would have done better to continue to devote his efforts to the work of procuring the progressive reform of acknowledged evils by peaceful means, instead of endeavoring, by means most inadequate to the end, to procure the violent overthrow of the existing order of things. He has written various works, principally on the subject of French legislation, ancient and modern, exposing the points in which French law contrasts unfavorably with the legislative code of other countries, and notably of England. M. Accolas is exceedingly energetic and active, and he had succeeded in collecting a little group of sympathizers who met every week, under his auspices, to discuss the legal reforms to be demanded of the Government. M. Jules Favre had been coaxed and tormented by Accolas until he had consented, though very reluctantly, to allow these meetings to take place in the drawing-rooms of his house in the Rue d'Amsterdam. But as Accolas has a passion for revolutions, M. Jules Favre, fearing to find himself implicated in some such foolish proceeding as has just brought the pair of agitators to grief, being summoned from home one day when the group was to meet there, forgot to leave instructions with his servants for its reception; and the members, on arriving, were denied entrance to the parlors, the servants declaring that they could not, in their master's absence, take upon themselves the responsibility of letting them in. The hint was understood, and the group subsequently met at the rooms of M. Accolas; but having gradually changed its discussion of legal matters to the plotting of a rising against the Government, the police were soon upon its track, and the trial just terminated has given the coup de grâce to the association.

Correspondence.

To the Editor of The Nation:

In August, 1866, I sent to your office a communication in regard to the Bremen Rose-wein, which in due course appeared in the Nation. A day or two ago I learned through a German paper and from a friend, who had visited the "Rathskeller," some items in relation to the subject that may be of interest to the readers of your paper.

The oldest Rheinwein in the "Rose" of the "Rathskeller" in Bremen is said to have been made in 1624, and a newer kind in 1668. Six hogsheads cost originally 300 thalers in gold. Adding to this sum compound interest, and allowing 10 per cent. per annum during 192 years for leakage and refilling, the value in 1860 would be 5,752,000,000 thalers per hogshead. Each bottle would be of the value of 22 million thalers; each glass (eight glasses to the bottle), 2½ million thalers; and each drop (1,000 drops to the glass), 2,750 thalers.

The vault is decorated by a rose painted on the ceiling. Notwithstanding the above figures, my friend assured me that a bottle of Rose-wein can be bought in the cellar for the sum of 2½ thalers gold; the wine has rather an unpleasant taste, owing to its extreme age.

In connection with this subject it may be proper to state that near the "Rosezimmer" is a room so constructed that in it the lowest whisper can be distinctly heard in an opposite corner. This room is known as "das Schallzimmer. C. M., Jr.

Philadelphia, January 9, 1868.

Notes.

LITERARY.

The meagre show of advertisements in the journals devoted to "the trade" admonish us that business among publishers is dull. J. B. Lippincott & Co. intend to issue "Poems," by J. B. Everhart, and we believe that besides this there is nothing in the list of books to be published by this house of which we have not already informed our readers.——T. B. Peterson & Brothers have in press a new novel by Mrs. Ann S. Stephens, "The Disputed Birthright," and another, called "My Son's Wife," by the author of "Caste."——G. W. Carleton & Co. find the first edition of "Laus Veneris" exhausted, and will soon publish the second; and they announce, also, a new book by Mrs. Parton (Fanny Fern).——Lindsay & Blakiston announce new editions of several works known to the medical profession, "Birch's Constipation," Duncan's "God in Disease," an enlarged and revised edition of Hewitt's "Diagnosis, Pathology, and Treatment of the Diseases of Women," and Basham's "Dropsy."——Little, Brown & Co. have in press a fourth volume of Everett's "Orations," which will contain addresses on the characters of Washington and Franklin; panegyrical pieces on Thomas Dowse, Webster, Choate, Prescott, Humboldt, Hallam, Irving, Quincy, Felton, and others; the address on the conduct of the war which Mr. Everett delivered sixty times during 1861 and 1862, and many patriotic speeches delivered during the last three or four years of Mr. Everett's life. The same house announce as now ready the second and third editions of a revised edition of "Greenleaf on Evidence," edited by the Honorable I. F. Redfield.

—Mr. J. W. Bouton, of Broome Street, announces that he will shortly offer for sale a very fine private library which has been put into his hands for disposal. It is the property of a gentleman who spent some years and much money in collecting it, and that he collected with knowledge and taste the catalogue makes evident. Catalogues, by the way, will soon be ready for general circulation, and will be sold at half a dollar apiece. Among the choice things in the collection is a copy of Béranger's "Chansons"—the author's copy, with the suppressed "Chansons" in his own handwriting. Another is the original manuscript of "Hunted Down," a short story by Dickens, which, if we do not forget, was sent to Mr. Bonner simultaneously with its publication in London. Another is the original manuscript of Cooper's "Life of Sommers." There are also complete large-paper editions of most of the French classics; of Webster, Franklin, Adams, Bancroft, Irving, and Sparks among American authors; a copy of the original edition of Chapman's "Homer" and of the "Paradise Lost" and of the first Genevan version of the Bible; large-paper copies of Massinger, of Middleton, of Dodsley's collection of old plays, of Gibbon's "Decline and Fall," of all Dibdin's works, and of many other works of standard value or of peculiar value and interest. Mr. Bouton promises a feast to the connoisseur in fine bindings who shall give the library an examination. Wright, Rivière, Pratt, Matthews, Silani, Grieve, David, Pettit, Bedford, Aliô, and other celebrated workmen in this line are represented by some of their best handiwork. In every case, Mr. Bouton says—and he is something of an authority—the best edition was secured by the collector without regard to cost, and the library contains many of the choicest bibliographic gems which were disposed of by auction or at private sales during the time of its collection.

—The English Wesleyan Conference are about to publish, by subscription, the entire poetical works of Charles Wesley, never hitherto collected. The edition will comprise not only the verses printed by him in his lifetime, which are scattered through over thirty distinct volumes and tracts, all of them now more or less scarce, but also a great mass of hymns, etc., which he left in MS., and which have not yet seen the light. The Conference purchased these last from the author's family long ago, but have never made use of them till now. Of them alone there is enough to fill four volumes. The whole of the poems (with the few by John Wesley) will be included in about twelve volumes crown octavo, with introductory and historical notices; Dr. Osborn, we believe, is the appointed editor. The subscription price is two guineas for the twelve volumes; subscriptions to be received through any of the Wesleyan ministers. Six volumes are promised during the present year. The price to non-subscribers is set at 4s. 6d. per volume.

—We have looked over with some curiosity and pleasure the second number of an American paper printed in Shanghai, and called the Shanghai News-Letter. Among the "Local Items," we see it stated that a band of robbers climbed over the city wall a short time ago and looted some jewellers' and pawn-shops, and got away all clear—a story that in some, at any rate, of its particulars sounds strange to American ears when told by a fellow-citizen. And we learn that a raid was recently made at Tche-hein's instigation on some houses at Honque, and another on some other houses in Sungkiang, and rubies and jewellery were found on the persons of certain Chinamen. "It is likely to be 'heads off' in this case," the reporter adds. On the 11th instant, the News-Letter says, the Chinese steamer Nora Creina came back from a cruise against the pirates, having burnt, during her absence, some forty junks. And it appears that the barbarian sport of boat-racing not only has been introduced but flourishes in the waters of the Flowery Kingdom. An English eight-oared boat has recently avenged the English defeat of last year by defeating an American eight in a boat of which the stroke-oar was pulled by a barbarian from Boston, Mr. A. A. Hayes. Victors and vanquished, after the regatta was over, flouted the Son of Heaven in his own realm by uniting in a song of which this is an insolent stanza:

> "And for many coming years may there be no doubts or fears
> To mar our perfect Union and Alliance.
> Only in such wars as these may we strive on lands and seas,
> And then my Boys we 'll bid the world—Defiance."

We learn, too, that Viceroy Le, who is fighting rebels at Shantung, would gladly employ in the field two American telegraphers, but is restrained by the jealousy of the other viceroys, and by the cabinet at Pekin. So the News-Letter goes on, printing American ideas and advertisements in Cathay in a manner that somewhat confounds the imagination, showing us vividly the New World in contact with the Old, and suggesting thoughts of the opportunities that are waiting for Americans in the oldest of Old World empires.

—The English magazines of to-day are very much more able than they have ever been before. Macaulay, Jeffrey, Mackintosh, Sydney Smith, Wilson, De Quincey are not writing for them; but even if we admit that these men—some of whom, whatever they may be as names in the literary history of their generation, are as writers but very little read—were greater in literature than any half dozen men who now write for the periodicals, still one has only to turn back to the quarterly reviews and monthly magazines in which their articles were printed in order to see that the greater number of their contributors were men in every way inferior to the contributors to the Fortnightly, the Contemporary, the Cornhill, the Chronicle, the Spectator, the Saturday Review, and even the Edinburgh, Blackwood's, the North British, and the Quarterly. So, also, of the daily press of Great Britain, and, without being familiar with the periodical literature of the European continent, we are not afraid of misleading anybody, or of being contradicted, when we say that what is true of the English periodical press is true of the Continental. There is, then, a wide range of valuable reading from which conductors of eclectic magazines and papers—paste-pot-and-scissors magazines and papers they have been called by people who looked only at the worst side of them—may select matter for their readers. Perhaps the range is so wide that there is a chance of life for more eclectics than are now in the field. Recently, we have had the New Eclectic, published at New York and Baltimore, and the Week, published at New York. There were already in flourishing existence Every Saturday, the Eclectic, and Littell's Living Age. The Living Age is, to our taste, the best of them all—a little heavier, perhaps, than Every Saturday, or a little less light, but evidently managed by a person who either knows what is valuable in contemporary magazine literature or knows where to go for good advice. The Eclectic we might perhaps think almost as good as the Living Age, if it were not that it has a habit of occasionally publishing editorial articles which, so far as we recollect, are not perfectly, but tolerably, good specimens of feeble thinking and bad writing. Every Saturday is meant for passengers by rail and steamboat, and its managers cater very well to the tastes of the better class of railroad and steamboat passengers, and not seldom print articles that deserve more serious consideration. Of the New Eclectic there have been published but two numbers, so that it is not yet time to speak certainly of its character. Its selections seem, so far, to have been made by persons of some taste, but, without knowing anything about the prosperity of the old Eclectic, we should say that the new one is so nearly the same that the old one must die or the new one will be obliged to seek a fresh field of operations. The Week, also, is so new that to criticise it would be unfair. It differs from its brethren in this, that it is mainly devoted to politics, and aims to give opinions on all sides of every important political question. This well done will, we should think, make the paper valuable to those persons who, caring nothing for ordinary news and something for the condition of parties, are too busy to read the daily papers. Foreign politics, too, are to find a place in the work, and it will contain dramatic, musical, religious, scientific, and art news. For the very general reader who likes a little of everything and not much of anything, the Week will be, if it keeps on as well as it has begun, a pleasant and useful paper. It is a matter of wonder that some one does not establish a daily paper of the same character. It should be published in the evening, of course, and perhaps its scope ought not to be so wide as that of the Week—ought not, that is, to be so wide as regards the ground covered in every number. In some respects it would have to be a little wider, perhaps. Perhaps original articles might well be admitted. But an evening paper which should do in America what the Pall Mall Gazette does in England, which should give the reader as he goes home in the afternoon a digest of everything that all the partisan papers have said in the morning, which should give all such news of the day as is not in most people's eyes trivial, and should add to this an account of the condition of the markets, some literary matter, some dramatic news, and so on, could hardly fail to be a success. We have now in New York no evening paper not a party paper which is not of a very slight sort.

—The work of Von Martius on the ethnology of our continent, to which we lately referred, has for its full title "Contributions to the Ethnography and Philology of America, especially of Brazil." As its author is now nearly seventy-five years old, we may probably regard it as the final fruit of the famous journey of Spix and Martius, undertaken in the years 1817–20, the general account of which, and the detailed workings-out of its botanical results, are so well known to the literary and learned world. The central and chief part of the work is a detailed account of the Indian tribes of Brazil and its vicinity, of their distribution, connections, habits, history, numbers, and so on. Besides his own observations and collections, the author has turned to account whatever was accessible to him, including the information gleaned by a long-continued and extensive correspondence. His combinations and inferences seem sometimes a little venturesome; but it is very difficult to avoid erring in this direction where the field is so wide and the materials are so scanty. The second volume is made up of vocabularies, larger and smaller, of a great number of dialects—the basis, in part, on which the conclusions of the other are founded. The whole is led off with two dissertations, prepared and delivered on special occasions many years ago. The one groups together the jural usages of the South American natives, their customs that bear upon the conditions of social and public life. The other, on the past and future of the American race, ought, in virtue of its subject, to be the most directly interesting and enjoyable part of the whole work; but we have found it on some accounts the least satisfactory. It shows us the author as having begun and long pursued his journeyings under the dominion of a very Rousseau-ish theory respecting our aborigines, as a new and childlike branch of humanity, characterized by simplicity and innocence; and then we see him aroused from his delusion by a curious occurrence which he relates with much naïveté, and suddenly converted to the opposite and equally baseless persuasion that they are the worn-out relics of communities once more powerful and highly cultivated. Something of the tendency to discover traces of ancient grandeur and present decay where they probably do not exist is perceptible throughout the work; yet this is, as we doubt not, one of the most valuable and trustworthy contributions yet made to American ethnology.

—M. Perdonnet, of Paris, once wrote a small volume on railways and contracted for its publication with M. Eugene Lacroix, who is perhaps best known, on this side of the water at any rate, by his title of Bibliophile Jacob. Each edition of the book, said the contract, was to consist of 1,500 copies. An edition was exhausted each year, and it was the custom to send the proofs through the publisher to the author. M. Perdonnet one day found in the proof-sheets an error which he tried to explain to the printer, but in vain; so he took it to the printing-office with intent to talk about it to the workmen. They stared at him with astonishment—the proofs were not from their office, they said; they knew nothing about them. It was M. Perdonnet's turn to be astonished. He began to make enquiries. To make a long story short, he discovered that Bibliophile Jacob was in the habit of publishing in Paris the 1,500 copies provided for by the contract, and of publishing thousands of other copies which he printed at provincial presses. Jacob was brought before the courts and had to pay damages. Doubtless this is the only case of the kind. The trusting confidence of authors and the transparency and honesty of publishers are well known. Seriously, though, it is probable that authors in France are not mistaken in leaving their interests in the hands of their publishers; English authors do so as a rule, and American authors do so almost without exception. Still, one does not blame George Sand for employing an agent to attend to such matters. Nor does one wonder that in Paris there has been formed a Dramatic Authors' Association, which publishes plays, and which has to some extent injured the business of Michel Lévy & Brothers, who have long held the monopoly of publishing dramatic works. Its career, so far, has been successful, more successful doubtless than would be that of any association of authors of another kind who should attempt to dispense with a publisher. It costs but little to put a play in type, and if a play has already been applauded on the stage there is a sure sale for a certain number of copies. There have been in Paris librettos of operas which have been sold to the extent of 70,000 copies, and dramas of which there have been sold more than 100,000 copies. And on an average it may be set down as certain that collectors, spectators, dramatic agents, and managers of provincial theatres will buy 300 or 350 copies of any play that has succeeded on the Parisian stage. But $25 covers the cost of 1,000 copies of a one-act play, $40 of a play in two acts, $63 of a play in five acts, and the entire cost is covered if 300 copies are bought. The rest is clear profit. So there can hardly be a loss upon the publication of dramatic works. With books of other kinds the case would be very different. So, as is evident, the Dramatic Authors' Association, which publishes for the author, finds it not hard to succeed, and, at the same time, give more money to the author than Messrs. Lévy, who have hitherto monopolized the business, have felt willing to give. As the first instance of co-operation on the part of the genus irritabile—the first instance that we have heard of—the experience of this Parisian association is interesting. It is hardly to be called an experience promising good to the whole fraternity of writers wherever found. In this country, for example, an association of authors which should go into the publishing business would soon die. An indefinite number of "Something, and Other Poems," as Mr. Bristed says, would speedily kill it, or else it would fall to exercising the publisher's function of finding out what literature would probably pay for publication, and so would fail of attaining the end of such associations—bringing books before the reader through a channel of publicity less expensive to the author than that which the ordinary publisher now offers. For the facts in regard to the French association which we have set down in this note, we are indebted to the Paris correspondent of the Publishers' Circular—a writer whose letters are always valuable and interesting.

GENERAL GREENE.*

THE life of General Greene is, we are told, the realization of a dream of early youth. A work written in this spirit by any one, and upon any subject, could hardly fail to have some interest and value—still less when the writer is one of the foremost literary men of the country, and the subject the chief military hero of the Revolution next to Washington. Not without reason, then, does the author venture to hope for his production "a life beyond my own;" his book is at once a welcome contribution to American literature, a valuable historical record, and the needed memorial of a distinguished man about whom too little is known.

"The life of General Greene," we are told, "falls by a natural division into two parts; the first of which is strictly biographical, the second historical." In the present volume we have the biography—the years of preparation for the great work in which he was the chief actor—"Greene's thoughts and feelings, the growth of his mind and the formation of his character, compose the picture." This "psychological study" is very successful. We are made personally acquainted with his mind and character, not by any labored analysis of the biographer, but by his own energetic actions, thoughtful writing, and judicious counsels; and if we do not recognize the over-sanguine nature, too readily despondent and as readily flushed by "the illusions of inexperience," of Mr. Bancroft's last volume, it is not for lack of materials on which to form a judgment. Nor do we learn to know Greene alone, but his associates and surroundings. His home at Potowhommet—a genuine bit of New England—is made almost as familiar as if we had known it in person; and in every scene of military life the writer has the skill to place himself and his reader in close relations with his hero. Nowhere is this more finely done than in the description of the camp life at Valley Forge, p. 564.

There is, no doubt, more correspondence on purely military topics than the general reader needs—not too much, perhaps, for the historical student. Perhaps, too, there are times when our author fails to make it certain that Greene was not too sanguine. It surely is not necessary for his fame to prove that he did not make a mistake in advising Fort Washington to be held. It was, at any rate, an open question—Washington himself felt in doubt—and if the issue proved that his first judgment was right, he yet had not himself felt decided enough to feel inclined afterwards to throw the responsibility upon his lieutenant, even if his magnanimity had not forbidden this. But Professor Greene has done wisely in taking no notice whatever of the ungenerous insinuations of Bancroft's history; the name of that historian is not once mentioned. Only we have the full correspondence from which garbled extracts are given in that work; and, what is more important still, we have the most constant and convincing evidence of the esteem and confidence reposed by Washington in General Greene—and if Washington was satisfied, we may well be.

Besides the Fort Washington affair, the only serious charge made by Mr. Bancroft is with regard to Greene's late arrival at Germantown, and this is rather an insinuation than a charge straightforwardly made. But in his numerous citations on this point he neglects to refer to Pickering's journal, which must have been accessible to him, which says, without a word of censure (and Pickering was a sharp and fearless critic), "I understood that the guide of the left wing mistook the way"†—a not unnatural nor uncommon occurrence.

In a review of this life of Col. Pickering, a few weeks ago, we spoke of a certain "hardness towards Washington" noticed by the biographer as inexplicable. The biographer thought fit, however, to omit a very characteristic anecdote touching on this point, which Prof. Greene, more judiciously as we think, gives, p. 468:

"On one of those dreary nights," writes Pickering, "as the army marched upwards on the eastern side of the Schuylkill, in its rear I fell in with General Greene. We descended the bank of Perkiomen creek together, and while our horses were drinking, I said to him: 'General Greene, before I came to the army I entertained an exalted opinion of General Washington's military talents, but I have since seen nothing to enhance it.' I did not venture to say it was sensibly lowered, though that was the fact; and so Greene understood me, for he instantly answered in these words precisely: 'Why, the General does lack decision; for my part, I decide in a moment.'"

Nothing is gained, we think, by suppressing such anecdotes as this. We surely do not need to be told that Washington was not faultless; nor is it any disparagement to either him or Greene that in the second year of the war there did not exist that almost superstitious reverence for him which we have learned to feel.

This faithfulness to the record is a marked characteristic of the book. General Greene's grammar is at all times faulty, but is left as he wrote it: so that we have such sentences as this (p. 98): "Many officers blames me for being so silent upon the occasion, and thinks I don't do justice to the colony." Nor is his letter to his wife omitted (p. 406), advising her to improve her spelling before coming to the camp.

We noticed in Pickering's letters frequent complaints of lack of public spirit and morality, and of the inefficiency of Congress. In this volume, which covers a part of the same ground, we find the same complaints—less severe and frequent perhaps, as Greene was a less critical person than Pickering. We do, however, obtain in this volume a stronger picture than the other gives us of the inefficient administration of Congress, so strong and apparently so well-founded as to make our Congress during the late rebellion appear by comparison a model of energy and wisdom. And we suspect that this was true. It was partly owing to the weakness of the Federal Government (which indeed did not in strictness exist at this time), partly to an actual degeneracy in the second Congress by the withdrawal of able men, and partly, as we believe, to a real inferiority in the average of the community then as compared with the present day.

The two years and a half of the war comprised in the volume before us have many analogies with the same period in the beginning of our late war in circumstances which account in some degree for the evils complained of. It was experimental—made up of illusions, miscalculations, and blunders, a severe but wholesome school. But we fear it was true, as our author says, that while the army learned from the lessons of experience, the civil leaders refused to do so until after still more bitter experience. In the war of the rebellion, on the other hand, Congress was nowise backward in learning all that experience taught.

Professor Greene's judgment, indeed, would warrant an even stronger contrast. "It is the greatest of all absurdities," he says, in a note to page 411, "to represent the Revolution as the work of either the people or of Congress; it was the work of a few leading men who inspired confidence and awakened enthusiasm in spite of the errors of Congress and the shortcomings of the people. But for the reverence inspired by Washington, the people would have failed the Congress and Congress the people. But for the sustaining sympathy of Greene, Sullivan, Schuyler, Knox, Hamilton, the two Morrises, and a few more, both civilians and soldiers, Washington would have sunk under the burden of responsibility and labor." This, then, was an aristocratic revolution—a revolution carried through by a few men! And we know that aristocracy was the prevailing sentiment, and the institutions of the time had an aristocratic basis. How different from the revolution of our democratic days, in which it was the determination of the masses that pushed soldiers and statesmen—often against their will—to the auspicious result!

It would be hardly worth the while to notice one or two instances of what we might deem defective rhetoric in a style which is generally so calm and well sustained or a few cases in which the connection of events is not made sufficiently clear. We will, however, remark that in so detailed and vivid descriptions of battles, plans of the ground would have been very serviceable, especially for the battle of Brandywine. It is to be hoped that these will not be omitted in the subsequent volumes.

* "The Life of Nathanael Greene, Major-General in the Army of the Revolution. By George Washington Greene, author of 'Historical View of the American Revolution.' In three volumes. Vol. I." New York: G. P. Putnam & Son. 1867.

† Pickering's Life, Vol. I., p. 167.

HINTON'S HISTORICAL COSTUMES.*

MODERN writers upon the fine arts, a race who differ very widely among themselves, seem to agree pretty well in this, that modern figure painting is not of absorbing interest, nor capable of giving delight to anybody, either painter or spectator. About the causes of this unfortunate condition of things these writers again differ widely among themselves, but are found to agree again in this, that modern costume is one reason, and a potent one. The painters themselves, not often gifted with power of coherent speech, act at least as if they agreed with the critics. The French classical painters—whom Hamon shall represent for us—avoid modern costume by the adoption for all their figures of a light drapery of semi-Grecian character, not displaying much of the dressmaker's art, not very credible as garments for the working day, not very well adapted for "northern climes and British ladies," nor for the uses of any other than a strictly ideal "Jardinière," or "Girl feeding chickens." They gain what they seek, placid grace, unity of conception, harmony; and for these they sacrifice possibility as willingly as they give up richness and brilliancy of color. The English realists, caring less for beauty of line than for fulness of meaning and truth to the facts, paint modern life in modern costume. More than any one painter, Thomas Woolner, the sculptor, is an example of this close confinement of the imagination within the limits of the actual; a master of the nude form, and the most inventive of modern designers in pure sculpture, he is not less careful of Tennyson's knotted cravat and coat tight-buttoned across a broad chest than of Tennyson's clusters of hair; but even he is glad of the chance to model little "Constance in her night-gown," and took the order for a statue of Bacon for Oxford with, probably, a feeling of gratitude for the possibility of a long furred gown.

* "Select Historical Costumes, compiled from the most Reliable Sources. By Henry L. Hinton." New York: Wynkoop & Sherwood. 1868.

The painters of the school of art to which Woolner belongs, though staunch in their principles of putting modern men in modern dress, are fond of a subject which will give them a better chance. One of the most prominent men of the school, John Everett Millais, is best known by his studies of the past—Huguenots of the sixteenth century and Cavaliers of the seventeenth; another one, Holman Hunt, has drawn his most important pictures, with a single exception, from the East and from Oriental life, taking his subjects from the sacred history, but his costumes and accessories and "local color" from the little-changing East as he saw it in the nineteenth century. And if we look at other painters, who are neither English students of the actual nor French students of the classical, we find the powerful ones doing either as Hunt does or else Millais does. Gérôme, probably, does not head or represent a "school," for his work is not artistic enough to satisfy artists, even badly taught artists, if they are taught art at all; but he is one of the most prominent of those who have gone to the East for a satisfaction which modern Europe will not afford. And Henry Leys, of Antwerp, leads the Continental mediævalists who seek material for beautiful art in a careful study of the rich, varied, often whimsical, but as often noble, and always picturesque, dress of the people of Western Europe during their great age of decorative art, which we roughly put at from A.D. 1200 to 1550.

To go abroad for subjects or inspiration is not exactly the right way for painters to work; for painters, to succeed truly, must paint what they thoroughly understand and have sympathized with from childhood, unless they become acclimated abroad, when they may possibly succeed in painting the life of the people of their own time in foreign lands, as Gérôme and Holman Hunt have done in different ways. But to live among the people of the past, and set them once more in motion, to animate the simulacra arrayed before us by Froissart and De Joinville, is not possible—at least, it has not yet been done, and probably it cannot be. Pictures of the past must continue to be like histories of the past, mere record, not life, and hardly drama. The drama must be of the present; no matter what antiquated names you give your puppets, the voice that speaks for them must speak from a modern intelligence.

Of the two uses to which this little book is devoted, namely, of furnishing material for masqueraders and the getters-up of fancy balls and tableaux, and of giving suggestions to artists, the former is the more important. Some good may come of "fancy dresses," but none, we think, of mediævalism in art, more especially in a country where the past has no hold whatever. If any good comes from the book at all, it will be in helping those who are, or, under favorable circumstances, would be, artists in dress. The absolute rule of fashion smothers all love and all capacity for the art of dress. Once in five or six seasons a woman has a chance to wear beautiful stuffs—but within six months they have become no longer admissible. Once in about as long a time fashion allows a not ungraceful drapery, which will be cut short or thinned out to awkwardness with the next turn of the wheel. Men just now may wear pretty patterns and bright colors of silk in their scarfs, and a bit of jewellery, which may be good in a small way as scarf ring or pin; but that is all the chance they have to show any love for beauty in their dress. It is not the fine art of dress which one cultivates in selecting the quietest of his tailor's cassimeres, and in insisting upon a medium style of cut for his dress-coat; and such bits of good sense as these are all, except the cravat, which the modern gentleman may indulge in.

But it seems possible that the inborn love of beauty of which Americans in these years are beginning to make a little more account might be directed toward this important matter of dress, by the influence of the masquerade and such other occasions of license in matters of garb as we have named. Not that we expect any speedy good result from such means. But it is possible. Every man or woman who, with careful skill and trained taste, has prepared and wears a beautiful costume, even for one evening, may be doing a certain good work by it, may arouse a little the dormant love of beautiful clothes, may shake a little the barbarous throne of fashion, may give a hint to others how to dress a little more tastefully in spite of, or in modification of, the fashion. We recommend this book to those persons who have not within their reach better books of the same sort, as a collection of hints toward the preparation of beautiful dresses.

As regards the book itself, the costumes are drawn from several sources, not all of equal authority. Those of the Middle Ages are not of the richest, but rather of the least splendid and characteristic that might have been chosen. Those of the present time are interesting, and make one desire a work which might easily be prepared, and which would preserve all the fast-disappearing costumes of the outlying provinces of Germany and Italy. The lithographs are not fine nor delicate, and the book does not pass for a gift-book or a finely illustrated one, but only for a sort of school-book in the study of dress.

THE MAGAZINES FOR FEBRUARY.

THE magazines have become so numerous, and so much of their contents is almost necessarily padding, that we intend, in reviewing them hereafter, to speak only of the more valuable or striking articles—such as we shall presume our readers would, out of curiosity, or for profit, willingly read. Mr. Tennyson, this month, makes his first appearance, we believe, as a contributor to the Atlantic. His poem, published a month ago in Good Words, was copied from that source into many of our American papers, and has probably been already read with some pleasure by almost everybody. It is in finely finished verse, and is the presentation of a situation ingeniously painful. That we see the love of the mother, or, if one chooses to say so, the maternal instinct, triumphing over the fear of death and contriving self-sacrifice, is of itself enough to save the poem from producing the effect of horror merely. This escape is facilitated, we should say, partly by our perception of the mother's ingenuity and still more by a lack of vividness and force on the poet's part. Mr. Whittier and the anonymous writer of "Orion" furnish the rest of this month's poetry. "Orion" is not happy in thought or in the dress of the thought. "The Meeting" is in Mr. Whittier's best style, as regards the language and versification; some of the verses are notably felicitous in word and ideas—as, for instance, these, which the editors of the Advance will like better than the editors of the Liberal Christian:

> "No cool philosopher to teach
> His bland audacities of speech
> To double-tasked idolaters,
> Themselves their gods and worshippers."

It has numerous other verses, however, which will please Unitarians more than the orthodox. Every reader of good American poetry will know what we mean when we say that, substantially, the poem is an expression of Mr. Whittier's religious belief.

Mr. Parton, in an amusing article, justifies himself tolerably well for having discontinued smoking. He thinks his room is cleaner than it was in old times. That alone would be a good deal; but then, too, he has a better opinion of himself than he had formerly. He breathes foul air with far less inconvenience than during the thirty years in which he used the vegetable poison. His head aches less than it did once. His temper, he believes, is somewhat better than it used to be. If these things are so, perhaps he did well to forego the chief pleasure of the modern man. As for us others, we have now, we fancy, a sufficiently good opinion of ourselves. The present writer, for example, habitually looks at his individual self, decides forthwith that he has collected a sufficient number of facts for generalizing, and immediately proceeds to tell his fellow-creatures that a certain thing "does not pay," or the reverse. Then again most of us, we should say, have clean rooms already, and not many headaches, and are sufficiently good-tempered, and do not care to enjoy foul air or to be otherwise than offended by it. Tom Sayers, we imagine, would have been amused if he had read Mr. Parton's diatribe and thought of the cigars which he consumed up to the eve of Farnsborough. And Mr. Blaikie, we dare say, will tell Mr. Parton that the racing crew which has "made the best time" yet made in this country was not totally debarred from smoking during the period of training. Doubtless, to go a little further, Mr. Blaikie will say also that the rowing-men do not, as a general thing, read Buckle or write Buckle to any great extent, and Buckle, as Mr. Parton tells us, wrote "the most valuable work of this century." So to be an abstainer from tobacco is not all. In fact, Mr. Parton argues from himself and from extreme cases of one sort and another, and makes wild statements of various kinds. We do not know what a man so incapable of making limitations would do if he could be at the same time a man incapable of making limitations and a man of any imagination. Smoke himself to death, perhaps; do nothing at all with moderation; let uncorrected likes and dislikes lead him into odd opinions, and beguile him or drive him into passing judgments which are and must remain singular.

Mr. Dickens's "George Silverman's Explanation" goes on with an agreeably rapid movement towards the ending of it. "The Destructive Democracy," by an unknown author, is a very weak performance; for any effect it can have it might better have remained unwritten, for those readers whom its dulness does not repel will, by a natural—deplorable perhaps, but natural—reaction rebound towards the Democracy when they see in a Republican writer of some ability such blind misapprehension of the condition of political affairs. The Democracy is to be destructive by reason of what the Republicans fail to do, and, without the sacrifice of a principle, the party which fortunately has been in possession of power for the last seven years can keep itself in power. But denunciations of the Democracy or faithful histories of Democratic corruption are not going to give us the country next year. A little work on the revenue laws is to-day, the average voter thinks, worth perhaps several hundred thousand speeches, spoken or printed, on the enormous guilt of Davis and Lee.

Besides the prose and poetry above-mentioned, there is a clever article, by Mr. E. E. Hale, entitled "A Week in Sybaris," and jocosely satirical upon some of our modern municipal, social, and domestic inconveniences and follies; an essay about some Elizabethan dramatists, by Mr. Whipple; an essay by Dr. Hedge which is called "Characteristics of Genius;" and a neatly done little notice of Mr. Tuckerman's latest book. Mr. Henry James, Jr., writes "The Romance of Some Old Clothes," a tantalizing story which, when the end turns out trivial, is seen to be trivial altogether.

A story of a very different class is that one of Mr. James's which is finished in the February Galaxy. "The Story of a Masterpiece" is very well thought out, and is, so far as we remember, the best of Mr. James's. Within the somewhat narrow limits to which he confines himself, Mr. James is, we think, the best writer of short stories in America. He is never commonplace, never writes without knowing what he wants to do, and never has an incident or a character that is not in some way necessary to the production of such effects as he aims at. By-and-by, no doubt, he will write of something besides love, will leave off subtly analyzing flirtations. In the tale of which we speak, a man in love with a woman, who is probably all she should be—to use a common phrase—but perhaps not all she might be, learns, on the sight of a portrait, painted with insight by an old-time lover of hers, the woman's essential worthlessness. It is a good idea and, as we have said, well worked out.

Mrs. Yelverton writes a very slight article on the "British Marriage Law and Practice"—an article that makes a better figure in the advertisements of the magazine than in the magazine itself. Besides these writers, the Galaxy brings forward this month Mr. Clarence Cook, Mr. Grant White, Mr. George Wakeman, M. Pierre Blot, and Mr. George M. Towle. Mr. Towle gives a sad account of "French Clubs." "It is certainly true," he says, "that one with moral perception cannot remain comfortable in such a place a quarter of an hour;" and there is much more of the same sort, all of it to be taken cum multis granis. M. Blot is always amusing. Thus he speaks of the concomitants and consequents of "a good, nearly frozen Roman Punch:" "If well made, its refreshing qualities, together with the charming smiles of the ladies, profusely distributed right and left, and the amiable and gallant little phrases of the gentlemen, prepare every one to attack those most succulent of birds—quails." It is good news, by the way, that M. Blot talks of setting up a restaurant for down-town men of business. And if that philosopher of his acquaintance, who "had never seen a lady cut a meringue that did not enjoy it," and so much enjoy it that a smile of peculiar captivation passed over her face, would talk still further with M. Blot, and induce him to try saddle of horse and other equine dishes at the new tables, it would be an act worthy of himself as a man without prejudice, and one which M. Blot almost owes to a people whom he has even now partly emancipated.

Lippincott's for February—a better number than that for January—begins with more of Mrs. Harding Davis's painful novel. We see she makes an attempt at satire, and contrasts an over-wise, transcendental young collegian from New England with some West Virginians, stolid and solid. "The Christian Commission" tells of the soldiers several good stories, and one that is extraordinary. It is briefly this: A Federal soldier, wounded in the mouth at the battle of Resaca, was asked by Mr. Arthur Lawrence, of the Commission, if he would not have a drink. Intense thirst is the first sensation after a wound. The young fellow, whose name is unknown, declined the draught offered him, saying, "My mouth 's all bloody, sir, and it might make the canteen bad for the others." "Alaska" gives much new information about our northernmost territory, if, indeed, it is our northernmost. The article speaks of a new continent called Wrangel's Land, which was discovered last summer by an American, Captain Long, who sailed through Behring Straits to the northwest, and coasted a new country. The writer gives a very favorable account of Alaska, believes that its wood alone will make it of incalculable value to our Pacific States, and that it may in time—with its climate as mild in winter as that of New York—become a great seat of ship-building industry. An isothermal map accompanies the article. "European Affairs," which we conjecture to be by Louis Blanc, is of no great length, and not, perhaps, in quality quite equal to his reputation. It talks well, however, of the Italian and Mexican troubles, and of the Fenians in England. "Our Monthly Gossip" is of interest and value, and is evidently prepared by a writer possessed of some literary and a good deal of bibliographical knowledge. The poetry of this number is nowise remarkable.

So also of the poetry in this number of Putnam's. Some rhymed hexameters on "Broadway" have, however, this pretty good verse:

> "A miss to whom life hath some charm since Don Giovanni is ours."

And enough like this:

> "She 's gone! what a princess-like gait has this blonde, so accustomed to Broadway."

For prose, Putnam's has, like Lippincott's, an article on Fitz-Greene Halleck, who is talked about in a rather prosy way. It has also some extracts from a private journal never published, and never written in except now and then, kept by Fenimore Cooper. Cooper's strong sense is plainly visible in the few passages quoted, and so is his forcible, downright character. Of mixed prose and poetry, we have the paper on "Dante and his Latest Translators." The writer, in his remarks on the work of others, shows some critical ability, but again seems at times anything but acute or in possession of the poetical sense. He translates the inscription over the entrance into hell by verses which begin thus:

> "Through me the path to place of wail,
> Through me the path to endless sigh," etc.—

which seems to be hardly more English than Italian.

The "Book Notices" in Putnam's are not nearly so well done as in its equal-aged rival for public favor.

Hours at Home is fuller of Halleck than either Putnam's or Lippincott's, and, as regards a critical estimate of the poet, is much better and comes nearer to stating the poet's place than either of the others. Our own opinion of him has been freely offered. We may say we find it confirmed by these anecdotes of him which his acquaintances now put in print. Mr. James Greenwood's "Pen Poison" is written by a veteran writer for magazines. It tells of the contents of what are called "yellow-covered novels," and speaks of the matter and sale of them with indignation. But it is not so good as he ought to have made it; it is, indeed, commonplace. The Rev. F. M. Bird writes a biographical notice of an unknown hymn-writer, whom he praises highly. But he gives specimens of his work, by which it appears that Mr. Gill had but a poor notion of what a hymn is, and that he will hardly be saved from oblivion. Dr. Bushnell continues in this number of Hours at Home the series of papers on which he has been for many months engaged, and Mr. John D. Sherwood writes a better article than we have known him to write before, to which he gives the odd title of "Knobs of Travel."

Harper's has many tales—half a dozen or so—two illustrated papers, one about "A Summer on the Plains," and one by General Strothers, who this time tells about the march to Antietam and the battle there; an essay, entitled "Warfare of Modern Religious Thought," which we suspect as Dr. Osgood's; some chapters of Miss Mulock's new novel; and the usual quantity of "Monthly Record," "Editor's Drawer," and "Editor's Easy Chair." Dickens, and Railroad Conveniences—as Mr Vanderbilt understands them and permits them to be purveyed in this part of the world—and Gifts for Christmas and New Year's are Mr. Curtis's themes this month. We must not forget to mention the best article in the February Harper's. It is a little collection of anecdotes of Governor Andrew, each one of which will deepen the public's sense of its loss.

"Couture's Book" is the pleasantest reading in the Catholic World. One hardly wonders at the enthusiasm with which his old pupils speak of him. His "Painting-Room Method and Conversations"—everybody calls it Couture's book, it is so naïvely full of himself and so much like him in speech—ought to be translated for students of art in this country. The Catholic World gives many extracts, and they constitute, as we have said, an entertaining article. "Paris Impious, and Religious Paris"—which gives some account of Parisian charities—ought to be read together with Mr. Towle's lamentation above mentioned. Aubrey de Vere writes some of his less successful verses on the text, "Beati Mites," etc.; Argyll's "Reign of Law" is carefully reviewed from the Catholic point of view; the speech of Bishop Dupanloup at the Congress of Malines, in which he denounced so severely the project for erecting a monument to Voltaire, is translated at length; Father Lacordaire is eulogized, and there are other matters of less importance—among them this, which appropriately follows directly after the praise of the new Dominican: "A certain old man determined that he would drink nothing for forty days. Whenever he was tormented by burning thirst he took a vessel, and, having filled it with water, placed it before him. And when his brethren asked him why he did this, he answered: 'In order that, seeing what I greatly desire, and yet not tasting it, my suffering may be the more intense, and hence that the reward which God shall give me may be the greater." He was one of the fathers of the desert.

Recent Republications.—In spite of the already numerous works on the same subject, we are disposed to welcome the appearance in a more permanent form of Dr. Burt's letters from the East to the Cincinnati Gazette.* They are the unpretentious record of a traveller whose interest in his journey seldom becomes enthusiasm, and whose language is never rhapsodical. His observations, however, are frequently newer than could be expected in so well-studied a field, and we presume his conjectures as to the real location of Scriptural places and events are worth something among others. We do not remember a Nile tourist who exhibits more plainly or more feelingly that intimacy with the sky which must result from the monotony of the river scenery; the colors of morning and evening are noted, if not with warmth, at least with apparent precision—which, perhaps, is to be said of all Dr. Burt's descriptions. He is also the first, so far as we know, to set down the music of the boatmen of the Nile, which has been often alluded to, and sometimes in comparison with that of the blacks of the Sea Islands. The sketch-maps, which are fitted to the size of the page and bound in with the text, are another feature of this volume in which it surpasses more enduring and valuable works. The wood-cuts are of less account. Dr. Burt says (p. 195), speaking of Egypt:

"In the matter of taxes it is estimated that, notwithstanding all the measures devised to secure to the Government the full amount of taxes levied on the people, at least one-half of the whole sum paid by the people stops short of the public treasury—in the hands of intermediate agents."

Should his book reach a second edition, the author might quote, in a foot-note to this passage, Mr. Commissioner Wells's belief that in this country "not over fifty per cent. of the amount of the internal revenue taxes is received in the national Treasury." This in turn might suggest a note on the futility of Ismail Pasha's device for saving more of the revenue—establishing a constitutional form of Government.

If the debate between Romanism and Protestantism—the principles as well as the systems—were to end as soon as either party should be content to forego the last word, a stout pamphlet of 128 pages reviving it† might be deemed untimely and inconsiderate. Undoubtedly, political equality, free public education under Protestant auspices, and a national rule which compels sectarian toleration, are forces which must in time either destroy Catholicism in this country or essentially change its nature. But it is our misfortune that this form of religion has been imported and is sustained chiefly by one class of immigrants, whose numbers and whose ignorance together have made them courted as a political power, and secured immunity and even homage for their common profession. Catholicism has thus a bulwark against the corroding action of our institutions, and behind it may grow strong enough, at least in certain localities, some day to hazard a struggle for supremacy. Proof of the metamorphosis (perhaps only external) which it is undergoing here, and also of its inability to succeed in an open encounter, when undertaking to deny its transformation, is contained in the interesting discussion in Cincinnati, to which we have already once or twice alluded, between Rev. Thomas Vickers and Archbishop Purcell. This was partly conducted in sermons, and partly through the press of the city, the archbishop using his brother's paper for his own arguments, but never printing therein the rejoinder of his adversary, although the Gazette regularly presented both sides. It is Mr. Vickers, of course, who gathers up all the articles, and publishes them for the public verdict, and we have only to add that a more complete discomfiture than that which befell the would-be liberal and yet obedient archbishop is rarely to be met with. His attempts to maintain at once the immutability and uniformity of Church doctrines, and his own incautious utterances in oblivion of the Encyclical, are as amusing as the "Comedy of Convocation;" and if the members of the Established Church can take any comfort from so unevangelical a champion as Mr. Vickers, we advise them to purchase and enjoy his pamphlet. The appendix contains the Encyclical and Syllabus of Dec. 8, 1864, in the original Latin, with a faithful translation by Mr. Vickers himself.

My Prisons. Memoirs of Silvio Pellico. (Boston: Roberts Brothers. 1868.)—Silvio Pellico, a young Italian poet, was arrested at Milan by the Austrian authorities, in October, 1820, and spent the succeeding ten years of his life in various prisons, the fortress of Spielberg being that in which he remained longest and suffered most severely. His arrest was occasioned by the publication of certain articles in the Conciliatore, a Liberal newspaper, published at Milan, with which he was connected. He was at first condemned to death, but the sentence was commuted to "fifteen years severe imprisonment." At the end of ten years he was released.

In 1831 "My Prisons" was first published in Italian, and it has since been frequently translated into other languages. It possessed certain features which of necessity rendered it popular. As the work of a man who had suffered in the cause of freedom, it was eagerly welcomed by the Liberals of Europe. The ecclesiastics, also, who create and destroy so many reputations on inadequate and factitious grounds, took this book under their protection. It stood well, moreover, on its own merits. As a poet, Pellico would never have addressed a wide circle of readers, but the accident of his imprisonment furnished him with the material and the occasion for a simple and pathetic record of personal experience under the severest trials, which appeals, as such records must always appeal, to the sympathy of all readers. That the interest of the work is purely biographical and limited, that it awakens no emotions except sympathy and compassion, and teaches no lessons save resignation and faith, and teaches these in a certain restricted sense, seem to us sufficient reasons for demurring to the title of "world-classic" which Mr. Epes Sargent gives it, but, of course, do not interfere with its rightful claim to popularity.

The book is, perhaps, chiefly remarkable for its omissions. A good deal of clap-trap, even, might have been pardoned a man who for ten years had suffered unjust imprisonment; but Pellico neither invokes liberty nor inveighs against tyranny. Prudence probably enjoined this reticence, but Pellico's artistic sense no doubt confirmed the decision. At all events, the silence is suggestive, and the unemphasized story is willingly supplemented by the reader. A still further reason for his moderation might be found in the fact that he was an exceedingly good specimen of the Christian optimist. On the first night of his incarceration he embraced Christianity, in which, he says, he had previously only half believed. He turned instinctively, however, to its consolations, and they never failed him. He accepted the sufferings as a just punishment for his sins and a necessary discipline for his soul; and so believing, to have expressed wrath against the appointed instruments in his perfection would have been out of character.

That it is possible to live well even in a palace, we know from Marcus Aurelius. The problem is probably more difficult in a prison. There privation cannot wear the garb of self sacrifice, the charm of willing to assume a difficult post must be foregone, the prisoner seems to be the sport of men and not of natural forces, and cannot help wasting upon them a certain amount of unphilosophical anger. It would be unfair to expect from such an unnatural condition of life the best results of which life is capable. The tests are not only more than ordinarily severe, but both mind and body are in a morbid condition, to which healing and consolation are of the first importance. Yet, laboring under disadvantages so immense, Pellico proved himself a man worthy of the sincerest respect and sympathy. Suffering taught him some of its best lessons, and the miserable years of imprisonment which wasted his youth failed to rob him of his love for literature, his belief in human virtue, and his faith in God.

The Story of My Childhood. By Mme. J. Michelet. Translated from the French by Mary Frazier Curtis. (Boston: Little, Brown & Co. 1867.)—This little story of Madame Michelet's is so delightfully told that one might quote with pleasure from almost every page, and yet its beauty is so purely formal that one forgets to sympathize with the childish sorrows it

* "The Far East; or, Letters from Egypt, Palestine, and Other Lands of the Orient. By N. C. Burt, D.D." Cincinnati: R. W. Carroll & Co. 1868.

† "The Roman Catholic Church and Free Thought. A Controversy between Archbishop Purcell, of Cincinnati, and Thomas Vickers, Minister of the First Congregational Church of the same City," etc., etc. Cincinnati: R. W. Carroll & Co.

delineates, because they afforded such pretty material for the adult imagination to work into shape. It is autobiographical in form, but there is, properly speaking, no central figure; the interest does not centre in the neglected child and her doll, but scatters on a thousand diverse points. The child is, indeed, but the connecting link which binds together certain lovely little pictures of French rural life; she has no such strong personality as Marjorie Fleming, or, to take an instance from pure fiction, as Maggie Tulliver, beside whose genuine humanity this little French maid becomes almost as artificial as her doll itself. Her experiences are doubtless genuine, but one can't help feeling that the book owes quite as much to its author's artistic power and her imagination as to her memory.

The story might, however, be wholly fictitious and yet lose none of its value. One reading by no means exhausts its resources as a pleasure-giver; it is so simple, so graceful, it reproduces with such delicately vivid strokes the peculiar charm of French domestic life that one lingers over its pages with renewed delight. In France the gods of the hearth are not so heavy-footed as in England, nor so redolent of beef and pudding; home life there, as it is painted in this book, and in a charming little tale by Madame Sartoris, called "A Week in a French Country House," has a singular and poetic grace.

Madame Michelet introduces us to a family of moderate wealth and good social position, living in the south of France. We see the studious father; the mother, grave and severe, lenient to her two elder children, but stern and unsympathetic with the younger ones; the elder sister, devoted to housekeeping and her doll; the rough and mischievous brothers; the picturesque servants, and, finally, the solitary little girl whose infancy was passed away from home, and whose childhood found but one friend, her father, and but one consolation, her doll. This doll, by the way, is an old friend of ours. We recognize in it and its mistress the heroines of a chapter in "La Femme," entitled "Love at Five Years: The Doll." The owner of that doll, indeed, died broken-hearted at the loss of her rag-baby, and madame, on the contrary, survived to write the history of hers; but M. Michelet probably felt that so much might be conceded to the claims of sentiment. It is not, however, the sentiment of this book which constitutes its charm. The child might as well have been born of the ideal mother in "La Femme," and cradled in love from her infancy, since her little miseries and infrequent joys are matters of minor importance. They are told by a woman who recognizes in their gentle melancholy a charming background against which to sketch her delicate bits of landscape—her harvest scenes, her rustic interiors. It was an artistic problem merely, which her success solves satisfactorily. What could be better in its way than this, and how little of its charm does it owe to the age or sex, the happiness or unhappiness of its narrator?

"The grandeur and poetry of our autumn come with October. At the close of this beautiful month a melancholy silence settles on the country. The leaves are falling, not by the frost, but from exhaustion, after the long summer. The soil is full of the warm, pelting rains of the equinoctial storm. Little clouds hang just above the meadows, and follow the streams. When the sun has not power enough to lift them in the morning, they are condensed in fogs upon our valley. We ran out to play at losing ourselves in this sea of white vapor. What remained of the world? Nought but gossamer threads and the sound of our own footsteps.

"At noonday came a change, and bright rays pierced the thick veil. The sun transformed the clouds to glory, then vanished away, and left a pure blue sky, soft light, and slumbrous calm in the air. One would gladly have dreamed away the day; but it was essential to make haste, and profit by these sweet afternoons. My brothers helped to shake down nuts, and collect leaves for enriching the soil. I had to gather in the last of the seeds, and spread them out to dry. My mother and sister went to the weaver to set up the web of some new linen. . . . There were no holidays at the farm in these times: the tillage and planting were to be done. We were glad to see the pale-colored stubble of the fields turned over at last, and the great oxen dragging loads of manure. Towards evening we followed the gigantic shadow of the old woman who cast the seeds into the furrow. She saw us not: she went and came like a spirit. Her action was almost sublime, as she walked hand in hand with destiny. She seemed to say to the earth, 'I give: receive thou.'"

The book is translated into very easy and flexible English, which retains the spirit of the original as well as its substance.

O-Kee-pa; a Religious Ceremony, and other Customs of the Mandans By George Catlin. With thirteen colored illustrations. (Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. 1867.)—Much more than other sciences does the science of man depend upon a multiplicity of observations, and upon a due regard to all the phenomena, not excepted those which correspond to earthquakes and rattlesnakes. Ought the author of O-Kee-pa to have stopped when he had proved that the Mandans had, more than any other Indians, a distinct tradition of the Flood, and celebrated annually the retreat of the waters with the same emblems of the event that are cherished by Christendom—an effigy of the Ark, a willow (for an olive) twig, a "medicine" bird, and a representative of Noah himself, painted white? We decidedly think not. We do not know why he should have spared the details of the cruel ordeal of the braves, and the disgusting rites of the Feast of the Buffaloes, which were always joined with the propitiatory sacrifice to the Great Spirit against a second deluge. We think he would have done wrong and not right to suppress the facts. We have a right to know the fate of the Princess de Lamballe or the secrets of the Rathhaus of Nürnberg or the history of the Duke of Alva or of slavery on the Sea Islands or of the extremest forms of religious fanaticism in any age and in any part of the world. All we can require of the historian is that he shall add no ferocity or grossness of his own to that of his narrative; and in this respect Mr. Catlin is certainly faultless. Those who are offended by the realism of his text will, of course, be shocked by the fidelity of his illustrations, which, if not models of drawing and coloring, probably convey a very exact impression of the scenes and characters of the story. The part which discusses the origin of the white strain in the Mandan blood is perfectly unobjectionable, and the author's theory is at least plausible. He likens their wigwams to the rude cabins of the mountain peasantry of Wales, their pottery and beads to Welsh products of the present day, their canoes to the Welsh coracle; and their name he finds pure Welsh for red dye. Several words in their dialect bear a striking resemblance to the Welsh, e.g., Maho-Peneta (Great Spirit) to W. Mawr-Penaethir.

Greek Elements; including the most useful Roots, Derivatives, and Inflections. Compiled by J. H. Allen, Cambridge, Mass. (Boston: Crosby & Ainsworth.)—"These tables," Mr. Allen tells us, "are an attempt to bring into a single view those parts of the grammar and dictionary which are of the most constant and tedious reference." They contain a brief synopsis of Greek syntax, the most usual inflections, and a list of the more common roots. If we were disposed to criticise an attempt which has our hearty sympathy, we might perhaps except to a somewhat loose classification in the third division of the genitive, and to one or two other points of minor importance. Although these tables seem to us too brief, and therefore necessarily too imperfect, to be of much substantial use in their present form, yet we hope they may effect more important service in calling attention to the want now widely felt among intelligent teachers of a thorough reform in the present system of teaching Greek and Latin. Many of the objections to classical study which have been urged so earnestly of late by the advocates of the scientific as opposed to the classical system of instruction might be avoided, and many more might be satisfactorily answered if we could have brief compends, of about one-fourth the size of our present grammars, of the elements of Greek and Latin grammar. Mr. Allen, in common with the best teachers everywhere, has doubtless felt this want, and we earnestly hope that before another year has passed either he, or some other competent person, will undertake this much-needed work.

Condensed French Instruction; consisting of Grammar and Exercises, with Cross References. By C. D. Delille. (New York: Leypoldt & Holt. 1868.)—This is an excellent elementary text-book, consisting of a brief French grammar, followed by a series of exercises in English and French, with constant references to the grammatical principles which the exercises illustrate. The author has shown much discrimination in the selection of these exercises, which seem chosen with the double pufpose of furnishing a useful vocabulary to the beginner and of bringing out the most important principles of grammar. The grammatical portion of the book is excellently arranged, the principles clearly stated, and the verb, the pièce de résistance for young scholars, carefully arranged, is placed most conveniently at the end. Messrs. Leypoldt & Holt publish in the same series, as an elementary reading book, Jean Macé's "Histoire d'une bouchée de pain," designed to take the place which "Le Grand-Père" has so long occupied, and most certainly deserving to supplant it. The style is light, conversational, and idiomatic. Much scientific information is conveyed in an agreeable form. The book is supplied with a vocabulary and a list of the French idioms employed, and forms a natural and suitable companion to the grammar mentioned above. It has received the prize of the French Commission of Instruction, and we can confidently recommend it, together with the grammar, to the attention of teachers and students.

The Nation.

VOL. VI.—NO. 136. THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 6, 1868. { FIVE DOLLARS PER ANNUM. TWELVE CENTS PER COPY.

CONTENTS.

THE WEEK 101

EDITORIAL ARTICLES:
Who are the Bondholders? 104
The "Judicious" in Journalism ... 105

Ariadne's Farewell: Poetry 107
Two Girls 107
England 109

CORRESPONDENCE:
"The War between Heaven and Hell" 110
Mr. Allen's Greek Tables 110

The Propagation of Smelt 110

NOTES:
Literary 110
Scientific 112

The Progress of Anthropology 113
Johnson's "Wonder-Working Providence" 115
Gail Hamilton on Woman's Wrongs .. 116
An Elementary Grammar of the German Language 116

Five Dollars per annum, in advance; Six months, Three Dollars; Forty Dollars to Clubs of Ten; Clergymen, Four Dollars.

THE NATION is sent till positively ordered discontinued, and all arrears have been paid. Subscribers are particularly requested to note the expiration of their subscriptions, and to forward what is due for the ensuing year, with or without further reminder from this office.

GEORGE STREET, 30 CORNHILL, LONDON, E. C., AGENT FOR THE RECEIPT OF SUBSCRIPTIONS AND ADVERTISEMENTS.

E. L. GODKIN & CO., PUBLISHERS, Box 6732, NEW YORK CITY.

The Week.

THE work in Congress has not been very lively, and nothing of much importance has been done. The Senate has kept up the discussion of the character and views of the Republican party as compared with the character and aims of the Democratic party, and with Mr. Johnson's policy. The rumor goes that the debate will be kept up until the news comes from Alabama, and that it will end in the passage of Reconstruction Bill No. 4 or in nothing, according as the news is good or bad. It seems probable that Alabama is about to accept the new constitution; before the end of the week it will be certainly known whether she has or not. In the House, on the 28th of January, a bill was passed providing that the legislature of each State may determine the manner and place of taxing all shares of national banks within the State. On the same day Mr. Chanler, of New York, made some remarks, which the Speaker permitted. It appears that he is not after all going to fight with Mr. Julian, though he is under promise, publicly made on the floor of the House, to do so at an early date. Now he says if anybody is dissatisfied with his record, and chooses to call him to responsibility, he is at such person's service. This is not what the country was expecting of him. On the following day, Wednesday, the Senate passed the bill authorizing the sale of thirty-five iron-clads and the retention of nineteen. In the House, Mr. Banks brought in again the bill to protect American citizens abroad, and made a speech about it. On Thursday this same bill was debated, and again on Tuesday last. Before the debate on that subject Mr. Scofield brought up the case of a Supreme Court judge—supposed to be Judge S. J. Field—who, it has been stated, has said in private conversation what his opinion of the Reconstruction acts is, and what the court's decision will be. The Judiciary Committee is to enquire as to the truth of the statement. On Friday the Senate received the notification that the Ohio Legislature has rescinded the resolution by which the last Legislature ratified the Constitutional Amendment. The Judiciary Committee is to examine the law of the case, and report whether a State's consent can be thus withdrawn. In the House the same action was taken on the same matter. Afterwards the House, 104 to 43, agreed to a final report of the Conference Committee on the cotton-tax bill. The amendment, which the Senate has succeeded in getting tacked to the original bill, exempts from tax imported cotton—imported after November next. The original bill exempts from internal revenue taxes cotton raised in this country. On Saturday there was nothing in the way of speech-making for bunkum. On Monday the reconstruction debate went on in the Senate. In the House the Hon. Mr. Robinson bearded the British lion in behalf of certain prisoners now "rotting" in English dungeons.

The New York Tribune has, during the past week, undertaken to give reasons for the introduction of Reconstruction Bill No. 4. They are in substance that the President, the rebels, and the Democratic party are doing all they can "to embarrass and defeat" the Reconstruction bill now in operation, and that "the results of last year's elections have greatly strengthened their hopes of a triumph next fall;" that, "the President having shown himself the inveterate, unscrupulous enemy of the reconstruction policy of Congress, which his Attorney-General officially declares unconstitutional," "it has seemed just and necessary to Congress that its execution should be confided to a legal and law-abiding General-in-chief rather than to a President who lies awake nights to devise and mature schemes which have for their direct object the overthrow of that policy." It however admits, as the leading members of the Republican party have admitted in the recent debates, that the assertion that "reconstruction is now going forward satisfactorily at the South is measurably true, yet it is none the less true that it is so proceeding in defiance of the most industrious and implacable hostility from the President, the rebels, and the Democratic party." We are thus left as much in the dark as ever. The foregoing, however, suggests a few additional questions which we should like to have answered. Will the new bill creating a dictatorship cause reconstruction to proceed otherwise than "in defiance of the implacable and industrious hostility, etc?" If this hostility be unbearable, will Bill No. 4 destroy or modify it? Will it weaken the Democratic "hopes of a triumph next fall?" Will it cause the President to cease being "the inveterate, unscrupulous, untiring enemy of the reconstruction policy of Congress?" Will it cause his Attorney-General to declare that policy constitutional? Finally, will it cause Mr. Johnson to sleep nights? If these are the things which have caused the introduction of the bill, the bill ought to meet and remove them. If it will not meet or remove them, it becomes a mere wanton assertion of power calculated to trouble the public mind and endanger the Republican triumph next fall. The Tribune also announces that "Congress sees that the President does not take care that the laws be faithfully executed." Congress, if it sees this, ought at once to impeach him, impeachment being the remedy provided by the Constitution, and not by the creation of a new office unknown to the Constitution and calculated to shake popular confidence in the party.

There has been more or less discussion of the bill in the Senate during the week also, but nothing new appears in it. The Democratic arguments were all directed against the whole plan of reconstruction as undertaken by Congress, and those of the Republicans were, to our mind, conclusive as to the wisdom, justice, and necessity of Reconstruction Bill No. 1. Not one word have we found which applies specially to Reconstruction Bill No. 4, and this is the one about which the country wants information.

The other subject of importance which has occupied Congressional attention has been Mr. Banks's bill stating the American doctrine on the subject of expatriation. The bill, as most readers by this time know, settles satisfactorily none of the points in dispute between this and foreign governments. It offers absolute citizenship to all foreigners who choose to come and settle here, but does not surrender the old claim of the American Government to indefeasible allegiance—a claim which the courts and the executive have always asserted, and which was laid down in the broadest terms during the war as regards Davis & Co. Now, we may claim from foreign governments as much as we please, but we must concede as much as we claim, or else we shall still be in hot water. The bill, moreover, gives the President the power of "employing all the resources of the Government in just efforts," etc.; in other words, the power of plunging the country in war without the knowledge or consent of Congress whenever he chose to consider a British Fenian or a Prussian conscript who had paid a visit to his country unjustly deprived of his liberty. The retaliation clause, empowering the President when American citizens are deprived of their liberty abroad to seize and imprison foreigners residing in this country, we hardly know how to characterize. The best thing we can say is, perhaps, that it is worthy of its author. However, in this case law, justice, and common sense are not left without defenders. Several members picked holes in the bill, and Mr. Wilson, of Iowa, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, made an excellent speech, for which the country ought to be grateful to him, setting the question before the House in its true light, showing the points to be met and wherein Mr. Banks's composition failed to meet them, and touching, though we think too lightly, the demagogical features of that remarkable work. If Mr. Wilson and a few other members who understand these questions would make it their business at such crises as these to speak their minds out fully, to state the law clearly, no matter how strong the tide of bunkum was running in the House, we are satisfied they would find it to their advantage in the long run. The Bankses might get the better of them for the moment, but the country would soon learn to appreciate their efforts to save the national credit by pouring cold water on the Congressional head. The subject came up on Monday under a resolution of Mr. Robinson, of Brooklyn, directed against the British lion, which beast he charges with "trampling on American citizens," evidently confounding him with the elephant, as the lion does not trample. Mr. Bingham then did for Mr. Robinson the same service which Mr. Wilson had done for Mr. Banks, telling the Fenians plainly that the doctrine which is rapidly gaining ground amongst them, that on British soil they are entitled to the same privileges and immunities as foreign ambassadors, and are not liable to arrest or punishment, for crime, was a mistake. An excellent bill has, however, been introduced into the Senate as a substitute for that now in the House, and covers the whole ground—makes the rights of expatriation and naturalization part of the public law of the United States, and defines the terms and conditions on which they may be exercised, and the consequences which follow their exercise. We have hoped from the first that discussion and the Senate would save us from the Foreign Committee of the House.

Congress shows serious signs of a desire and design to retrench. But it is dreadfully hard, in the presence of declining revenue and under constant assaults from contending interests. Mr. Washburne is endeavoring to carry out Mr. Wells's recommendations with regard to the army and navy, but both of them find plenty of friends. It has come out in the discussion that we have as many engineers for forty steamers now in commission as France for three hundred and fifty! There is still talk of inflation, but not so much as there was. In business circles there is a general disposition to regard the anti-contraction bill as settling what the volume of the currency is to be for some time to come, and we have been assured on very good authority during the past week that the root of Western discontent is rather the scarcity of national banks in that region than a desire for expansion of the currency, properly so-called. People in the border States, however, who have "war claims" which they would like to have settled, and which amount to an enormous sum, naturally enough meet the Government plea of poverty by asking to have the mills set to work, and as much money manufactured as the case may require.

The House was edified on Tuesday by the communication to it of letters which had passed between General Grant and the President between the dates January 25 and February 3, the former having, of necessity, the last word. The correspondence grew out of a verbal order from Mr. Johnson that Grant should not obey Mr. Stanton's orders unless satisfied that they emanated from the President. The general wants this in writing, and, having got it, replies, January 30, that until Mr. Stanton's authority is officially impaired by his superior he shall continue to obey it as heretofore. Each party makes a long and mutually contradictory statement of former conversations, pledges, and understandings in regard to the possible reinstatement of Mr. Stanton. The President threatens to suspend Mr. Stanton again, and is charged with attempting to force Grant to violate laws which he himself does not dare to violate.

In the Eighth Congressional District of Ohio the Republicans have beaten their Democratic opponents, and returned General Beatty to Congress in place of Mr. Hamilton, recently killed by his insane son. General Beatty's majority is seven or eight times larger than that given for General Hayes last year in the gubernatorial election, although it is about one-half smaller than the majority obtained by Mr. Hamilton in 1866. Hereupon some Republican journals in ignorance of the facts of the case, and some, like the Tribune, for reasons which we do not care to talk about, inform their hearers that "the reaction" is all over, that the stout yeomanry, the intelligence, and other inhabitants of Ohio are once more "standing by Congress," "shaming the cowards," and so on. The melancholy truth of the matter, as stated neither by Democratic nor Republican papers, but by a sensible and truthful man, General Donn Piatt, living near the scene of the election, seems to be this: The district is a Republican one; the Democrats were not sensibly weakened by the defection of Mr. Vallandigham, whose egotism blinds him to the fact that his influence over the "unterrified cohorts" is great enough to call out three cheers and other admiration, but not to induce a mutiny in the ranks; the election was a special one, and it is the general election that brings out the full strength of parties; but the Democrats more nearly cast their full vote than the Republicans; the Republicans were filled with a life and enthusiasm with which the Hayes canvass did not inspire them, for General Beatty planted himself fairly and squarely on Pendleton and Butler's repudiation platform. This, General Piatt seems to say, was what gave him the election. The people, he says, "will not consent to see the indebtedness they hold, in the shape of greenbacks, depreciated while that of the bondholders is kept at par"—fine phrases which mean that the borrower will not pay because the man who lent him money is, in one particular, a little better off than himself. However, we are not discussing now repudiation, we are giving the facts in regard to "this first election of 1868," into which "Andrew Johnson and the slave power threw themselves with all their baleful energy," etc., etc.

Judge Field, of the Supreme Court, is under "enquiry" as to whether he made use at "a private gathering"—understood to be a dinner party—of language revealing his opinion, and that of the Supreme Court, that the Reconstruction acts were unconstitutional. Mr. Trumbull was justifiably warm, a few days ago in the Senate, in his denunciations of possible judges who might out of court express opinions on important and exciting questions which might afterwards come before them in their judicial capacity; but it is, nevertheless, questionable whether the evil, if it exists, will be cured by following judges to the dinner-tables of their friends and taking down every indiscreet word they may utter. The way to make judges discreet is to be careful in selecting them, and to exalt and honor their office. In other words, the judiciary is to be kept pure and dignified and reserved, it seems to us, rather by general influences than by special punishments. It is now the fashion to believe Congress omnipotent in fact as well as in theory, and to think that it can set the world to rights by bills and resolutions. But this is a bad fashion, and will pass away. We shall never secure good presidents by a lavish use of impeachment or any other legal penalty, but by raising the popular regard for knowledge, soberness, honesty, and dignity in politicians. We shall never make the judges what we want to have them by abusing them, holding them up to popular execration in debate, and legislating against them, and sending spies after them. It is an old and true saying, that they never respect themselves whom no one else respects; and a judiciary whom the people had learnt to despise would be one of the most repulsive bodies in the world.

"Historicus," in a letter to the London Times, explains the real nature of the "mixed jury" right by which the Fenian mind has been so troubled. He shows that the statute of Edward III., by which the right to such a jury was first bestowed on foreigners, specially excepted cases of treason, and no doubt would also be held to except cases of "treason-felony," the modified treason for which Fenians are generally tried. He does not say, but we believe he might say also, that the statute bestows the right simply on persons born out of the realm; and if so, Irishmen simply naturalized in America cannot claim it.

In England there are only two topics of interest—Fenianism and the distress amongst the working-classes in London. The accounts of the latter are appalling. We see Mr. H. C. Carey ascribes it to free trade, as if such things were unknown in the days of protection. Why not lay it at the door of primogeniture, or the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords? The real cause is the tremendous speculation of the last three years, in a country flooded with capital seeking investment and with knaves seeking dupes. It is also another illustration on a great scale of the evils of the system in which the working-classes play the part of mere tools, and have no voice or vote or judgment in directing or controlling the tendencies of trade or manufactures. Here are six hundred thousand people reduced to abject misery—they know not why or how—through the reckless gambling of a few hundred employers and capitalists. Famine, by the way, appears to be widespread. It is desolating Eastern Prussia, and in Algiers and Tunis the people are dying of it by the hundred, and are buried in trenches as on a battle-field. The American consul at Tunis reports to Mr. Seward that on the 27th of December two hundred persons died of hunger in the streets of that city, and that in his drives and walks he finds along the roadside the corpses of those who have perished from the same cause. Here the cause is bad harvests, though some may feel disposed to ascribe the scarcity to Mohammedanism. One of the charms of political and social speculation to many minds is that, as there is no social or political phenomenon which has not a number of causes, one can, if he is so minded, single out any one of them as the real cause, and make a very good fight for it, and make it do good service afterwards for some pet theory.

The Fenian business does not seem to make much progress, but the public mind is evidently becoming greatly cleared on Irish questions under its operation. The idea that Ireland may be and must be treated exactly as England is treated, which has been for thirty years the curse of Ireland—and which Mr. Wendell Phillips, with his usual want of good fortune when he draws his illustrations from history and foreign politics, seems to think is what the Irish are contending for—is being gradually given up, and the idea of different treatment and exceptional legislation is being accepted by the English public. The Queen's journal of her life in the Scotch Highlands has drawn from many of the newspapers the suggestion that if she had thought a little more of her responsibilities to the nation and a little less of domestic happiness, she would have perhaps done in Ireland what she did at Balmoral. She was enthusiastically received in 1849, and had she built a house at Killarney, lived there more or less, and done half as much to flatter the Irish as she did to flatter the Highlanders, she would have found amongst them loyalty no less devoted, and Fenianism would probably never have been heard of. Some settlement of the land question which will give the tenant greater fixity of tenure becomes more and more probable, but this subject of course cannot be discussed without exciting the wildest expectations amongst the peasantry. Considerable difficulty is already anticipated in the collection of the spring rents, and a general refusal to pay, such as that which marked the anti-tithe agitation in 1831, would create the most formidable difficulty with which the Government has yet had to deal. A whole people cannot be ejected or sold out.

Bishop Dupanloup has published another letter on the "Higher Education of Women," in which he reaffirms his former position very stoutly, and produces strong expressions of approval from about fifty prelates. That position was, as our readers may remember, that he is in favor of the higher education of women, but does not want anybody but priests to superintend it, which, as we hinted in reply to a Philadelphian correspondent a fortnight ago, is, in our minds, nearly the same thing as being opposed to it. He says that in Paris, if the girls attend the lectures of the professors at the Sorbonne, they will be seen by the students of the Quartier Latin; if in the country towns they go for a similar purpose to the Mairie, they will be seen by the pompiers (firemen); result—danger to modesty. He is, however, willing to have lectures delivered by professors in girls' schools, because then the professor is under the eye of the female teacher of the schools, and we know under whose eye the female teacher is. She prescribes, it appears, the subjects, and even the books, for the professor. In her absence, or if she is neglectful, which sometimes happens, says the bishop, why a professor has been known to read prayers standing, and to play with his papers and dust the table-cloth while he was doing it. Another actually selected "personal poetry" as his subject and Voltaire as his model, and another spoke to the girls on Rabelais! The bishop says, also, that girls who attend lectures in public will be "trained up in vanity," whereas, trained in private under the clerical superintendence, French women—girls, wives, and mothers—are "a type of purity, piety, and good sense such as no other people in the world possess." Unhappily, Frenchmen in general do not think so. The best Frenchmen agree with foreigners in considering the French "jeune fille" a very unsatisfactory person—a type which France would be the better of losing, and the Liberal press accordingly warmly applauds the ministerial plan of education, and wants to have the "girls, wives, and mothers" get their higher education from somebody else than the priests. There are some very amusing things in the controversy. In some of the new educational "cours" sanctioned by the minister for this "higher education" there are traces of Darwinism, such as undue reverence for the ape as the possible ancestor of the human family, and one philosopher speaks in a lofty French way of the belly having been the precursor of the brain in the order of human development, that is, of digestion having gone before thought. The bishop's feelings at having matter of this sort laid before "jeunes filles" may be imagined, but cannot be described. What he means by having women "think" and "study" is now tolerably clear.

The "woman question" continues to make its way on the Continent. It has appeared in Italy, and is the subject of two volumes just issued at Milan by Signora Mozzoni, who takes as radical ground in the matter as any member of our own women's rights missionaries. Speaking of that large class of Italian women who are still educated in convents, she says they carry from the convent "into family life that narrow, intolerant, superstitious, and retrograding spirit which, inoculated by affection into the natures of husbands and children, causes deplorable hindrance to the development of the nation."

The French Army bill has passed the lower Chamber without serious modification, but the bill regulating the relations of the Government to the press is still there, and is meeting with such serious opposition from the Liberals that there is talk of its being withdrawn. Singularly enough, however, the newspapers are in favor of its passage, inasmuch as, bad as it is, it is better than the present régime, the continuance of which, in the opinion of many editors, bids fair to put an end to everything worthy of the name of a press in France. At present the minister may be said to wield absolute power over the newspapers, and their proprietors hold their fortunes, and the writers their profession, at his mercy. We do not well see, however, how any bill is to mend their condition, as long as officers of the Government are not suable before a court of law for abuse of authority. At present, no matter of what illegality a government functionary may be guilty, he cannot be sued or prosecuted without the consent of the Council of State, which is, practically, never accorded.

Articles on any of the subjects usually discussed in this journal will be received from any quarter. If used, they will be liberally paid for; if rejected, they will be returned to the writers on the receipt of the requisite amount of postage stamps.

All Communications which pertain to the literary management of The Nation should be addressed to the Editor.

WHO ARE THE BONDHOLDERS?

The idea which some politicians are working hard to spread, and which has taken fast hold of the minds of a good many people in the West, and which we may be sure will find a warm reception in the South whenever the South is brought back into the Union, that the holders of the Government bonds form a separate and distinct class, divided in interest from the rest of the community, and living in idleness and luxury at its expense, and therefore deserving to be abased and regulated, was originated in the summer of 1866 by Mr. Johnson, then in the height of his fury against Congress. He first produced it in a conversation with the editor of the New York Citizen, who faithfully recorded the conversation in the columns of his paper. Mr. Johnson afterwards recurred to the subject more than once, and made a very bold allusion to it in the celebrated message in which he foreshadowed repudiation as one of the probable consequences of attempting to carry out the Congressional plan of reconstruction. This theory of the position and character of the public creditor excited a good deal of disgust at the time, and it was only prevented from exciting more by the then widespread perception of its absurdity. The rapid rise of the Democratic party since then, and the growing weakness of the Republicans on financial questions, have ended in strengthening and diffusing it to a degree of which Mr. Johnson probably never dreamt, and for which he certainly did not hope when he first concocted it. We are bound to say it was by far the most subtle and ingenious of his plans of attack on the legislature. He could not have devised in the interest of the South anything more likely to serve the purpose of the malcontents.

To understand how very effective this new weapon is or may become, we must remember that the issue of all wars now is mainly a question of money, that population is only a secondary element in military calculations. This was felt by everybody during the late struggle. Observers both at home and abroad watched the Southern finances and ours even more eagerly than they watched the military operations, and the result proved them right. Had the North not been so successful in borrowing, its armies could not have been kept together. If clothing, food, ammunition, arms, hospital stores, and wages had not been forthcoming in lavish abundance, from first to last, the Union would not to-day be in existence. If anybody doubts this, we invite him to go back in memory to the year 1863, and read the papers and correspondence, and ask Chief-Justice Chase how he felt about that time, and what his agents all over the country were saying. The Confederacy fell to pieces and its armies dissolved because it lost its credit and its money became worthless. It could not buy food and clothing for its men, and they deserted in regiments; it tried forced levies of supplies, but in a thinly-settled country this was found to be even a more worthless expedient for protracting an armed struggle than it has been found to be in rich and thickly-settled countries. We conquered, however, not simply because we were richer than the Confederacy, but because whenever the Government chose to ask for a loan, money flowed in torrents into the Treasury.

Now, who are the lenders? Great banking-houses in Boston, New York, and Philadelphia? Great foreign capitalists? No. It was from first to last a constant subject of patriotic rejoicing in the newspapers and on the platform that all United States loans were "popular loans," that they were the sum of the savings of the masses freely offered to the nation, not simply as a good investment, but as a proof of their affection. One favorite topic of loyal writers and orators in 1863—the history of this matter is important—was the fact that France and the United States were the only two countries which were able to make the people at large the creditors of the state; or, in other words, to place their finances as well as other things on a democratic basis. The newspapers recorded every day with pride the taking of one, two, or three millions of bonds, not by six or twelve or twenty persons, but by hundreds all over the country, and we were informed at the time that if the figures in possession of the Government in 1863, showing the way in which the bonds had been diffused amongst all classes and conditions of people, and in sums of all sizes, could have been used, they would have furnished perhaps the most curious and instructive of all illustrations of what was meant when the war was called a "people's war." At the present moment the registered bonds, which are generally issued in large denominations and represent more nearly than the coupon bonds the portion of the public debt held by capitalists or wealthy men, are but three-eighths of the value of the United States securities, or $890,874,850—the remaining five-eighths, or $1,551,593,700, being coupon bonds. Moreover, the denominations of the coupon bonds issued average $732, while those of the registered bonds average $1,360. In fact, the bonds have long formed a favorite investment of all the thriftiest, that is, most valuable, portion of the working-classes, because they possess over the savings-banks the advantage of not being taxed, and of being convertible at any moment. Most people who know anything of the habits of the more careful and intelligent mechanics, gardeners, farmers, and household servants, must, in fact, have been surprised to find how largely they hold Government securities.

The other classes who, as classes, are the largest investors in these securities, are the banks of loan and the savings-banks, and guardians and trustees. If any one maintains that it would be a useful thing to the community to break all the leading banks, or even to greatly impoverish them, we shall not argue with him, as our ideas of the nature and objects of human society and his ideas differ too widely to give us a chance of arguing. But the case of the savings-banks is worth attention, from the fact that their deposits are the savings of the poor, and if they be not sacred, nothing on earth is sacred. We are unfortunately unable at this moment to state the exact amount of these deposits which have been invested in United States securities, but we are able to state that it is very large. As long ago as 1862, the difficulty experienced by the managers of these institutions in finding investments for their funds had become very great, and when the Government loans were first offered they naturally turned to them eagerly. In Massachusetts, for instance, the savings institutions invested over $6,000,000 in Government securities in 1862; in 1863, they held $15,727,826 of them, and had taken them as collateral security for $2,586,267 more. We have no doubt the process has been going on steadily ever since. Now, let anybody try to picture to himself the full consequences of sudden and violent depreciation—even putting aside the danger of total loss—of a sum of even $19,000,000 in a single State, made up of the savings of poor people. Multiply this even by ten, and think what the result would be. We have little doubt, too, that if the figures could be got at, the sum invested by the trustees of orphans, widows, and minors in United States securities during the last five years, would be found to be enormous. We know very well that the Butlers and Pendletons and Thurmans tell us that they would inflate the currency, and pay off the bondholders in paper, so stealthily and gingerly that we should never know what they were at till all was over. But then not so many of us are simpletons as they seem to think. The greenbacks of a government which had led the world to believe that it would pay in gold, and then paid in paper, would bring about as much in the market as its bonds, and neither would bring much more than the Confederate money at the close of the late war. We should witness a rapid return to specie payments, but it would be by a short cut.

It ought not to be forgotten, too, that to the enemies of the Union, the believers in the right of secession, the most obnoxious and formidable feature of the Union is its credit. The power of raising and maintaining fleets and armies, and of borrowing money, are in reality the three things on which the national existence now rests. Destroy any one of them, and the Union is lost. Destroy the power of borrowing money, and you cannot raise and maintain fleets and armies in time of war, that is, when you most need them, and successful secession once more becomes a possibility. Every nation is nowadays dependent on its credit for its life, for no nation is capable of meeting out of its ordinary revenues the demands of a great war on the scale on which war is in our day carried on. Without credit, nationality, in fact, is not possible. Therefore, whether we strike out from the Constitution the clauses permitting Congress "to borrow money on the credit of the United States, to raise and support armies," and "to provide and maintain a navy," as all secessionists would be delighted to have done, or so treat the public creditor now that nobody will ever lend the Government money again, as the Butlers and Pendletons want to have us do, the result would be the same. The nation as a nation would cease to exist. Its life would be gone, and it would simply hold together till somebody chose to upset it, and the rising generation of Southerners would probably live to see what their fathers died in vain to bring about.

We have said a good deal from time to time on the moral aspect of this matter; but one can hardly say too much. There is no question which goes so nearly to the root of national character as the question of finance. Men will fight from pride and pugnacity, or in self-defence, but when they pay it is pretty sure to be because they are both wise and honest. Burke says—and it is one of the finest and truest things he ever said:

"The revenue of the state is the state. In effect, all depends on it, whether for support or for reformation. . . . As all great qualities of mind which operate in public, and are not merely suffering and passive, require force for their display—I had almost said for their unequivocal existence—the revenue, which is the spring of all power, becomes, in its administration, the sphere of every active virtue. . . . Through the revenue alone can the body politic ever act in its true genius and character, and therefore it will display just as much of its collective virtue, and as much of that virtue which may characterize those who move it, and are as it were its life and guiding principle, as it is possessed of a just revenue."

He elsewhere speaks of the condition of a nation's credit as one of the tests of its financial ability, and asks, with great point and force:

"Why should nations of commerce and economy enter into any pecuniary dealings with a people . . . amongst whom they see the debtor prescribing at the point of the bayonet the medium of his solvency to the creditor, and discharging one of his engagements with another, turning his penury into his resource, and paying his interest with his rags?"

Our Butlers and Pendletons have gone a step further, and propose to pay their principal with their rags also. If they succeed, it would be, perhaps, one of the greatest blows public morality has ever received. When a private individual borrows money, the creditor knows he can resort to a tribunal to enforce his claim, in case the debt is not paid, and he knows exactly what are the terms and conditions which the law requires to make his claim valid, and sees to it, therefore, that the transaction into which he enters meets them. When a nation borrows, however, it comes into the market solely on its honor. There is no court in which it can be sued and made to pay. The only security it can ever offer is the character of its people. No creditor, therefore, ever thinks of scanning closely the authority under which the national agents act in raising the money. Hundreds of millions have been invested in public securities all over the world by persons who know nothing of the law of the country which borrows, or of its mode of construing its legislative acts. They know perfectly well that if it wants to cheat them it can do so, and therefore care nothing whether they are cheated through "the letter of the law" or open repudiation. There is, therefore, something impudent as well as comic in showing acts of Congress to our creditors, and informing them that under our "rules of construction" no bond is payable in gold in which no mention is made of gold. The only rule of construction of which they know anything is that by which the voluntary promises of honorable men in private life are explained. The only undertaking on which they rely is that given by the agents who took the money, and whom we allowed to go on for three years promising gold, without one word of warning or remonstrance. The people of California showed, a few years ago, that they justly appreciated the moral position of a community which borrows, when, after the Supreme Court had pronounced a State loan unconstitutional, they at once acknowledged it by a popular vote. We are glad they had an opportunity of doing this, because there is in every solemn and public acknowledgment of the supremacy of the moral law, of the superiority of honor and good faith to money and comfort, not simply the foundation of great national traditions, but an instrument of political education for the young such as neither schools nor books nor speeches can ever supply.

THE "JUDICIOUS" IN JOURNALISM.

We occasionally still receive letters—we have one before us now—from friendly readers, suggesting to us the impolicy or injudiciousness of opposing the recent measures of Congress, though we may be never so well persuaded in our own minds of their unsoundness or inexpediency, on the old ground of the danger of weakening the party which, with all its faults, is the only party from which we can at present expect either justice or fair dealing in the matter of reconstruction. In replying to criticism of this kind we have, of necessity, to repeat some arguments with which we have already made our readers more or less familiar, but as they are the arguments which really justify all attempts at independent journalism, they can hardly be too often produced.

The reason why we believe in and resort constantly to what "practical" politicians consider "injudicious criticism" is, that we do not share their faith in the value of acts of the legislature unless those acts are the product of the sober second thought of the public; unless the people has pronounced upon them a matured and carefully formed judgment. Every party has certain principles which it desires to see triumph, and which it is the object of its existence to make triumph; and politicians, naturally enough, are in the habit of considering the embodiment of their ideas in legislation as a full and complete victory. When a hard-working agitator has passed half his lifetime in speaking and writing in defence of certain theories of governmental duty, he comes to look on an act of the legislature as the goal of his ambition and the seal of his work. If he can only secure that, he thinks all is over and he may rest from his labors; and he is therefore, perhaps, not very scrupulous or very particular as to how it is to be brought about. The most scrupulous politicians and reformers amongst us do not often give themselves the trouble to see whether the public has kept up with them in their advance; if they can secure a majority of the legislature for the time being, the position of the public strikes them as a matter of minor importance.

It is at this point that we part company with "practical" men. We think what the legislature does, in a popular government, of comparatively little moment; what the people thinks, of comparatively great moment. We believe the passage of acts which the public has not considered, or does not understand, or does not approve of, to be almost child's play. We consider the "rushing" of bills through Congress by surprise or under the gag, and without reference to the condition of popular feeling and popular thought about them, or to their probable effect on popular feeling and popular thought after they have gone into operation, to be worse than child's play—simple mischief. The idea from which we have suffered and are suffering so much, that if you can only get a certain law passed your object will be accomplished, is an idea drawn from aristocratic societies, and has neither use nor application in this. In aristocracies the opinions of but few men are expressed in legislation; and they are generally maturely weighed, and form part of a deliberately framed policy before they are embodied in legislation. The acts in which they are clothed are, therefore, likely to stand, and do stand, and often work important social changes, no matter how unwise they may be, or what the people think of them. But in a democracy there is no use in legislating in advance of the popular sentiment. The legislator may be a better man than his fellows, and he may seem to have a splendid opportunity of setting the world to rights, and it may be that he is only trying to enforce some principle to which, though the people may not be prepared for it yet, they will one day work up. But he will, under such circumstances, not only not help the cause he has at heart, but hinder it, if he seeks to base his legislation on his own ideas of right, and not on firm, popular conviction.

If there is one thing which experience is teaching modern nations more thoroughly than another, it is the comparative worthlessness of all political arrangements on paper, whether constitutions, treaties, or legislative acts. The mere fact that they are laws, passed and recorded with the proper formalities, seems to secure for them neither durableness nor authority. Of all the treaties which have been made between civilized nations since 1800, not one has the least force except what it draws from the support and approval of public opinion at the present day. The treaties of 1815 were supposed to have made the settlement of Europe arranged in that year perpetual. They began to be rent in pieces fifteen years later, and now not a shred remains. The treaty of Paris was supposed to have driven Russia out of the Black Sea and settled the "Eastern question." What is the treaty worth to-day?

Forty years ago, about the time when the British and American Constitutions were furnishing models for "charters" to such of the other nations of the earth as longed for constitutional government, there was a widespread belief amongst politicians that if you only gave a country a well-drawn constitution, properly engrossed, attested, and sworn to, its happiness was sure. France, Greece, Belgium, and the Spanish-American republics all sought this short and easy road to liberty and prosperity. During the anti-slavery struggle in this country, each side flattered itself that if it could only procure the embodiment of its views in an act of Congress or in a judicial decision, the struggle would be over. When the Ordinance of 1789 was passed, the Northwest was supposed to be thenceforward secured to freedom. When the Missouri Compromise was made, the conflict between the rival systems of labor was believed by the authors of the measure and by a large portion of the public to be at an end. The Fugitive Slave Law was looked on as another great quieter of controversy; but none of them could compare to the Dred Scott decision. We all remember the shouts of triumph that came from conservative throats as that was hurled at the heads of the Republican party. There it was, duly rendered in a full court on final appeal, with reasons given, and every form complied with; what was there left for the abolitionists to do but submit and be silent? Where are all these "settlements" now? The temperance reformers all over the North have for many years been fully satisfied that if they could only get drinking prohibited by law they would confer one of the greatest of benefits on the community, and they were ready and willing to have the law passed in any way—by stratagem, by surprise, in a fit of excitement or enthusiasm. The great thing was to make drinking illegal; this done, no matter what the moderate drinker said or felt, the good cause was triumphant. We all know what the end of these efforts has been.

In fact, the mere passing of an act in a democracy, if it is not the expression of the popular will—and by this we mean the popular will formed by calm reflection, by time, and by a fair consideration of all the arguments for and against the proposed measure—may be said to be not only worthless, but injurious, because it leads to that incessant unrest and uncertainty, that want of fixity in policy, want of respect for vested rights, and that constant doing and undoing, which are every year more and more the characteristics and curses of our legislation, both Congressional and State. Measures that are pushed through in haste, before the legislators or their constituents have considered them, are naturally liable to be repealed when they have considered them; what Congressmen do without knowing what their constituents think about it, they naturally have to undo as soon as they find out what their constituents do think about it. Look at the internal revenue; look at the tariffs of the last six years; look at the four Reconstruction bills and the three Supreme Court bills, counting as the first Mr. Boutwell's sage proposal to restore Southern confidence in the Federal courts by excluding from practice in them every man who had aided or abetted in the rebellion—that is, the whole Southern bar. Not one of them was half enough discussed; about none of them has any intelligent public opinion been formed or expressed. It is only now that people begin to perceive and talk about their defects. Not one of them has brought the millennium, has restored public confidence and prosperity, and nothing will ever do so which the people have not knowingly and calmly, not in excitement or fever, stamped with their approval.

Now, how is this enlightened popular judgment to be formed? Not by the debates in Congress. Congress has apparently abandoned all pretence of influencing public opinion through its debates. The majority has now for some years apparently acted on the theory that it is not a deliberative body at all, and that discussion is a waste of time. Legislation is conceived in secret committees, and, when produced, hurried through both houses under whip and spur. The talking is mostly done on Saturday, and on that day, of course, the great aim of the speakers seems to be to avoid topics of real interest. On important legal and constitutional questions, such as the neutrality laws, the Reconstruction bills, the Supreme Court bills, the expatriation question, the country ought to hear its ablest jurists and politicians at full length before anything is done. Does it hear them? Not at all. The framing of the public policy on all these questions is left in the hands of men like Messrs. Stevens and Banks, who neither by nature nor by education possess the least fitness to deal with them. The "jurists" remain silent, and, when the vote is taken, go dumb and blind in favor of whatever the politicians decide that the interests of the party require.

The formation of public opinion is, in fact, left entirely to the press. From the newspapers people have to learn all they need to know in order to make up their mind about every question that comes up. If the newspapers only present to them one side of it, as is generally the case, of course a "snap judgment" may be taken, and an appearance of popular approval be secured for the time being for anything the "leaders" like to bring forward. But the public does not remain long content with this half-knowledge. The question is gradually turned round, and the other side is revealed either by reflection or by the supply of fresh light or by actual experiment in legislation. Then come distrust, dissatisfaction, disgust, and reaction. The "leaders" find themselves discarded, and avenge themselves by a loud beating of tom-toms, by calling the deserters "cowards" and renegades, and by swearing that they will not yield an inch, when everybody has ceased to care whether they yield or not.

The press, too, has been shamefully ready to play the part of priest or soothsayer for the Congressional gods. The newspaper politician generally serves the party by treating the people as imbeciles or children. He professes to look on them as the very fountain of wisdom as well as of power and honor, and to regard their decisions as conclusive both in law and morals. But, nevertheless, if you propose to him to tell them the whole truth, to present them with all sides of a subject before asking for their decision, he asks if you are mad. Consequently he devotes himself body and soul to the task of deceiving and humbugging them. He conceals carefully all facts that he thinks likely to depress them; makes the most of all facts and stories that seem likely to elate them; hurrahs vociferously, and pretends to be in high spirits when he is beginning to feel sure of defeat; when the question is one of law, prates incessantly about "justice" and "the rights of man;" and when the question is one of morals, takes his stand firmly on the letter of the law. We ask any reader to peruse carefully the editorial articles of any party paper within his reach during any exciting political crisis, and particularly before and after an election, and then say whether this picture is overdrawn, and whether there is not something comically absurd in politicians of this stamp pretending to have faith in the people.

One other office they fill, which is, perhaps, most degrading of all, and that is the office of yelling with admiration whenever a leading man of their own way of thinking makes a speech or brings in a bill. The appearance of a second Moses with the tables of the law in his hands could hardly produce greater uproar and more unqualified submission and assent in a tribe of barbarians than the production of a bill by a party committee, or the support of it by a prominent member of either House, produces amongst a very large number of the "moulders of public opinion" in this the most advanced political community in the world. We know of nothing so nearly resembling the part they play as that of the claqueurs in the French theatres. And yet the rôle of the claqueurs is the more respectable of the two, for the claqueur makes no pretence of "thinking" or "criticising." He simply applauds on a given signal; he has not the impudence to get up and try to justify his applause by argument, and by pretending that he is a disinterested looker-on. And what is the reward of all these base compliances? Why, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred the privilege of recommending a few broken-down adventurers and "ne'er-do-weels" to small places in the custom-house or post-office, and an occasional gushing letter of thanks from a "grand public man."

We are glad to say, however, that every day a larger and larger portion of the press is becoming disgusted with these odious functions, and will not perform them. In every State there are papers now found whose editors are filled with a nobler ambition than that of being party hacks, and who devote themselves steadily to the task which Congress has abandoned, but which somebody in a free country must, if it is to remain free, perform—that of speaking out their whole mind on every question that comes up; of bringing before the public as arbiter all facts and all arguments, the pleasant and unpleasant, favorable and unfavorable; of doing what in them lies so to order things that when the people vote they shall vote with knowledge, and that in exciting times passion shall not be allowed to darken counsel.

ARIADNE'S FAREWELL.

THE daughter of a King, how should I know
That there were tinsels wearing face of gold,
And worthless glass which in the sunlight's hold
Could shameless answer back my diamond's glow
With cheat of kindred fire? The currents slow,
And deep, and strong, and stainless, which had rolled Through royal veins for ages, what had told
To them, that hasty heat and lie could show
As quick and warm a red as theirs?
Go free!
The sun is breaking on the sea's blue shield
His golden lances; by their gleam I see Thy ship's white sails. Go free, if scorn can yield Thee freedom!
Then, alone, my love and I—
We both are royal; we know how to die.

H. H.

TWO GIRLS.

WE mean the girl of thirty years ago and the girl of to-day. Our fathers respected, loved, and married the one; and we, it is to be hoped, respect, ove, and will marry the other. Which is the luckiest man—he of the last generation, or he of this?

The American girl of thirty years ago was not a precise image of the young women who came over in the Mayflower, but, compared with her more worldly and showy successor, she deserved the title of "a Puritan maiden." Not only did she always "belong to the Church," but she held that it would be wicked to marry an "unbeliever," and she seldom thus "made shipwreck of the faith." Religious exercises occupied a large portion of her time; she went to church thrice a Sunday, and to weekly prayer-meetings every Wednesday evening; she attended a serious sewing society, taught a Bible-class, and sometimes distributed tracts; she was accused of finding something like amusement in these things. She would not have a lottery at a fair, nor would she dance at a party. If there crept into her circle a "worldly man," wearing whiskers, irregular at "divine service," and concerning whom old ladies whispered, she felt no hankering after his society, or, if she did, she fought it as a temptation. "Men about town" had as poor a chance in America at that period as in Turkey.

The girl of thirty years ago was a "home body." Although not enslaved to domestic cares like her mother, and far from willing to wash and iron like her grandmother, she still had a habit of "pottering about the house," idling there if not laboring. Walking the streets and fields, unfortunately for her digestion, had not yet been invented for ladies. Horseback exercise was almost unknown because there were no men of leisure for cavaliers. She may have visited New York once, but she had never dreamed of going to Europe. Except when called out by church, or by a rare Sabbath-school celebration, or an equally rare sleigh-ride or party, she seldom left home for any other purpose than to chat with her one female confidante. Barring Turkish and Brazilian women, and cats, there never was a more domestic creature.

Incredible as it may seem, the girl of other days was usually dressed in calico or mousseline de laine, cut by herself possibly, made by herself probably, and with small variety and no luxury of trimmings. Changes in the material and even in the form were so rare that the feminine soul had intervals of peace. There were "baby waists" and there were "pointed waists;" but once this or that fashion established, it stayed until men loved it as an old friend; it shone with a steady beam, and not with a bewildering sputter of various scintillation. Thus plainly and permanently attired, this dear departed had time to think of other things than fashion plates.

How was her intellect vestured? That, too, was in simple garb—a fair English education and nothing further; no more likelihood of a foreign language than of a lace shawl. If she had perchance a piano, she played badly upon it; and the music which she executed—"Timour the Tartar" and the "Battle of Prague"—was vile enough to deserve her severe usage. Her miscellaneous reading was not entirely commendable; for the female mind seldom relishes "Plutarch's Lives," "Rollin's Ancient History," and such other solid old works as lorded it in the libraries of that time; and, quitting these, the next literary food attainable was apt to be trash of the weakest sort. In place of "The Newcomes" there was "Thaddeus of Warsaw," and in place of the Atlantic there were no one knows what extinct Lady's Books. But it must be remembered that this inanity was qualified by infusions of "Scott's Commentaries," the "Pilgrim's Progress," Baxter's "Saint's Rest," "The Life of James Brainard," the Missionary Herald, and other similar moral nourishment. Moreover, if she at times read trash, it was simply weak, not vicious. It might be Miss Bacon's "Tales of the Puritans" or Mrs. Sigourney's "Poems," but it was not "Guy Livingstone" nor "Laus Veneris."

Thus equipped to enter the staid social tournaments of the day, her conversation was considered brilliant, and would now be voted slow. The "ologies" which she studied at school were so ill-learned that they did not make her instructive, and, if our memory serves us in the matter, were so quickly forgotten as not even to make her tedious. Unenlightened by the fashionable newspaper, and rarely permitted to hear the gossip of metropolitan fine society, she was deficient in what now passes among ladies for knowledge of the world, and was at her wit's end to entertain a beau who came from a distance. To put her quite at her ease, you must be of her town and talk of her townspeople. She was given to quoting the opinions of her mother and the sermons of her parish clergyman. She spoke of Europe and all that came from it with a moral blush, as nice people now allude to a Turkish harem or Brigham Young's establishment. In short, she was not a worldly-wise woman; nor, unless nature had done much for her, a brilliant converser; nor, judging her from the European stand-point, a queen of fashion. But she was good enough for the men of that day; and it is an interesting question whether she was not good enough for the men of our day; whether she would not be accepted by them as an improvement on her more dashing successor. Her solid and devout moral education, mixed with only a spice of evanescent sentimentalism, obliged her to accept household cares and labors and economies as duties. Her home-haunting habits and lack of acquaintance with social splendors made her willing to devote herself to husband and children. She had almost no ambitions separate from the interests of her household, and she never thought of dressing for any man but her husband. There never was in any community a staider and more virtuous life than that which she led and enforced. If her sympathies were narrow, none of them were dangerous. If her social information was restricted, it contained few facts which might be temptations. If she had little faculty for dazzling a multitude, she was the more likely to exist solely for one. Her very incompleteness as a member of "society" made her more essentially a member of the family.

And oh! ye taxed fathers and husbands of the present day, how little she cost! Looking back upon her from our era of exquisite but expensive luxuries, she seems like one of those plain, wholesome, nourishing dishes which have been so gratefully eulogized as "wery fillin' at the price." It is safe to say that the girl of thirty years ago was four times as cheap by the pound as the girl of to-day; and we have little less hesitation in asserting that she was twice as cheap, allowing for the increase of incomes. In other words, the daughter or wife of this generation is pecuniarily a two-fold heavier load than was the daughter or wife of the last. Do you doubt it? We know that it cannot be proved; we admit that our statement is not founded upon statistics, but upon a great vague groaning of common rumor; and we even invite attention to the fact that, if it is exaggerated then this article has no sufficient reason for existence.

Now, what have we gained at this immensely increased cost of production? It has already been hinted that the gain lies in particulars which tend to the splendor and amusement of society rather than in such as make the family an easy and stable success. Please to do yourself the honor and pleasure of taking a look at the American girl of to-day. For the sake of getting an average we will not go to New York for her, but to one of our smaller cities. She is handsomer than her predecessor; there is little rational doubt of that. She does not lace, nor drink vinegar to make herself pale, nor pass weeks without exercise; and these concessions to common sense have been rewarded by finer health, figure, and color than were common thirty years ago. Further, she has a more various expression in her face, more culture in her manner, and carries herself better. On the whole, still speaking of her in the average, she is the most perfect specimen of delicate female beauty in the world. Her temper is good, her purity of character is beautiful, and her piety only requires favorable surroundings. What we mean to say is, that while she is a very excellent girl, she is not the "Puritan maiden" of other days, not even in her own imagination.

Her education is superficial, but it is broad and fits her for society. It is a fair chance that she reads a little French or German, that she can make out what is going on in Italian opera, and that, if her father is a college professor, she knows Greek and Latin. She despises "Thaddeus of Warsaw" and the Lady's Books; her novels and magazines are of the best that Anglo-Saxondom affords; she has taste, and is even a critic. You will find her able to talk about Hugh Miller and possibly about Darwin. You will see, if you seat her at the piano, that she plays passably, and that at events she has no poor music. But if there is one thing that she does well it is dressing. Ah! here is her forte; here is her mission. To this æsthetic solemnity she has given meditations of which men know neither the anxiety nor the gladness. When you have seen her pensive and judged her in love, she was thinking of trimmings. A good talker, a good letter-writer, something of a student, something perhaps of an artist, clever to a limited extent in many things, she is above all a dandy.

Yes, our average woman is a clothes-worshipper; and what is bad, she worships without taste, believing that her raiment is handsomer than herself; and what is worse, she worships without prudence, not measuring outgoes by income. This last is her greatest fault, and we will not allow that it is a little one. We will pass over the facts that dandyism is unintellectual and selfish; that it makes a woman a less intelligent companion and a less considerate wife; that it wastes a great deal of time. The pecuniary point of view shall be the stump from which we will deliver our philippic. We tell the American girl that she costs more than we can afford, even if she does not cost more than she is worth. It is out of point for her to say: "You are spendthrifts." We earn; that makes a vast difference; we are producers and you are not. If you have any duty in this matter of income and outgo, it must surely be that of economy; and we may fairly claim of you that you should seek to repress our extravagance, rather than let your own outrun it.

"But you should look at this question from our point of view," interrupts a cultivated soprano voice. "You should consider that it is very pleasant for us to dress handsomely, to have fine surroundings, and to hear ourselves called brilliant." Madam, all that must be very pleasant, and it is also proper that it should be pleasant. If the thing could be kept up, we should like to put every woman in an ivory palace, clothe her in all that her imagination could desire, and let her devote her entire life to being fascinating. Nothing but the certainty of bankruptcy prevents us from carrying out this idea, and nothing but the fear of it induces us to growl at our present family burden. You must admit, madam, that it is an unusually heavy one. Remember that in Europe only the married lady goes in society, and, thirty years ago, in America, only the girl. Here and now you go with your daughters, and you seek to out-belle each other. Remember, too, that there are consequences to this extravagance of parade which concern not only us but our children. Let us glance at them.

A nation of old maids and old bachelors would not probably be powerful, and certainly would not be permanent. We shall not, of course, reach the fulness of that ridiculous upshot, but we are coming nearer to it than is good for individual morals or for national vigor. While the fathers and husbands of the present generation are running their race bravely, the young men who should succeed them are not entering the lists in the good old fashion. "I can't afford a wife," is the cry of hundreds of thousands of our youth; and presently necessity drives them to the lamentable calculation that they can afford a substitute. If any one thinks that this is not serious, let him remember that the demoralization of one sex ensures that of the other, and then let him pray for the women that are to be.

But man is aware of woman's ways, and yet permits them. Yes, the American girl's profusion is only a part of the national profusion; it is only one of the various ways in which democracy seeks to level upward; it is mediocrity striving to be as fine as wealth. Woman is everywhere what man makes her, or at least allows her to be. Since, then, we lords of creation are responsible for this evil of over-expense in pin-money, what remedy shall we suggest, and what reformation inaugurate? Shall we, while consuming our usual allowance of cigars and sherry, retrench our daughters' ribbons and sacrifice our wives' crinolines? We have not the heart to be thus shabby; nor have we the head to set a confirmed example of economy. What then?

"There is no help for it," says one profound philosopher, "except in increased moral and intellectual culture; we must teach woman to respect herself for herself, and not for her clothing and other accessories." Good and great being, will it please you to teach us men that beautiful lesson? We admit that certain individuals, specially favored with the reverences of the world, seem to have learned it. A distinguished savant or author or artist knows that he is respectable on two thousand a year; but does that prevent the grocer from seeking to be magnificent in order that he may hold up his head with the shipper? Even among the so-called aristocrats of Europe, grand and self-respectful for a thousand years back, is there no ruinous ostentation? Is there none among the pillars of our churches?

We propose two remedies, the dowry and woman's labor. No expensive, elegant, aristocratic society has ever existed long without the dowry. It is an institution of justice, for whereas it is the wife who chiefly insists upon "style," she ought to furnish a portion of the expense which style demands. It is an institution of economy, for a woman is less likely to waste a sum of money which is hers and of which she knows the exact measure, than money which flows daily into her hands from sources beyond her estimation. The very fact that a wife owns nothing leads her to be extravagant. You cannot make a human being forethoughted and frugal as long as you assign to him or her the financial status of a slave.

Look at the history and influence of the dowry in a respectable family of continental Europe. From the moment that a girl enters the world the father and mother have it on their minds to provide her with a marriage settlement, knowing that without it she will not easily find a husband. "Horrible!" you exclaim. Oh! it is so easy to be horrified at other people's customs! But is there nothing admirable in the affectionate tenacity with which this purpose is kept in view and in the wise economy by which it is effected? Is there nothing agreeable, however singular, in the spectacle of a girl contented with one silk dress and practised in a thousand little expedients of frugality? She submits willingly to this simplicity of attire because it is for her own future benefit and because it is the fashion of a society which we think so unnatural. Nor does she as a rule plunge into a reaction of extravagance after marriage. Prodigality tyrannizes at Compiègne, under the silly sway of an Empress who has cost the world more by her dandyism than her husband by his armies; but it does not seriously affect that vast, shrewd, sensible bourgeoisie which constitutes the strength of France; it does not demoralize French grocers, tailors, and lawyers. The young wife has more style than the young girl, but she furnishes a portion of it out of the savings of her childhood, and she does not often ruin her husband. So much, briefly, for the moral and pecuniary benefit of the dowry.

Secondly, we advise that, if woman will not save, she shall work; that she shall be more like a pillar of society, and less like an ornamental entablature; that she shall be more like a sailor, or captain if she will, and less like a passenger. Considering the expenses of a family, the probability that they will increase instead of diminishing, and the steady decline in the proportion of marriages to the population, a girl's education now ought to be based on the supposition that she will never have a husband and that she may have to support herself. The contrary will undoubtedly be the rule, but surely we ought to provide for the frequent exception. Here we are checked by a voice which calls upon us to state precisely what things woman is to do, and to describe how she is to enter upon the doing. "I wish to work," says the speaker; "only show me where and how."

The task thus allotted is too much for the wisdom of one man, or even for the wisdom of millions of men in one year. The resolute attention of society during this generation will no more than suffice, and perhaps may not suffice, to discover how woman can be inducted into such new methods of labor as will make her so far self-supporting as may be requisite. One thing, however, we know: the first practical point in this matter is, not the way, but the will; the first necessity is a sound public opinion. American democracy already holds that industry and economy are gentlemanly; it must go further and pronounce that they are ladylike. When it shall have become the national creed that it is just as honorable for a woman to earn a living as for a man, all this trouble about the "where" and the "how" will shrink as if by magic from a giant to a dwarf. It will not then be incumbent on essayists to say to one lady, "You can be an editor;" to another, "You can stand behind your husband's counter;" to another, "You can keep your father's books." The needs and opportunities of life will make these suggestions, and women will receive them as they are now received by men.

Something of this has already begun to be. There are girls who have become printers, clerks, and book-keepers; there are wives who manage post-offices, and perform other public duties; there are mercantile colleges open to both sexes. The age is not only oratorical concerning woman's right to vote, but to some small extent practical concerning her far more important right to earn a living. For "right" let us say "duty," and the millennium will be nearer.

"But—" says Mr. Potiphar; and we hasten to interrupt him. We do not mean your wife, sir; we know that you have thirty thousand a year, and that Mrs. P. has no need to "clerk it;" we only demand of her that your yearly expenses shall not be thirty-one thousand. But suppose you should fail? Would it not then be nice to have the half-dozen women of your family able to clerk it, or at least to make their own dresses? It might save you from forging a note or blowing out your brains.

But we cannot enter upon objections. To state such as are obvious would require a volume, and to answer them would require another. Will it not suffice for the present to note that human action is usually but a succession of choosings betwixt two evils, and that when one evil has become intolerable, it is the highest sanity to leap somewhither, if only to the chance of a smaller one?

It is the belief of certain well-meaning men who were not born in Constantinople that, if the American girl were called on to meet a proportion of her expenses by her own labor, she would be publicly a greater blessing, and personally healthier, wiser, and happier. It is even believed that her outlay, instead of increasing, would diminish. Practised in the mystery of keeping accounts, aware by experience of the difficulty of earning money, she would become clever enough to save it. With something to do, she would put less mind, time, and purse into the pursuit of pleasure. Mated at last with a poor man (so many are incorrigibly vicious that way!), she would share his burden rather than crush him with it. If all women now were thus, we should have no cause to cry, as we are sometimes tempted to do, Oh! for the slow but cheap girl of thirty years since! Whether democracy is capable of some such self-saving miracle as we have indicated remains to be seen.

ENGLAND.

LONDON, January 17, 1868.

THE latest literary sensation has been caused by the appearance of a new book by the Queen. It is simply a collection of a few diaries which make no claim to literary merit, and derive their only interest from their authorship. They are, therefore, as much outside the province of legitimate criticism as if the Queen had published a list of her wardrobe or the bill of fare of the dinners at Windsor Castle. They are a private record, written obviously for her own eye, of sundry small excursions, chiefly in Scotland. The most exciting anecdote which I discovered in a cursory inspection of the pages was that the Princess Royal once sat down on a wasp's nest, but was fortunately rescued by the attendants without much injury. The manner in which the book has been received is, therefore, of more interest than the intrinsic merits of the book itself. The public was so anxious to buy it that, although ten thousand copies had been printed, the day of publication had to be postponed for a fortnight. The newspapers have all written what are called reviews; that is to say, the most animated panegyrics they could put together. The Spectator, for example, became quite gushing about that incident of the wasp's nest; it declared that in thousands of British families next season the children would be encouraged by the mothers to emulate the fortitude of the Princess Royal, though, as it admitted, her Majesty tells the fact quite simply without saying that the Princess displayed fortitude or the reverse. But the eye of faith supplies such little details for itself. It is an inexpressibly ennobling thought that princesses, like ordinary flesh and blood, are accessible to the stings of wasps, and that a recollection that princesses have sat upon wasps' nests will stimulate the heroic ardor that beats in the infant bosoms of Great Britain. I must leave to others the question whether this intense interest in the smallest external details of royalty is a greater proof of snobbishness or of an ennobling loyalty. Probably the decision would depend upon whether the homage is rendered chiefly to the Queen's position or to the respect which every one most deservedly feels for her character. I confess that, to my taste, the enthusiasm excited savors more of the sentiment with which a valet is supposed to regard a hero than of a nobler emotion; and I rather regret that Mr. Arthur Helps should have succeeded in persuading her Majesty (as the preface informs us) into publishing a book calculated to gratify that variety of hero-worship. However, nothing can be said of the Queen's domestic life which is not to her honor, and, in some degree, the volume may tend to strengthen the respect which is grounded upon the general appreciation of that fact.

From the other end of the world we receive accounts of the enthusiasm with which the Duke of Edinburgh has been received in Australia. I know not how many people thronged the streets of Melbourne to welcome him upon his arrival. Infinite addresses were delivered; ladies sat for hours to look at the Queen's son; and black fellows danced corobbories—whatever that may mean—in honor of his arrival. It is difficult to appreciate the precise value of English loyalty; it is still more perplexing to guess at the value of that commodity in the colonies. One thing is plain, that no people ever had such unequivocal reasons for faithfulness to an imperial government. Their connection with us now involves the most one-sided of bargains. We pay their army and navy, and protect them against external dangers, if any such exist. We have ceased to discharge upon them any of our criminal population; the last ship-load of convicts was sent to Western Australia a month or two ago, and we have promised never to send them any more. They arrange their own affairs precisely as they please, and put on protective duties against our manufactures. In return, they lose the inestimable advantages of a presidential election, and have the honor of paying a governor sent out from England. Now, if men are discontented with having everything their own way, and many responsibilities of national existence taken off their hands, they must be hard to please indeed. It would, of course, be chimerical, in the highest degree, to suppose that the relation between England and Australia can be permanent. Some time or other we must expect to see them setting up for themselves, in name as well as in fact; for in most essentials they are already as independent as many thousand miles of salt water can make them. Every one must wish, however, that the separation may be peaceable when it comes, and not leave behind it such bitter feeling as was caused by a more important severance. We have, I hope, learnt wisdom since the days of George III. and Lord North. In fact, the only danger arises from our disposition to fancy that a merely nominal tie has more meaning than should really be attached, and to look for some more substantial tribute than that of general good-will and friendly feeling. In the case of Australia, I think there is little danger of any serious misunderstanding; for that question is fortunately beyond the reach of complication from jealousies between ourselves and any third party. We can manage our little troubles en famille; and there is enough friendliness on both sides to encourage the hope that when the time for severance comes it will be satisfactorily arranged.

Whilst I am upon colonies, I may notice that another complication has arisen in the Colenso affair. After a great deal of trouble, it is announced that a clergyman has at last been found to go out and put himself in competition as a second Bishop of Natal. That is, we are going to have the spectacle of a small schism in South Africa. Dr. Colenso is undoubtedly bishop according to the laws of the Church of England, considered as a state church; nor has any real attempt been made to turn him out. On the other hand, the new bishop will have some claim which it passes my theological knowledge to define accurately. In some way or other the mass of clergy have, I suppose, convinced themselves that he will be the representative of the true Apostolical succession, although, even from that point of view, I do not understand that Dr. Colenso has been deposed after any constitutional fashion. It is a very pretty quarrel, and I must confess that since it has lost itself in mysterious legal labyrinths, it has passed entirely beyond my comprehension. One thing alone is plain: whatever may be its theological significance, it indicates the approaching conflict between the two theories of a state church and a church resting on divine right. What the end of it may be in the small colony of Natal, I know not; but it is a symptom of a struggle which must, before many years are over, be exemplified on a larger scale in England. The battle of the Ritualists, now being fought in the law courts, is the commencement of operations. Where and how they will terminate requires the foresight of a prophet. A blue-book which has lately been published by the commissioners appointed to enquire into Ritualist practices contains some curious information as to the theories of the party. One of their leaders, Mr. Bennett, of Frome, propounds his view of the case in very plain terms. He declares that any interference of the state in such matters is sacrilege. Now, as the Church of England is, as a matter of fact, the creature of the state, as its tenets and discipline are strictly defined by act of Parliament, and as its courts will decide all questions brought before them on the ground of the absolute supremacy of Parliament, it is very clear that a sect which holds such opinions must find themselves in a logically unbearable position. It is a curious result that in this they fall in precisely with the views of the party most diametrically opposed to them—with the followers of Comte, for example, or with extreme radicals of every shade of opinion. Placed between two fires, that singular compromise, the Church of England, is beginning to feel the awkwardness of its position. It has not, however, yet come to the arena of active politics, and, indeed, Mr. Bennett appears to be the extreme leader of his party, and the other witnesses shrink from taking up the position into which he has instinctively drifted. Most of them continue to justify their practices by the authority of Parliament or the Privy Council, and have, therefore, not cut themselves loose from the ties which he finds insupportable.

Home topics are for the moment tolerably quiescent. A great education conference is being held at Manchester for the purpose of forcing upon Parliament some measure of compulsory education. I have reason to know that Government will make a bid for the lead in this most important question by introducing some considerable measure of its own, though I have no guess as to how far it is likely to go. Every one must wish that they may be able to help the question forward as decidedly as in the last session they advanced the cause of reform. Upon this topic I have lately said enough, and will not for the present refer to it more fully. Perhaps another branch of the question may be interesting to your readers. A great move has lately been made in the North of England in favor of an improvement in female education. The University of Cambridge took the first step by admitting girls to what is called the "non-general" examinations—that is, to examinations of persons not members of the university. These examinations have been a great success, and the girls have so far distinguished themselves. It is remarked that they have done particularly well in the mathematical papers, and, for example, have shown a much greater sense of logic in writing out propositions of Euclid than the boys. Is is now proposed to organize more thoroughly a scheme for examining and giving to the successful candidates certificates, which would be of the highest value for governesses and teachers in schools. It is proposed still further to form a ladies' university, for which purpose I hear that considerable support has already been obtained. The only danger, so far as I have heard, seems to be that they are inclined to imitate the faults as well as the merits of the older universities in a natural anxiety to show that women can do whatever men do. No definite scheme, however, has yet been made public.

I may refer, in conclusion, to a controversy which has lately been carried on in the papers, and which may have some interest in America. The Times has bitterly attacked the appointment of Mr. Thornton as successor of Sir F. Bruce. Their objection seems to be that they know very little of him, that he has been employed chiefly in such out-of-the-way countries as Buenos Ayres and Brazil, and that he is not a peer. They lay particular stress upon this last deficiency, which they apparently think a very fatal one. Their remarks as to the importance of sending a good minister to Washington are obviously true; but I do not sympathize with their objections. What we want, I imagine, are the usual qualifications for an able diplomatist, of which peers have no monopoly; and I know that every one who is qualified to judge speaks in the highest terms of the ability and high character of Mr. Thornton. No one knows the secret causes of enmity expressed by the Times on various occasions, and therefore few people value its enmity very highly. I have, therefore, every hope that Mr. Thornton, in spite of the Times and its criticisms, will know how to manage the delicate affairs entrusted to him with credit to himself and, I hope, benefit to both countries concerned.

Correspondence.

"THE WAR BETWEEN HEAVEN AND HELL."

To the Editor of the Nation:

I enclose herein a few slips—all cut from the Nation (Boston), which sheet seems to be rampant on the temperance question, but apparently not conversant with all the "Ten Commandments."

My object, however, is not so much to comment on your namesake as to call your attention to the fact that you have a contemporary who feels himself competent to unblushingly use your commendatory notices. Were it not for the fact that I find in the same sheet a condemnation of the sin of lying, I should almost infer that its editor made his appropriations unscrupulously.

Yours truly, ——

Philadelphia, January 30, 1868.

[Accompanying the above are three commendatory notices of the Nation (New York), bestowed upon it by the Christian Advocate, the Methodist, and Henry Ward Beecher, and which the Boston Nation is deliberately publishing as "what the press says" of itself. In the same number of the paper from which these were cut we find the following broad generalization in the "moral" department for the young folks:

"A small lie, if it is actually a lie, condemns a boy or girl as much as a big and black falsehood. If a man will deliberately cheat to the amount of a single cent, give him an opportunity and he would cheat to any amount."

Better still, we also find under the title, as a kind of standing motto:

"The Battle of the Library, the School, and the Church against intemperance is the most visible part of the war between Heaven and Hell."

All we have to say on this subject by way of comment will be found in an article entitled "Humanitarianism," which appeared in our columns two weeks ago. We learn from the Independent of last week that the Massachusetts "temperance reformers, just now, stand formed in hollow square for the shooting of their deserters." Would it not be well to dispose of all classes of offenders on the same solemn occasion? —Ed. Nation.]

MR. ALLEN'S GREEK TABLES.

To the Editor of the Nation:

In your very fair notice of my little compend of "Greek Elements" you omit to state that it is all contained in a single sheet of letter-size; and so you do not give a right notion of what I undertook, which was, not to provide a substitute, but a memorandum or key for more complete manuals, in the smallest possible space. Small as it is, it contains all the regular inflections and many others, about 550 roots and derivatives with their meaning, and nearly every point of syntax required in reading ordinary Greek prose—all this, with fair type and handsome page. In point of fact, in daily use it saves me at least nine-tenths of the references to the larger grammars.

Such a grammar as you propose I have sometimes thought of preparing—to fill, perhaps, eighty to one hundred pages of ordinary print—these tables being one feature of the plan. I have just finished the revision of a Latin grammar, prepared with much care on a corresponding scale, by Prof. W. F. Allen, formerly of Antioch College, and now of the State University of Wisconsin. If it should find a publisher, it would probably be accompanied by a sheet of Latin elements on the general plan of this which you have noticed.

Your obedient servant, J. H. Allen.

Cambridge, January 31, 1868.

THE PROPAGATION OF SMELT.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Can any of your correspondents inform me whether the smelt has ever been artificially propagated?

There are two species of this fish known to me; one is caught in Charles River, Massachusetts, the other in the Raritan River, New Jersey. That in the Raritan is very far superior to the other in flavor and in delicacy of texture; it runs up the river in February and March, in great numbers; and it seems to me as well worthy of cultivation as the shad and the salmon; more worthy than the trout. T. H.

Cambridge, Mass., January, 1868.

Notes.

LITERARY.

Harper & Brothers announce as in press reprints of Dr. H. White's "Massacre of St. Bartholomew," Krummacher's "David, King of Israel," Smith's "Smaller History of England," Smith's "Student's Manuals of the Old and New Testament History," Frere's "Old Deccan Days," and several novels, none of great pretensions, and one by Percy Fitzgerald.——Roberts Brothers promise a translation of some one, we do not know what one, of Auerbach's novels, to be reprinted from early sheets.——Sheldon & Company have in preparation the "Autobiography of Elder Knapp, the Great Revivalist," a volume of sermons by the Rev. Newman Hall, and two of Mrs. Edwards's novels, "Stephen Lawrence" and "Archie Lovell."——John E. Potter & Co. announce "The Railroads of the United States: their History and Statistics," by H. M. Flint.——Ticknor & Fields talk of a novel by Mrs. Stowe; a volume of tales by Rev. Mr. E. E. Hale; an edition of Halleck, with an introduction by Bryant; Hawthorne's American Note-Book; a volume of Colonel Higginson's Atlantic Monthly papers relating to his adventures during the war, and numerous other books, the most promising of them being the still delayed book of poetry by Browning.

—"Who was the Art Architect of the Houses of Parliament?" There is no doubt who had the credit and the rewards, pecuniary and other, who was knighted for it, and who, it must be added, has been heartily abused for the ugliness and the sham-Gothic elaboration of the building. Sir Charles Barry's industry, good business habits, and knowledge of mechanical principles and construction deserved and won what is generally called "success" as an architect, and his knowledge of the details and the principles of design of classical architecture make his name respectable among modern artists. All over England are civic and domestic buildings of his designing; no man in England, since Inigo Jones, has designed Renaissance and Grecian buildings of a more simple, rational, complete, and satisfactory fashion. But he knew nothing of the architecture of the Middle Ages; his few attempts at "Gothic" buildings—we are not now speaking of the Houses of Parliament—were complete failures; he never joined in any way in the movement which Pugin, for a time, headed, for the restoration of the Gothic art as a living style to be followed and built in. So people said that Mr. Barry, and afterwards that Sir Charles, was the architect of the new Westminster Palace, that his knowledge of planning and of building was good, that the building would be sure to answer its purpose well, and then that there was much in the plan which seemed to show the hand of the classical architect. But they could not say that of the design, for, although the type chosen was unfortunate—late, spoiled Gothic of what is called the "Perpendicular" style—and although the designs for carving, stained glass, tiled pavements, and decoration generally were monotonous and unimaginative, still it showed the mind of some one who had studied late English Gothic very thoroughly. But it is pretty generally known that to offer a design and to make it are two different things—things which may be done by the same person, but which, also, may not. Mr. Barry might have got together in his office all the draughtsmen obtainable who had studied the English mediæval work; his great industry and readiness were known; he might have crammed himself so thoroughly that he could oversee a number of assistants of whom each one knew more about the work he was doing than his chief knew. In such ways the better informed explained the phenomenon, while to the world at large the phenomenon was not visible. But now, both Sir Charles Barry and Mr. Augustus Welby Pugin being dead, Mr. Pugin's son claims for his father the merit of the design. Much correspondence having passed between Mr. Pugin and two sons of Sir Charles Barry, Mr. Pugin has published a stout pamphlet stating his side of the controversy, and this bears for its title the question which begins this note. The points are—1st, that when the competition was ordered in 1835 for the new Houses of Parliament, on the conditions that the style of the designs must be "Gothic or Elizabethan," Mr. Barry and Mr. G. Graham went to Mr. A. W. Pugin, and employed him to make designs for them, which designs they intended to offer and did offer in competition; 2d, that when Mr. Barry had received the award and was appointed architect of the new building, he employed Mr. Pugin to carry out his (Mr. P.'s) own design, who accordingly made the needed drawings, general and detailed; 3d, that Sir Charles Barry, who had behaved in many respects very shabbily toward Mr. Pugin, got possession, by a trick, of his own letters to that gentleman, which were then in the possession of the younger Pugin, and that the family refuse to restore them as was promised. The case is probably not wholly clear. The life of Sir Charles Barry recently published by his son does not throw much light upon it, but Mr. Pugin's side is stated in this pamphlet, "Who was the Art Architect of the Houses of Parliament? a Statement of Facts, founded on the Letters of Sir Charles Barry and the Diaries of Augustus Welby Pugin, by E. Welby Pugin," London, Longmans, 1867.

—The private library soon to be disposed of by Mr. Bouton is very rich in autographs, which, like the other articles in the catalogue, will, without exception, be sold by auction. There are of autographs, American and foreign, not less than two thousand lots, some of them comprising many separate letters. Among the others is the numerous collection of the late Mr. Balmanno, who was very well known in New York literary circles, which includes the letters to Fuseli which Mr. Balmanno luckily saved from the fire into which they were just being thrown as rubbish. From his collection, too, are several very pleasant letters written by Hood. Some of these latter are illustrated; one, for example, has a pen-and-ink picture of a bay-window, and, in a postscript, Hood cautions his correspondent not to stand too near the window while he reads, lest he should take cold. In the list of foreign autographs we observe the names of Abernethy, Hans Christian Andersen, Joanna Baillie, Byron, Chantrey, Coleridge, Cruikshank, Croker, Dickens, Flaxman, Ugo Foscolo, Frederick the Great, Gortschakoff, Hallam, Haydon, Hogg, Humboldt, Hook, Leigh Hunt, Jenner, Lamb, Lamartine, Mazzini, Melancthon, Napoleon III., Palmerston, Victoria, Wilberforce, Southey, Turner, Wilkie, and many besides. The American portion of the collection is strong in distinguished names, containing, for example, autographs of most of "the signers."

—Among the autographs above-mentioned, some that are perhaps of as much intrinsic interest as any of the rest are Thackeray's. Not many of our readers know his handwriting, and to such we may say that it is remarkable for distinctness—being almost as easy to read as so much print—and for the absence of flourishes and other oddities. The letters are small and formed of strokes of equal thickness. The dash seems to have been his chief reliance as regards punctuation, and he was careless in the use of capitals, often using small letters in their place. Once in a while he, too, like Hood, scratches off a little sketch illustrative of the context—pictures that bear a family resemblance to those with which he adorned his books, and, in some instances, done with the same care or carelessness. We copy one of his letters, addressed to a gentleman of this city, which was written partly aboard the Canada when Thackeray was returning in 1856 from his American visit, and partly after he had reached London. We suppress names:

On board last day—May 7 1856

My dear old ——— I tell you that writing is just as dismal and disgusting as saying good-bye.—I hate it and but for a sense of duty I would n't write at all—confound me if I would. But you know after a fellow has been so uncommonly hospitable and kind and that sort of thing a fellow ought you see to write and tell a fellow that a fellow very much obliged and—in a word you understand. So you made me happy when I was with you you made me sorry to come away and you make me happy now when I think what a kind generous friendly W. D. R. you are. You have ——— back in the Bower of Virtue—youll fill that jug when [sic] one day and drink to my health won't you? And when you come to Europe you'll come to me etc—and my girls mind, and we'll see if there is not some good claret at 36 Onslow Square. . . . . We have had a dreary rough passage—yesterday the hardest blow of all. I have been ill with one of my old intermittent attacks after wh. my mouth broke out with an unusually brilliant eruption and I am going into Liverpool with a beard 8 days long—It is not becoming in its present stage. I have not been sea sick but have n't been well a single day. Wine is ojus to me, segars create loathing—could n't I write something funnier and more cheerful? Perhaps I may when we are fairly into Liverpool—perhaps we may be there to-night perhaps not till to-morrow morning for it blew a hurricane into our face last night and the odds are we shall not have water enough to pass the bar.

Home (wiz 36 Onslow Square Brompton London) May 9. We did pass the bar, and did n't I have a good dinner at the Adelphi, and was n't I glad to get back to town yesterday, and was n't there a great dinner at the Garrick club (the annual Shakspeare dinner wh. ought to have come off on the 23 ult. but was put off on account of a naval review) and did n't I make a Yankee speech, and Oh lor ——— have n't I got a headache this morning? I'm ashamed to ask for a sober-water that's the fact. And so here the old house, the old room, the old tea-pot by my bed side—the old trees nodding in at the window—it looks as if I'd never been away—and that its a dream I have been making. Well in my dream I dreamt there was an uncommonly good fellow by name W. D. R. and I dreamed that he treated me with all sorts of kindness and I sent him and J. C. B. P. and D. D. (and what's his name down stairs?) my heartiest regards, and when my young women come home I shall tell them what a deal of kindness their Papa had across the water—so good-bye my dear ——— and believe me always gratefully yours W. M. Thackeray.

P.S.—Tell Tim W. that we had n't a single actor at the Shakspeare dinner, and that F. F. and C. D. send their best remembrances to him—How did that Sunday dinner go off? was it as bad as the dreary Friday?

—No age in which literature has ever been cultivated has been wanting in lovers of literature who have loved it for its own sake rather than for the honor or power or other advantages it could bestow. And among the lovers of literature as an end rather than a means it is certainly necessary to place the enthusiastic collectors of books, the bibliomaniacs. Doubtless, their place is not a high one when, as a class, they are compared with certain other sorts of book-lovers—such as may be said to love the minds of books rather than to lavish a more or less unreasoning fondness on their bodies, to take an enthusiastic interest in the history of their personal fortunes and so on. Thus the elder Disraeli and Dibdin are to be ranked among the lovers rather than among the users of literature. Of course no rigid classification is possible; still these two men may be said to belong in one class, and their class may be roughly described in the terms we have used. But Dibdin's place is low as compared with Disraeli's. Yet it may be doubted if the labors of the kind of book-lovers of which the laughable doctor was a full-blooming specimen, have not been of as much service to the literary world as the labors of the Disraelis. Certainly, neither class exists in so great numbers that the literary world should not honor a worthy member of either. One such has just died. Mr. Peter Force, who died last week in Washington at the age of seventy-eight years, spent the best part of his long life in collecting books and manuscripts relating to American history—documents that it would now be entirely impossible to gather together by any expenditure of money, and which are intrinsically, as materials for history, of very great value. For example, he had in his library 245 volumes of newspapers printed in this country prior to the year 1800—a great part of them the American journals of the Revolutionary period. He had also 700 volumes of newspapers of the present century. Another extremely valuable and interesting part of his collection consisted of 48 volumes of Revolutionary and other letters, historical autographs, and 30,000 pamphlets bearing on American history, political and military. For thirty years, he said, he had worked almost every day from four to eighteen hours among his books and papers. And the mere labor of collection must have been very great. Very poor, too, he had been, he said, all his life, and what money he spent on his library was so spent at the cost of great self-denial. Congress, a year or so ago, gave him a hundred thousand dollars for his collection, which, under the name of "The Force Library," now forms far the most valuable part of the Library of Congress, and makes it, in the department of national history, by much the best library in America. The hundred thousand dollars which Mr. Force received was not a high price to pay, and, as he said, was "not much to a dead man." But perhaps not many of his contemporaries found more happiness than he got from his absorbing industry in a beloved pursuit. Mr. Force was a Jerseyman by birth, but had long resided in Washington, where once—in John Quincy Adams's administration—he published a political paper, and before that time "The National Calendar," a serial statistical work.

—Two correspondents, one a gentleman in the service of the Post-office Department, have written to us in relation to statements first printed in a late number of Harper's Weekly and used by us in a literary note published in our paper of three weeks ago. They deny the truth of what was said about the relative cost of a twenty-pound package of books sent through the mails from a British to an American office, and of such a package sent between two American offices. The writer in Harper's Weekly asserted that the postage on twenty pounds' weight of books sent from this city to Newark would be $19 20. On the contrary, both our correspondents assure us, the postage on such a package would be just one-sixth as much—$3 20. To this the writer in the Weekly would reply that the law limits the weight of packages of book postage to four pounds, and that a twenty-pound package, sent at letter rates—at six cents the half-ounce—would, as he has said, cost $19 20. We believe that in practice the Post-office authorities refuse almost no bundles which their bags will receive, and though one of our correspondents attributes other motives than perfectly pure ones to the writer in question, the latter may have sent a twenty-pound package to Newark, or may have tried to do so, and may have paid, or found that he would have had to pay, for its transmission as if it had been twenty pounds' weight of letters. Consequently he may have thought himself justified in setting the expense at $19 20, although he knew that five four-pound packages can be sent for $3 20. As to another matter which was mentioned in the same note, we now get information to this effect: The American publisher does pay on blank paper out of which to manufacture books a duty of 35 per cent. ad valorem; it is true, too, that on books printed abroad, by foreign printers, he pays but 25 per cent. ad valorem; but such books are not bound abroad. American copyright books, if printed abroad, leaving foreign binding out of the question, would be confiscated by the custom-house officials. There are, however, English books which are imported into this country bearing the imprint of some American house. This is done to save the expense of reprinting, which, in the case of such books, would be so great as to make it unprofitable to put them on the market. The above-mentioned difference in duty is therefore an advantage rather than a disadvantage to the American purchaser. The American publisher, however, may be excused for looking at the matter with a certain displeasure.

—There are a good many indications that the English are beginning to bestir themselves in regard to the condition of their manufactures as compared with the same branches of industry in Continental countries. In several fields of industry in which they had for years distanced competitors, and in which they thought themselves as secure of pre-eminence as they patriotically believe themselves to be upon the waves, they have been badly beaten by foreign workmen. However, one would make a mistake who should imagine that one success against an Englishman gives his enemy the battle. Triumph just yet on the part of the Austrian or Frenchman or Bavarian would be premature, probably. The other day the Mayor of Darlington addressed himself to the consideration of the question in this spirit: Technical education, he told his fellow-townsmen, rested with serious responsibility on England. Not long before he had been present at a meeting in London where the subject was discussed. Some of those present had been travelling abroad, and were unanimously of opinion that the British workman has not as good an opportunity for learning his business well as the foreign workman, and that it would be necessary to do something in his favor at once. In Bavaria, for instance, the apprentices in dye-houses were taught chemical and other knowledge, in order that uniformity of result in coloring might be secured. In English dye-houses the same color could hardly be got twice; the deficiency in this respect he thought lamentably great. At Darlington they not only talk in this way, but they have established a School of Art which gives instruction to 161 students. At Salford, Doctor Angus Smith has recently delivered, before the Working-men's College, a clever lecture on this same subject of technical instruction. He spoke forcibly on the need of more advanced schools for the upper classes of the manufacturing communities. "More and more," he said, "the power of advance is being wrenched out of the hands of merely practical men." The teaching of theories, not the mere teaching of methods of working in this or that trade, is in his opinion what the English manufacturing world will have to provide for. This same doctrine is urged in some cases consciously, in others unconsciously, by the eighty skilled workmen whom the English "Society of Arts" last year sent over to the Paris Exposition. The reports made by these observers have just been published in a volume of much interest. The concurrent testimony of a very large majority of them is to the effect that provision must be made for the scientific instruction of British artisans, or England will lose what remains to her of her industrial supremacy, and will not regain the great deal of it which undeniably she has lost. The volume contains some opinions very well worth considering in regard to the effect of trades-unions on good workmanship, in regard to the value of a good understanding between master and workman, and on kindred topics, and on this account, as well as for its statement of facts, it is a valuable contribution to industrial literature. The book's title—a sufficiently clumsy one—is as follows: "Reports of Artisans selected by a Committee appointed by the Council of the Society of Arts to Visit the Paris Universal Exhibition."

SCIENTIFIC.

APPLICATIONS OF ELECTRICITY AS SEEN AT THE PARIS EXHIBITION.

[SECOND NOTICE.]

RUHMKORFF'S COIL.—This apparatus has grown from a modest little coil of a few hundred feet to one of many miles, from a power to throw a spark an inch to the facility of throwing it two feet. By the use of a small galvanic battery and one of the large Ruhmkorff machines, the application of the inductive principle in electricity enables us to accomplish results which were never before deemed to be possible. Numerous induction coils were exhibited which were modifications of the one invented by Ruhmkorff; and from being the exclusive property of the scientific man, it is now adapted to very many popular uses, as, for example, to the burglar-alarm telegraph, to the employment of Geissler tubes for illuminating purposes, to the firing of large blasts in mines, for the production of ozone on a large scale to be used as an agent in bleaching, for charging Leyden jars, for medical purposes, for photography, as a toy for children.

PANDYNAMOMETER.—An apparatus for measuring the amount of mechanical force of any machine by electricity, called the pandynamometer, was exhibited.

REGULATOR FOR ELECTRIC LIGHT.—Duboscq exhibited an apparatus invented by Foucault for regulating the movement of the carbon points used in producing electric light. It is driven by clock-work, and the velocity of the movement of the carbon pencils is governed by the rapidity of consumption of the particular poles of the battery to which they are attached. Without some such contrivance as this no uniformity in the electric light can be obtained.

HOLTZ'S MACHINE.—The electrical machine of Holtz is, in fact, a constant electrophorus. The plates of glass and resin are made perpendicular or horizontal, according to the work to be done. In the Russian department, one of these machines consisted of many pairs of perpendicular plates. The appearance of the apparatus is not unlike that of the old-fashioned frictional-plate machine, but in its power it is infinitely beyond the old form. A small Holtz's machine of ten inches diameter will throw a spark five or six inches, and will charge and surcharge a Leyden jar with almost as great facility as a Ruhmkorff coil. This form of the electrical machine seems destined to supersede all others, and very powerful ones have been constructed for the refining of sugar by the ozone process.

THERMO-ELECTRIC BATTERY.—There was a thermo-electric pile exhibited by Marcus, of Vienna. This consisted of a row of bars of an alloy of antimony and bismuth so arranged that while one end was heated the other was plunged into cold water. We had no means of judging of the power of the battery, as it was not mounted. This form of the battery is now attracting more attention than any other, and it is the direction of research which promises the best results. It is evident that if by simply heating one end of a metallic bar sufficient galvanic current can be excited to repeat all of the effects now accomplished by means of the acid batteries, it will be marvellously cheap and convenient. A similar battery of very superior construction was exhibited by Mr. Farmer, of Boston.

PYROPHYLAX.—An apparatus for sounding an alarm in case of fire was exhibited by Captain Arbuckle in the English department. The general idea was similar to that of the burglar-alarm telegraph. If a fire broke out in any room, the fact would be made known by the effect of heat either upon mercury or copper wire, and would be telegraphed to the bells. The ringing of the bells would arouse the sleepers, and give them an opportunity to escape. A somewhat similar contrivance has been proposed for indicating the presence of foul air in any locality. A vessel containing caustic potash or lime is carefully counterpoised, and one arm placed very near to the pole of a battery. If considerable carbonic acid is in the air, it will be rapidly absorbed by the potash, and that limb of the balance becoming heavier, will descend, and thus establish the connection in the current which will ring the signal-bell. Such a contrivance as this, if it proved practical, could be put up in our public halls, and as soon as the air became too foul for respiration the incessant ringing of bells would compel the janitor to let in fresh air. The invention has been made and exhibited, but we have not heard of its having been given a fair trial.

TELEGRAPHIC APPARATUS.—Nearly one hundred telegraphic machines were exhibited, not all of them different in construction, but many of them modified according to the tastes of the country whence each came. The printing telegraph of Hughes attracted particular attention, and was deemed worthy of a high prize. Morse's form of telegraph was perhaps the most frequent. The autographic telegraph, previously mentioned, excited more interest than the others on account of its ingenious construction and the marvellous feats it accomplished. There was considerable variety in the material used in various parts of the apparatus; but the principle involved in the action of the batteries being always the same, there was little latitude left for the display of inventive genius. There were thirty-seven telegraphs exhibited by France alone, and as these were placed in one room, it was easy to compare the various systems proposed. Austria was also well represented in this department.

GALVANOPLASTY.—In the application of the battery to electro-plating more progress has been made than in any other branch of the subject. It is only a few years since Jacobi first proposed to deposit metals from their solutions by the action of the galvanic current. At first the application was limited to one or two metals and to articles for table use. The art is now extended to apply to numerous metallic salts, and to the plating of articles of great size. There was exhibited in a separate building in the Park copies of antique and modern sculpture—of the massive bronze doors of Florence; of Trajan's Column, which the Emperor has ordered to be copied in its natural proportions; and of numerous works of art, which were such perfect imitations of bronze that none but professional dealers could have decided upon their true character. Methods have been devised by which the exact amount of metal deposited upon any given object can be carefully weighed. In the case of gold and silver this is of particular importance. Great improvement has also been made in depositing metals which have hitherto not been considered as available for this purpose. The foundation, also, upon which to deposit the metal has been changed, and even glass and rubber have been employed with success. Specimens of the batteries employed, and of the balances for weighing the metals, and an infinite variety of samples of the work accomplished, were to be seen in the Exhibition.

GALVANIC BATTERIES.—There were various modifications in the form of batteries, few of them new. The well-known batteries of Daniel, Grove, Smee, and Bunsen were exhibited in abundance. There was one modification which was applied to batteries intended for occasional use, and that was a spring arrangement by which the zinc poles were lifted out of the acid or the bichromate of potash, when not in use, and the action thus suspended. By pressing down the spring the zinc was again immersed in the liquid, and the current re-established. This was different from making and breaking the connection by disconnecting the wires, and was deemed to be more economical.

MEDICAL APPARATUS.—A probe to be used in searching for a ball in a gun-shot wound was so constructed that when the points of the instrument met on the bullet a connection was established and a small bell rung. The surgeon thus avoided the danger of mistaking a bone or other hard substance for the ball. Electric baths, volta-electric brushes, volta-electric paper, and an infinite number of other contrivances for the cure of maladies by the application of electricity, were exhibited.

GEISSLER TUBES.—A great variety of tubes of different colored glass and of curious device, for showing the properties of electricity when passed through a vacuum or through gases, were exposed by the French and German philosophical instrument-makers. Some of the tubes were bent in the form of letters, and arranged to spell in electric light the names of FARADAY and VOLTA. There were small magneto-electric motors for rotating these tubes, so as to give rise to rings or stars of light in a most simple manner. Some of them were so cheap as to come under the rubric of toys for children.

LADD'S MACHINE.—Ladd's magneto-electric machine was pronounced to be superior to any other in the Exhibition. It is an improvement on the form adopted by Siemens and Wheatstone. Two flat plates compose the electro-magnet, and two Siemens armatures, one at each end, rotate between them, generating a constant and powerful stream of electricity. A small battery converts one of the plates into a magnet, and the electricity, being thus induced, goes on accumulating without the necessity of any further external supply from a battery. In fact, the fire once kindled increases every moment in violence while the machine continues to rotate, and the wear and tear of the plates and the small power required to rotate the armature are the only expense. As this power can be furnished by the machine itself, we have about as near an approach to a perpetual motion as we can ever hope to attain.

OZONE-GENERATOR.—Mr. Beane's ozone-generator is a new form of Leyden jar attached to an induction coil. Flat plates of glass coated with tin-foil represent the Leyden jars; these are electrified by means of a Ruhmkorff coil; and a stream of air being driven in at one end of the plate, comes out at the other so highly charged with ozone as to be irrespirable. This air, passed into vats containing sugar, paper stock, cotton goods, or any such material, at once bleaches without imparting any bad odor or taste, and without damaging the goods. Old and soiled engravings, if moistened and suspended in such an atmosphere, can be thoroughly bleached without the least injury. Mr. Beane's invention is likely to become of much practical use in trade.

RAILWAY SIGNAL.—A self-registering railway signal light was exhibited by Mr. Preece. It often happens that some of the signals are out of the sight of the signal guard, and they may be extinguished or removed without his knowledge. By Mr. Preece's contrivance everything is registered by day and night in the sentry-box of the guard. The day signal connects by a wire with a galvanic battery, and makes known its movements on a revolving tablet placed in a box. The night signal lamp is made to ring a bell should the light by any accident be extinguished.

THE PROGRESS OF ANTHROPOLOGY.*

M. DE QUATREFAGES' work forms one of the volumes of a great literary enterprise which is being carried out at the instance of the French Government, and which aims at being nothing less than the counterpart for science of the French portion of the various industrial reports called forth by the Paris Exhibition of the by-gone year. Just as they will mark for future enquirers the exact height which the wave of industrial progress, of scientific application, had attained in 1867, so will this series of "Reports" on all the sciences, if well completed, stand as a monument in which the curious may read exactly how much distance had been traversed at the same date on the divers paths of more purely theoretical enquiry.

* "Rapport sur les Progrès de l'Anthropologie en France. Par A. de Quatrefages." Imp. 8vo, pp. 570. Paris: Hachette. 1867.

If the lucky savans who have been chosen to represent their country in such a work, and to have their own opinions, if they please, thus officially handed on to posterity, floated by the prestige of the collective undertaking, and in the enviable splendor of large octavo, broad margins, and the typography of the Imperial press, are only adequate to their mission, the work will be one of great and permanent value. Quite as much will depend on the manner in which still pending questions are displayed as on the way in which the results generally acknowledged to be securely ascertained are set forth. A thoroughly just and impartial statement of both sides is, in such cases, absolutely necessary, and will be an extremely delicate task to perform. From this the reporter's own summing-up should be kept carefully separated, and should be judicially and gravely made. We are not sure that M. de Quatrefages' mode of proceeding is not open to censure in this particular. Anthropology is a science born, so to speak, yesterday. In it almost every proposition is as yet a subject of hot dispute; and this necessarily so. Not only are its data as yet in almost ludicrously small quantity when the magnitude of the inferences drawn from them is considered, but even of those few a large proportion are so uncertain that they are liable any day to correction or contradiction; and the interpretation of those which we may regard as certain is, owing to the endless variety of purely local conditions that are utterly impossible to estimate, a matter requiring extreme caution and reserve. Every day, to be sure, the state of things is improving; and, thanks to the general popular interest in anthropological problems, facts are accumulating with a rapidity which, a few years ago, could hardly have been hoped for by the most sanguine. Much of this popular interest has anything but a purely scientific source. The zeal for and against orthodoxy has always formed a by no means insignificant factor in the popularity of the question of the original unity ("Monogenism") or diversity ("Polygenism") of our species, and we in America all know too well how often "science" has been appealed to in the least calm of public assemblies to bear evidence in favor of one view or another of the way in which we ought to treat the inferior races that live with us. More recently the startling discoveries that have placed beyond a doubt the fact that man existed at an age remoter than the greyest antiquity which tradition records, and the applications which have been made of Darwin's hypothesis to man, have been of a nature to arouse the interest of every one, both by reason of the natural wonder and pleasure we all have in contemplating the dim and mysterious, and also because the chords of religious and anti-religious prejudice have again been set in motion. The consequence of it all, notwithstanding the vast mass of bad anatomy, worse psychology, and statistics worst of all, made into an harmonious whole by an absurd broth of dogmatism on both sides that has been let loose in the midst of us—the consequence of it all is that science has really been furthered. All sorts of amateurs have been set working, and facts and documents dug up or rescued from destruction which otherwise we might have waited for indefinitely.

The prosperity of the Anthropological Society of Paris, and the still more rapid growth of her younger sister of London, the large circulation of the Anthropological Review, are in great measure due to the same causes. So that the crude and polemical condition of the would-be science has had its advantages. M. de Quatrefages' tone, as we have hinted, betrays somewhat too much of these antecedents. His own studies have convinced him of the truth of the monogenistic conception, and the impression his book gives is rather that of a brilliant piece of pleading in its favor than of a calm survey of researches and their results. He has, of course, a right to present his own conclusions, and we do not know that he does any substantial injustice to the other side. But even were he truth incarnate, his continually persuasive and argumentative tone (with all its French urbanity) is rather more that of an advocate than of a judge; and many of his rivals may think he has taken an unfair advantage of the dignified post from which he speaks.

The book contains, first, a short history of anthropological learning in France. The succeeding chapters discuss man's place in nature, the unity of the species, its original appearance in one or in many centres of creation, its antiquity, fossil man, the migrations of the different races, their aptitude for acclimation and its bearing on specific unity or diversity, the ape-origin of mankind, the characteristics of primeval man, and the history of man in Europe. Then three chapters on the physical, intellectual, and moral differences of races; and, finally, a discussion of the facts observed in mixed races, a programme of the classification of the existing races (one of the most valuable portions of the book), and an appendix containing a tolerably complete bibliography of these subjects for France.

The vast range of special information here involved is manifest. In fact, no knowledge comes amiss to the anthropologist. Turn by turn he must be historian, physician, philologist, geographer, and antiquary; be equally able to appreciate the value of an indication derived from an old bone at one moment, and from a religious dogma the next.

Throughout the whole work we find the modifying effect of external circumstances largely insisted on. There has always been a great deal of controversy as to the extent of this modifying influence, and much of it has arisen from an ambiguity in the use of terms. When Darwin, for instance, says external circumstances have little effect, he means that they produce little change in the visible characters of a given animal taken from birth upwards. The fact that certain peculiarities imprinted on him before birth may have been caused by the obscure physiological working on his parents of the medium in which they lived, is here neglected and considered in another connection. Quatrefages uses the term actions de milieu as including everything that happens to a creature from the ovum upwards. The peculiar circumstances in which his parents may be plunged, and their physiological reactions, become thus a part of his external medium. This seems the best and most consistent way to use the term in question.

One of the most interesting chapters is that on acclimation. A great argument in favor of polygenism has always been that races cannot permanently flourish outside of the area in which they took their rise, or at least, not in regions dissimilar to that area, and that the actual cosmopolitism of man is true of him only as a collection of species, not of each species separately. Statistics and facts have been brought forward in abundance to show this radical incapacity for acclimation out of the original habitat. Counter statistics have likewise been adduced, and each party has declared that their adversaries' facts were so many exceptions caused by peculiar local reasons. M. Quatrefages admits the decline of vitality manifested by white men in a great part of the tropics. But he instances the curious history of the acclimation of geese and chickens in some parts of South America as probably being analogous to it. When geese, for instance, were first brought to Bogota, they laid eggs but rarely. Of these hardly a quarter hatched, and of the product of that quarter one-half died before the first month. "So that at the end of a time representing at most $\frac{1}{100}$ of the life of a goose there existed only $\frac{1}{4}$ of what an European breeder would have obtained." Few stories of European colonization show as bad a beginning as this. But twenty years later, i.e., after twenty generations, the geese had regained nearly but not wholly their normal fecundity. Now, admitting, says M. Quatrefages, the worst of what has been said of the effects of the West Indian climate on the white man, there is yet no cause for despair. "The French have been at Guadeloupe and Martinique only since 1635. Consequently at the outside nine generations have succeeded each other on this soil." Nevertheless, individuals nearly a hundred years old may be found there, and families of pure creoles of the third generation numbering from seven to eleven children. Such individuals correspond evidently to the surviving geese from which the permanent Bogota breed is now, even after twenty generations, being formed.

In Algeria, too, the mortality of the first French settlers and their children looked very ominous for the future of the colony, but to-day (in such a short term of years) the number of white births exceeds the deaths throughout the country, "and some of the least salubrious localities have become, thanks to human industry, flourishing centres of population."

In general, statistics require a close and separate analysis for each region. "Simple differences of hygiene, physical and moral, suffice to change totally the results obtained in neighboring localities." The habits of life among the richer colonists have certainly in many places largely increased their mortality. For instance, "if we take the white population of Bourbon Island in a mass, we see that it is kept up only through immigration. And in view of this crude fact, testified by figures, we should be authorized to say of this island what has been said of the West Indies, and to maintain that the Frenchman and the white man cannot be naturalized upon it. But the fact only obtains for the population of the cities and of the plantations, that is, for precisely that class which possesses most of the wealth. And by the side of this collection of inhabitants for whom the colonial habits render this place so destructive, there flourish the poor whites, descendants of the original colonists, who perform labor of various kinds, who have never mixed their blood with that of the negroes, and whose type, instead of degenerating, has remarkably improved."

Some places, as the Gaboon, seem fatal, others, as Australia, favorable, to all races alike. And even to the indigenous race slight differences of station may be very disastrous. Negroes transported from the coast of Senegambia, two hundred leagues into the interior, and negroes transported from the interior to the coast, both perish in enormous proportions. In the South Sea Islands we have the strange spectacle offered us of an indigenous people melting, as it were, away, while the emigrants from a widely different clime multiply in an unexampled manner. All these facts and a mass of others which we cannot quote show how extremely cautious one must be in generalizing on these matters. But in sight of our own Aryan branch, reaching as it does from Scandinavia to the Dekkan, we can very well afford, even if not to be as confident as M. Quatrefages, to refrain at least, until further proofs compel us, from the dismal croaking in which so many writers have indulged.

Professor Quatrefages inclines to take a cheerful view of everything. After a long and able review of the mixture of races generally, and particularly of that human mixture which is now taking place so inevitably all over the world, and of which the warmer parts of our continent are the great laboratories, and the result of which so many pessimists have prophesied to be the eventual degradation of the greater part of mankind, he concludes most hopefully. He thinks, for example, that when the maximum of mixture shall have been attained, "humanity as a whole will have advanced. Its means of action upon nature will be multiplied," since history shows that a fresh mental impulse or original quality is often the result of mixture, "and at the same time its force of resistance to actions [of climate, etc.] which have often hitherto dominated it, will be increased. Nothing leads us to think then that the civilizations of the future will be inferior to those of the present, and we may even foresee that, without the fruit of the present ones being lost, it will be surpassed in some direction as yet unknown."

M. Quatrefages is no Darwinian, although he is persuaded of the existence of permanent variation within the species. He dismisses peremptorily the ape-origin of man. It may interest some readers to know that he considers the primitive man to have had red hair and a yellow complexion, and not, as one author thinks, to have been pale and freckled.

In conclusion, the book fills a place as yet vacant. To the student it will be of great value as an index; and to the general reader who wishes to learn what "anthropology" is, we can heartily recommend it, cautioning him, however, not to let the charm of the style make him forget that on almost all the subjects treated the other side has still to be heard.

JOHNSON'S "WONDER-WORKING PROVIDENCE."*

In 1654 there was published, anonymously, in London a book with the running title of the "Wonder-working Providence of Sions Saviour in New England." According to its title-page, however, it was "A History of New England. From the English planting in the Yeere 1628 until the Yeere 1652; declaring the form of their Government, Civill, Military, and Ecclesiastique. Their Wars with the Indians, their Troubles with the Gortonists and other Heretiques. Their manner of gathering of Churches, the commodities of the Country, and description of the principall Towns and Havens, with the great encouragements to increase Trade betwixt them and Old England. With the names of all their Governours, Magistrates, and Eminent Ministers."

The work was evidently the production of an earnest, devout man, with no literary accomplishments and little or no education. He was thoroughly saturated with the strongest flavor of Puritanism, and treated with impartial bitterness church forms and ceremonies as displayed either in the Roman Church, in the milder type of English Episcopacy, or in the more rigid differences of Protestant sectaries. The author's familiarity with the Bible is apparent on every page; his quotations from it are numerous, and his references to it constant. His literary style, as might be expected from what has been said of his education, is by no means above criticism. His sentences are often extremely long and involved, and their parts are so disconnected and irrelevant as to leave the reader in a painful state of doubt at their close as to the subject of which the author has been treating. It would seem as if he had composed his book little by little, year by year, and had then, on its completion and before sending it to the press, gone over it all and made additions, bringing the facts down to the date when it left his hands for the printer. But there is a marked improvement in his style as he proceeds with the work, the sentences grow shorter and clearer towards the end, and we are favored with more facts and fewer pious platitudes and devout exclamations.

One weak point of the author is a fondness for verses, and accordingly, whenever he wishes to commemorate a New England worthy and hand his name down to the honorable regard of all posterity, he endeavors to ensure this result by some of the sorriest attempts at poetry ever dreamed of. The reader may form his own opinion, however, by looking at the following effusion concerning Governor John Endicott:

> "Strong valiant John wilt thou march on, and take up station first,
> Christ call'd hath thee, his Souldier be, and faile not of thy trust;
> Wilderness wants Christs grace supplants, the plant his churches pure,
> With Tongues gifted, and graces fed, help thou to his procure;
> Undaunted thou will not allow, Malignant men to wast:
> Christs Vineyard heere, whose grace should cheer, his well-beloved tast.
> Then honoured be, thy Christ hath thee their Generall promoted:
> To show their love, in place above, his people have thee voted.
> Yet must thou fall to grave with all the Nobles of the Earth,
> Thou rotting worme, to dust must turn, and worse but for new birth."

Another marked peculiarity is that, Nonconformist and voluntary exile as he was, a strong love of Old England always possesses him. He invariably mentions his native country with affection and veneration, and treats it as if still his home. With the old national prejudice, he spitefully identifies the French with frogs: "Oh, yee French! feare not the great swarmes of Locusts, nor the croking Frogs in your Land." He has many curious fancies. From one of them we might imagine that he had taken a "bird's-eye view" of some of the towns he describes, as he often discovers a whimsical resemblance in their shape to the forms of animals, etc. Thus he says of Charlestown, that its form "in the frontice piece thereof, is like the Head, Neck and Shoulders of a Man, only the pleasant and Navigable River of Mistick runs through the right shoulder thereof;" and he likens Dorchester, Boston, and Roxbury respectively to a "Serpent turning his head to the North-ward," a heart, and a wedge double-pointed. He had a great liking for statistics, especially those connected with trade in its different branches, and he was very careful to find out and state the exact figures in every case within his reach.

Many of his accounts of important events are so minute that it is clear that the writer had himself witnessed the scenes depicted, had himself been engaged in transactions forming so important a part of his narrative. His descriptions are at times painfully strong, being so real and so vivid that it is evident he himself felt the sufferings he relates. But with all this he was so modest and unobtrusive, so careless of literary fame, that he throws out no hint, gives no clue by which his identity could be established. Thus much of the man we may learn by a single perusal of his book.

In 1659, five years after its first publication, the book appeared again, this time with an entirely new title-page and preface, the author being stated to be Sir Ferdinando Gorges, Knight. It was issued in a volume containing three other tracts, the collection since known as "The Gorges Tracts," and the whole making one complete work. A more transparent literary fraud than this could hardly have been attempted. A work saturated with the unmistakable essence of Puritanism, democratic in tone, and evidently the production of one interested in trade if not a trader himself could with little reason be attributed to a Churchman, a Royalist who ruined his fortunes in the service of his king, a man who had been both a military and a naval commander, and who, instead of a government of the people, had endeavored to establish a system of feudal tenure in the wilds of Maine. It was the imposition of his grandson of the same name, a needy and worthless adventurer, who devised this as one of the parts in a scheme of his to maintain his claim for territory against the Colony of Massachusetts Bay. Transparent as this fraud seems to us, it for a long time baffled the antiquarians. Tradition, however, has always rightfully ascribed the authorship to Captain Edward Johnson, a laborious and public-spirited citizen of the town of Woburn, in Massachusetts.

Mr. W. F. Poole, the librarian of the Boston Athenæum, has now prepared with great care an elegant edition of this rare and valuable old work. His plan has been to give an exact fac-simile reprint of the text, page for page, retaining all mistakes, alike of the author and printer. We should have preferred to have the old paging broken up for the sake of explanatory notes, correcting some of the not altogether obvious errors of the text. These errors are quite numerous, and, in many cases, not to be misled by them needs not only a knowledge of early New England history, but also that special familiarity with the book itself which hardly any one but the editor himself could be expected to have. The want of such notes has been to some extent supplied by a good index.

Captain Johnson's book is a work which, in the eyes of all persons who have studied the early history of New England, must possess great interest. To the general reader the thing which more than any other makes it interesting is, doubtless, the vivid picture which it affords of the way in which old New England towns were founded. Woburn, in Massachusetts, came into existence in 1640; or, rather, Charlestown Village, which two years afterwards was incorporated as a town with the name of Woburn, was then first settled by white men. Johnson tells us how. The church in Charlestown in 1640 sent out him and certain other of its members in good standing to explore the wilderness to the north of the town line, and to see if there was anywhere fair opportunity for the establishment of another church. "Like Jacobites of old," as Captain, or Ensign, Johnson says, they went forth into the forest, not without apprehension of bloody death from the heathen savages or from great wild beasts, on scant allowance of food, exposed to the inclemency of the autumn sky of Massachusetts, until, after fasting and supplication, they came upon a tract of country which seemed to them a fit place where to plant another slip of the vine of Israel. They had set out fresh from a prayer-meeting, and it was with prayer that they took possession of their new fields and proceeded to found one more Puritan municipality. A few houses were soon built not far from a little lake now styled Horn Pond (which Johnson probably named Herne Pond, calling it after some pool in his native parish of Herne Hill, in Kent). Then speedily a minister was ordained, "it being," says the devout Ensign, "as unnatural for a right New England man to live without an able Ministery as for a Smith to work his iron without a fire." The village was, in all true Puritan townships, incidental to the church; without the meeting-house there would have been no houses. The town thus founded has now, perhaps, as many Democratic as Republican voters, and as many Roman Catholic as Congregationalist church members. But the ideas of the founders of such towns as Woburn have been very powerful in our past history, and are no small part, and not the worst part, of the true America of to-day. In this book one sees the feeble beginnings of New England, and for this reason, aside from its value as a curious historical and literary work, the "Wonder-working Providence" is worth examination.

* "Wonder-working Providence of Sions Saviour in New England. By Captain Edward Johnson, of Woburn, Massachusetts Bay. London, 1654. With an Historical Introduction and an Index, by William Frederick Poole, Librarian of Boston Athenæum." Andover: Published by Warren F. Draper. 1867.

GAIL HAMILTON ON WOMAN'S WRONGS.*

THE objection urged by some of the children of darkness against allowing women to vote—that to do so would really be to give several hundred votes to each clergyman in the country—hardly applies, we should say, to the case of Gail Hamilton. Her ballot, when she has one, will not be cast by any proxy, clerical or lay. Certainly, it would not be cast by a clerical proxy if Miss Dodge were a member of Dr. Todd's church in Pittsfield, Massachusetts. Unless that gentleman is pachydermatous to a degree almost unexampled, "Woman's Wrongs" will permanently embitter all these latter years of his existence. Perhaps our readers know that Dr. Todd has been for some time writing essays in the religious papers—tritical essays—on "woman's sphere," on the wickedness of the nineteenth-century woman in seeking what the doctor calls "pants," on the unbiblical conduct of unmarried women whose desire is not towards their husbands but for wages proportionate to their work, on the delicate bodily organization of what he calls "females," and on various other branches of the "woman question." He said some things that were true. On one important subject, into a consideration of which Miss Dodge declines to follow him, he was bold enough to say things that most people have not dared to say, and yet which it was very well to say plainly. Not improbably, his writings may have deterred several women from the commission of a crime not uncommon nowadays, which, as has been said, is a mixture of murder and suicide—the murder certain, the suicide not so certain, perhaps, as desirable, but at the least probable. Still, Dr. Todd had nothing new to offer. And in treating both this particular matter and the general question, he said his say in that manner which clergymen of a certain weight are apt to adopt, and which, it is to be confessed, is sometimes a little trying to the soul of hearers not reuate. But now the most constant attendant on Dr. Todd's ministrations may forgive him freely; Miss Dodge executes on him justice without a taste of mercy. From the doctor's ignorance of grammar up to his intimate knowledge of the secret counsels of heaven, nothing escapes her; she attacks him on all sides, and shoots him through and through and through and through again, as if to destroy him were something worth the while. And, for that matter, perhaps it is. The children of darkness above-quoted may have been wise in their generation, and, if their sneer does embody a truth, possibly Dr. Todd's Pittsfield alone, even were there no other Pittsfields, would be ample justification for the fierceness of the first seventy or eighty pages of "Woman's Wrongs." It really is, we dare say, necessary to clear the ground of disputants such as the one whom Miss Dodge knocks to pieces and drags away. And this being so, the workman who does necessary work so thoroughly we may easily enough excuse for feeling and showing a triumphant joy in the labor's success and a somewhat unphilosophic heat.

As for her own contribution to the literature of the woman question, Miss Dodge claims for it no admiration on the score of novelty. She gets done with her clerical antagonist, then briefly disposes of the ordinary arguments against female suffrage, and in the rest of her essay—it is not long altogether—talks sensibly about the folly of supposing that to give woman the privilege of casting ballots is going to abolish the various wrongs of which woman complains. In most of what she says we agree with her heartily. We have not been much struck by the ability which the opponents of female suffrage have displayed, and find little in their arguments; and, finally, we are quite at one with her as regards the extravagance of hope in which people indulge who fancy that the right to vote is the panacea for the difficulties in which women find themselves as regards work and wages. It is true that most women do, and properly may, look forward to being married. And the cares of the keeper of the house and of maternity are sufficient to occupy the time and energies of almost every woman, married and a mother, who duly performs her duties. It is true, too, that as long as women look forward to marriage as the ending of out-doors life for them, they will give themselves either no preparation, or else a more or less inadequate preparation, for the life of the artisan, the artist, the clerk, the teacher, what not. It is from this cause, perhaps, that most of the wrongs flow which, as some enthusiastic people think, are all to be righted as soon as women get the ballot. Nothing seems surer than that this expectation is doomed to disapointment.

Still, though the ballot will not do for women what it has been powerless to do for men; though women, voting or non-voting, will have to learn to do business well before they, as a class, will get good pay for doing it; though, to a very large extent, men legislating for women do them justice; though what injustice men do women in legislating for them is much mitigated by various influences which meliorate the laws, and rapidly decreases with lapse of time; though men begin to see plainly that the interest of the race in general is dependent on perfect accord between man and woman, on the disappearance o old tyrannical relations; though the admission of women to the polls will have its bad effects on the policy of states, as well as its—probably greater—good effects; though all these things seem to be true, still we are, for our part, strongly inclined to hope that the experiment may soon be tried. If men are better than women, less frivolous, less unjust, less weak and unreasonable, to put it briefly, it is no doubt largely due to the fact that they are more busied in affairs, are compelled to cultivate judgment and look to the remote and immediate bearings of things, are compelled to consider things which by their nature interest the feelings less than do the ordinary feminine occupations, but exercise the brain more. Now, to give the ballot to women might, as women are to-day, be done with little or no peril to the state, and it being provided for that the republic should receive no detriment, as Mr. Sumner likes to say, we are left free to contemplate with satisfaction the probability that a change would—slowly, doubtless, and laboriously—come over the character of our friends' wives and daughters and other people's mothers and sisters. Certainly it is not impossible that woman, as a voter, might become wider-minded, might do more thinking than she has been in the habit of doing. We believe it probable. And when she goes up, we all go up. Her educational bills might be heavy; it is a thing to be seriously concerned about—what she might do in the way of prohibitory laws, and so on; but, after all, if affairs grow bad enough to bring on fighting, man would always be able to mend matters. And the good to be attained would, as we believe, reward the risk. On this consideration Miss Dodge was precluded by her plan from saying much. Her task was to moderate the wild hopes entertained and taught by persons who—as happens to new "movements"—have just at present got the woman question into their own hands. This she does very well indeed, her essay being forcible in argument and very entertaining reading—what is called a bright book.

* "Woman's Wrongs: A Counter-Irritant. By Gail Hamilton." Boston: Ticknor & Fields. 1868. 12mo, pp. 212.

An Elementary Grammar of the German Language; with Exercises, etc. By James H. Worman, A.M. (New York: A. S. Barnes and Co. 1867.)—The author has succeeded admirably in uniting the merits and avoiding the defects of the regular and the so-called Ollendorf systems. The general scheme of arrangement is that of the ordinary grammars, and the paradigms of all declinable parts of speech are given in full as they occur: but exercises and conversations, illustrating the subjects under which they are found, as well as the grammatical principles which introduce each lesson, are interspersed throughout. Full lists of verbs of all classes, together with complete vocabularies in German and English, are placed at the end of the book, which seems to have been prepared in all respects with unusual thoroughness.

The Nation.

VOL. VI.—NO. 137. THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 13, 1868. { FIVE DOLLARS PER ANNUM. TWELVE CENTS PER COPY.

CONTENTS.

THE WEEK..... 121

EDITORIAL ARTICLES:

The Political Current..... 124
Inflation in its Relation to the Money Market..... 124
The Alabama Controversy..... 126

Democratic Homes..... 128
The Daily Press in Italy..... 129

Paris Gossip..... 130

NOTES:

Literary..... 132

Mr. Jennings on Republican Government in the United States..... 133
Modern Street Ballads of Ireland..... 135
Goldwin Smith's Three English Statesmen..... 136
Leaves from the Journal of our Life in the Highlands from 1848 to 1861..... 137

Five Dollars per annum, in advance; Six months, Three Dollars; Forty Dollars to Clubs of Ten; Clergymen, Four Dollars.

THE NATION is sent till positively ordered discontinued, and all arrears have been paid. Subscribers are particularly requested to note the expiration of their subscriptions, and to forward what is due for the ensuing year, with or without further reminder from this office.

GEORGE STREET, 30 CORNHILL, LONDON, E. C., AGENT FOR THE RECEIPT OF SUBSCRIPTIONS AND ADVERTISEMENTS.

E. L. GODKIN & CO., PUBLISHERS, Box 6732, NEW YORK CITY.

The Week.

THE Senate has listened during the week to Mr. Morrill's, Mr. Drake's, Mr. Harlan's, and Mr. Tipton's speeches on reconstruction. It has had reported by its Finance Committee a bill in substitution of Mr. Sherman's, which provides for the issue of five per cent. bonds, to be called "consolidated debt bonds," to an amount sufficient to cover all the national indebtedness except such as is represented by the present five per cent. bonds. The Senate resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to employ counsel in defence of Generals Meade and Ruger, sued by Governor Jenkins, was adopted at once by the House. Nothing else of importance has been done in the upper House, though many bills and resolutions have been introduced. The amended Tenure-of-office bill, we may add, has passed the Senate, and allows Mr. Seward five supplemental agents of the State Department. In the House, on Wednesday, Mr. Marshall and Mr. Logan, both of Illinois, had an altercation, in which, as regards vileness of language, Mr. Marshall rather had the better of his opponent, who, however, was quite Mr. Marshall's equal in essential ungentlemanliness. The House also has listened to speeches on reconstruction and the condition of the finances of the country. A bill restoring to market lands on the line of the Pacific Railroad and its branches was passed on Friday with great despatch. It opens the sections numbered with even numbers to immediate occupancy under the Homestead Law, and puts on such lands the price of $2 50 an acre. This was on Friday; and on that day Mr. Wilson denied very emphatically that he had ever testified that Chief-Justice Chase or Judge Davis had used in his hearing language as to reconstruction laws similar to that attributed to Judge Field. Appropriation bills have occupied a good deal of the attention of the House during the week. It found time, however, to consider the case of Engineer Sawyer, whom Mr. Welles dismissed from the service for language used in political discussion with a fellow-officer disrespectful to the President.

Decidedly the most important event of the week is the rejection—which seems to be now certain—of the Alabama constitution, and consequent failure—only temporary, we trust—of the work of reconstruction in that State. The miscarriage has been wrought by the Southern whites, who, it appears, are able to bring sufficient influence, part legitimate, no doubt, but mainly illegitimate, to bear on the blacks to make them (the whites), in spite of the disfranchising clauses, more than a match for the Loyal Leagues. It is, in fact, a fresh illustration of the strength of the probability to which we called attention the other day when arguing against the policy of stripping the Supreme Court of its power or any portion of it—that when reconstruction is complete and the troops withdrawn, the whites will rapidly reassume predominance in the government, no matter what arrangement we may now make on paper. The object of reconstruction, therefore, ought to be, we hold, to qualify the blacks, by education and constitutional provisions, and by strengthening all the legal defences of liberty, property, and equality, for the exercise of a fair share of political influence at the South—as much as will cause their wants, wishes, and opinions to be considered in legislation. For supremacy at the South, for keeping the whites down, we cannot qualify them. What is now to be done is a serious question. There is some danger that the Radical leaders may, with their usual impetuosity, rush into a "special enactment" admitting Alabama in spite of the rejection of the constitution, thus throwing the Reconstruction act overboard, making its authors ridiculous, and making the return of the South to the Union without conditions, or at least without operative conditions, all but certain. We hope, therefore, there will now be no "cowardice." Let us have no "steps backward." The Reconstruction act is a good act; its enforcement is essential, and we trust Congress will stand by it. If the South has been deluded into the belief that by staying out it can avoid the legitimate consequences of its defeat, let it stay out till it gets over the delusion. Military government in that region is doing no harm. On the contrary, we hold it to be just the kind of government the crisis requires. It is teaching the whites what nothing else could teach them—respect for law; and is teaching the blacks what is for them the first step in political education—confidence in the law. Military government, in fact, is at this moment a great agent of civilization.

The McCardle case has come up before the Supreme Court, Mr. Trumbull appearing for the military authorities. The constitutionality of the Reconstruction act was not raised by him. He simply argued against the jurisdiction of the court, on the ground that the Judiciary act of 1789, from which the United States courts derived their authority to issue writs of habeas corpus, permitted no appeal in such cases to the Supreme from the Circuit courts. The act of 1867, which conferred additional jurisdiction, did so, he maintained, solely in reference to cases in which persons were deprived of their liberty under State authority. The court has reserved its decision.

Another important opinion has been promulgated by the court in the Mississippi and Georgia cases, which were argued last spring, and in which injunctions were sought to restrain the Secretary of War and others from carrying out the Reconstruction act. The application was denied at the time, and the reasons why, from which Chief-Justice Chase expressed his dissent, while concurring in the conclusion, were read on Monday by Judge Nelson. They are, substantially, that the question is a political one, and that, if the court granted the application, it would be in effect the exercise of political power. The judgment is mainly important as showing the reluctance of the whole court to meddle in reconstruction, or in any way to throw itself across the track of Congress or of the Executive, and ought to make some of the "sons of thunder" who have been abusing it for the last month a little ashamed of their work. But it does not, it seems to us, remove all grounds for anxiety as to the McCardle case, for Judge Nelson in several places suggests the inference that a bill, showing that the act of Congress in some way infringed on rights of persons or of property, might be differently treated.

Gold continues to steal up, the speculators being at work, the uncertainties of Washington politics now supplying them with the materials which the uncertainties of war used to supply. Rumors are steadily manufactured just as they used to be between 1861 and 1865, and are brought in by "reliable gentlemen" from the White House and the Reconstruction and Judiciary Committees, just as they used to be from the Potomac and the Shenandoah Valley. One of the most remarkable during the past week has been the report that Mr. Johnson was going to say dreadful things to Mr. Thornton, the new British minister, on the very day of his presentation; or, in other words, to behave like a savage. As Mr. Seward prepares the addresses delivered on these occasions, and is, whatever his political faults may be, a civilized man, the expected "scene" did not take place. Mr. Johnson expressed his admiration of Queen Victoria, and his desire for peace and prosperity in the usual way. The Alabama check has, doubtless, a good deal to do with the rise, as it opens up a prospect of formidable difficulties in the reconstruction process. Yet why should anybody be troubled? Is not the Reconstruction Committee busily engaged in considering whether, in the last letter written by the "traitor of the White House," there is not some basis for impeachment? What harm can come upon us when our statesmen are thus vigilant and prudent and energetic?

"It is an ill wind that blows nobody good," and the late correspondence between Grant and the President has apparently lighted up the horizon for the gentlemen who are now known as "the original impeachers." They have met, have maturely weighed Mr. Johnson's letters to Grant, and have come to the conclusion that if there be not matter in them for impeachment, there certainly is matter for further consideration. We have little doubt that the thing about those letters which most impressed the more intelligent portion of the community was their extreme folly—or rather silliness. They have done absolutely no harm to anybody except Mr. Johnson himself, and throw no fresh light on his character or aims. Whether Grant said or did not say what the President says he said, or whether the President said what Grant says he said, possesses little interest for the public, inasmuch as it makes no change in public affairs. Mr. Stanton remains in the War Department, Grant in the command-in-chief. Mr. Johnson twaddles in the White House to the newspaper reporters, as he has always twaddled. When we consider what the problems are which are now before Congress, both political and financial—problems such as have hardly ever come before any legislative body in the world—this solemn deliberation of the Reconstruction Committee on the late correspondence, coupled with the solemn enquiry into what Judge Field said at a dinner party, suggests some partly comic, partly painful reflections.

During the debate last week about the "special diplomatic agents" who were sent to Europe by Mr. Seward during the war, to influence public opinion in behalf of the North, Mr. Seward's assumption that these gentlemen helped to save "the life of the nation" was apparently accepted a little more hastily than it ought to have been. We mean nothing disrespectful to these gentlemen when we say that we do not believe that any one of them influenced the opinions of anybody in Europe whose opinions were worth anything. In fact, in the selection of them Mr. Seward displayed his usual contempt for the European understanding. Those who were sent to the Continent were generally ignorant of Continental languages and Continental society, and had to serve their country simply through their personal appearance. Bishop McIlvaine went to England, but we venture to say he did not make a single convert, and if he ever got one into the "hopefully anxious" state, all further progress must have stopped by the appearance of Archbishop Hughes—another of the special agents—in Ireland, where he went to work to help his colleague in England by delivering Fenian, or at least strongly anti-English, speeches. In fact, the whole scheme was a delusion, and we can only account for its conception by supposing, what is hardly supposable, that Mr. Seward was totally ignorant of European manners and customs and of the influences by which European society is affected.

The Alabama case is undergoing a hot discussion in England between "Historicus" and Lord Hobart, the former being now just as sure of the impropriety of referring the whole case to arbitration as he was three or four years ago, but now is not, of the impropriety of referring the Alabama case alone to arbitration. Lord Hobart takes the other side, and urges the reference of the whole matter to an arbitrator just as Mr. Seward proposes, and accuses "Historicus" of "sharp practice," who replies with much effulgence. At this point, Mr. John Morley, the editor of the Fortnightly Review, who has recently been in this country, appears on the scene, and takes sides with Lord Hobart, showing that the worst enemies of England in this country are anxious that it should not be settled, and saying very plainly that, if the matter be not settled by arbitration now, it will have to be settled by arbitration some day under worse auspices. Mr. Seward has been badly mauled by "Historicus" for self-contradiction—an unpleasantness to which excessive indulgence in rhetoric has often brought even abler men than Mr. Seward. There is no vice more insidious and more injurious to the mental constitution.

The Honorable Robert J. Walker, who is a "statesman of the old school," has been enlightening the country about the advantages to the United States of the islands of St. Thomas and St. John, and they are positively awful to contemplate. It appears that with these two islands in our hands, we shall, in the next war with England, be enabled "to flank" the British fleet "in the West Indies;" destroy all her carrying trade, amounting to two billion dollars a year; annex the Dominion of Canada, which that darkly cunning intriguer, Palmerston, got up "to be a rival power to us on this continent;" "send a sufficient orce to Ireland, with arms for her whole people, and thus secure independence." But should we stop here? Never. "From our Pacific possessions we must assail her East India possessions, and finally destroy her commerce upon the ocean; and when in want of food, or of the raw materials of manufacture or of markets for them, the fires in all her workshops would be extinguished, a revolution would be inevitable, and a republic would arise on the ruins of crowns and coronets." We hereby give Mr. Walker notice that we shall oppose this consummation with all our might. There is only one man in the country capable of uper intending the vast plan of operations by land and sea which he has here traced out, and that man is the Honorable Robert J. Walker himself; and when the work is done, we shall certainly not connive at any attempt to rob him of his fairly earned reward. On "the ruins of the crowns and coronets" we shall support the erection of an empire of which Mr. Walker shall be emperor, and George Francis Train Mamamouchi, and shall rely on their both spreading the principles of freedom still further. After having ruined the only free state in Europe, they will certainly not spare France and Germany. The monarchs of those countries will doubtless beg for mercy, and their deluded subjects may entreat Mr. Walker to let them govern themselves in the way that best suits them; but we trust he will not be moved by their uproar. Firmness in such cases is the truest kindness.

Mr. Adams has, it is said, resigned his post in London, and is coming home in April. We doubt if anybody in the diplomatic service of the country has done one-quarter as much for it as he, or is entitled to quarter as much gratitude. His post has been emphatically the post of danger, and one in which only a small portion of the work could be done by correspondence. The duties of the American minister in London must be always largely social duties, and the peculiar constitution of English society renders these more difficult of performance than they are in any other European capital. Mr. Adams, however, not only has discharged them in a way to reflect the highest credit on the country, but he has conducted the most important diplomatic correspondence which has taken place since the outbreak of the war, and conducted it with a vigor, clearness, and ability which no other representative of the United States has equalled or even approached. The controversy of 1865 with Lord Russell will always remain one of the most honorable chapters in the history of American diplomacy, a real model both of style and argumentation. Trying as his position was during the war, however, it has since been more trying still. He has had for the last two years to protect the Fenians against the English courts of justice—a task for which of course no salary or dignity would compensate any respectable and intelligent man, and the wonder is that he has borne the burden so long. The choice of his successor is an important matter just at this crisis.

Reconstruction in the South seems to have got thus far: In Alabama, the convention, a well-behaved and sensible body of men, has submitted to the people for ratification a very good constitution. The probabilities are that it is defeated, the white men, except in Northern Alabama, having registered in large numbers to increase the total number of voters, having almost to a man refrained from voting in order that the majority of all registered voters which the Reconstruction act requires might not be obtained, and having, if all, or most, accounts are true, done a great deal in the way of intimidation to prevent the casting of even a tolerably full negro vote. The Louisiana Convention is nearly ready to submit its work to the people of the State. There is not a certainty that even in Louisiana the legal voters will be able to sustain the work of the delegates whom they were able to elect. There has been nothing in General Hancock's action as commander in the Fifth District which seems to warrant anything of the kind, but the Democratic party seem to be expecting that General Hancock's superintendence of the election will be more favorable to the Conservative party than General Sheridan's would have been. Still, so much of the total vote of the State is cast in New Orleans that a good part of the negro voters will cast their ballots without terror of their lives, and the result may not at all improbably be favorable to the Republicans. In Arkansas, little or nothing has been done, and the same thing is true of the Mississippi and Florida conventions. The last-named body has divided into two parts of nearly equal size, called the Majority and Minority Conventions. The division was caused by the unwillingness of the minority to recognize the right of unnaturalized persons and persons not residents of Florida to sit in the convention. Each fragmentary convention has organized, and proceeds with the business of reconstruction. A good deal of bitterness of feeling has been shown in all the conventions in regard to the presence, and great prominence as members, of what the Louisiana people call "carpet-baggers"—men, that is, who are new-comers in the country. Many of these Northern men are fully deserving of all the contempt bestowed upon them. We see conspicuous the names of several such who are as destitute of character as of ability, and whose assistance in the peaceful founding of a State can be of no value. One of them, we are glad to see, is in a fair way to be expelled from the Georgia Convention for disgraceful crimes. Georgia, like Virginia, moves slowly in reconstructing herself. Neither, we believe, has done much more than revise its constitution and bill of rights. Georgia has, however, passed a "Relief Law" which takes from the courts jurisdiction as regards debts contracted during the war, but permits the legislature hereafter to abrogate the provisions, except in the case of debts for slaves. North Carolina has made a similar enactment, and generally is working quietly and sensibly. All of the conventions have been disgraced, as legislative bodies in the South are apt to be, by one or more "personal difficulties." A member of the Georgia Convention has been killed by another member, a son of Doctor Mackey; the president of the North Carolina Convention beat a scurrilous reporter of the Charleston Mercury, which journal had abused his father; and several members of the Virginia Convention have avowed a general willingness to shoot. Finally, Texas is now voting on the question whether or not she will hold a convention.

The Italian Minister of Finance, Count Cambray Digny, has made his financial statement, from which it appears that a deficit of $48,000,000 is anticipated in the year 1869. Moreover, the total deficit at the close of the present year, including that of 1866 and 1867, is $126,000,000. We enumerated last week some of the expedients by which it is proposed to fill this appalling gulf. The most remarkable feature in the statement was the total want of confidence in the elasticity of the revenue, which forms so strong an element in the calculations of financiers in this country. He does not hope, after doing all that can be done by way of cutting down expenditure and increasing taxation, to bring about an equilibrium between the outgoings and incomings for twelve years to come. The receipts from the sale of church property, he says, are exaggerated, and will not amount to more than $10,000,000 a year, for the present. Strange to say, he still treats the paper legal tenders, by which a large portion of recent government obligations have been met, as simply evidences of unpaid debt, and not as an instrument for the complete discharge of debts—a piece of obtuseness on the Count's part which will doubtless greatly amuse the Pennsylvania State Treasurer and General Butler.

The Eastern question remains as complicated and as dangerous as ever. Russia has been working hard along the Danube in Panslavic propagandism, and has got the Servians into such a state of excitement that Prince Michael wants to fight, and has for some months been busy arming, and even, as we have mentioned, tried to obtain a supply of muskets from Austria. His performances have, in fact, been sufficiently alarming to put an end to the shadowy alliance into which France seemed to be drawn with Russia some months ago, when it addressed a note jointly with that power and Prussia to Turkey on the Cretan question. Since then it has abandoned Russia, and seemed so little pleased with its performance on the Cretan question that it did not insert the correspondence in the "yellow book" presented to the Chambers at the opening of the session, whereat Russia was vexed, and published it herself. France since then has joined England and Austria, and notes from the three, similar in substance if not in form, are now showered weekly on Prince Michael, warning him to keep quiet and let Turkey alone. Russia, in the meantime, has called home Baron Budberg, her ambassador at Paris, and General Ignatieff, her ambassador at Constantinople. Both these gentlemen have the reputation of being extremists on the Turkish question; and if either of them was placed in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in place of Prince Gortschakoff, who is old and moderate, it would be considered an indication that Alexander was disposed to brave Western opinion as his father did. The breech-loaders for which Russia has contracted, however, both in this country and England, are not deliverable till 1869.

In spite of the general declarations in favor of peace, the increase of armaments amongst the great European powers continues on a tremendous scale. In Italy, they are about to build nine iron-plated vessels and alter the carbines of the marines. The Spanish Cortes has passed an arming bill, and the Government is said to be going to buy fifty thousand breech-loaders in this country. The Servian Government has applied to Austria for twenty thousand muskets, but has not got them. The Italian papers say that Prussia is making enormous military preparations. The Invalide Russe shows that the Russian army has been diminished by seven hundred thousand men, but acknowledges that the reserve has been greatly increased, and that eight hundred thousand needle-guns will be ready for use this year. The Vicar of Jesus Christ, even, is trying to increase his "army of flesh" to twenty-five thousand men. We know what France is doing, but, nevertheless, it is said that only about ninety thousand men are armed with the Chassepot as yet, which, if true, makes peace tolerably certain for another year. In the presence of all this, no wonder that trade is stagnant and the bank vaults bursting with specie.

The Fenians will quake in their boots on learning that M. Louis Veuillot has received from the Abbé Camalot an infallible specific for breaking up their organization and bringing them to naught, which he has communicated to the Queen and Parliament of England gratis, and which is the more valuable inasmuch as it also supplies the means of "retaining the empire of the seas and the possession of India." It consists simply in inviting the Pope to come over and sing a mass in St. Paul's, and "to proclaim in the same building the definitive abolition of the bastard work of Henry VIII., and to restore the pontifical authority on the ruins of Anglicanism." How wide the breach is between the two great divisions of the Anglican Church we may infer from the fact that Dr. Hugh McNeile, a distinguished Low Church clergyman in Liverpool, has recently declared that he could no more consent to share in the Anglican worship, as conducted at the Ritualistic church at St. Albans and in London, than "be wilfully guilty of Sabbath-breaking, adultery, or theft."

Articles on any of the subjects usually discussed in this journal will be received from any quarter. If used, they will be liberally paid for; if rejected, they will be returned to the writers on the receipt of the requisite amount of postage stamps.

All Communications which pertain to the literary management of THE NATION should be addressed to the Editor.

THE POLITICAL CURRENT.

HARD times always dispose men to vote against the party in power. With or without reason, it is natural and easy for business men in distress to lay the responsibility of their troubles upon those who have the control of public affairs; and, in general, the "powers that be" are sufficiently in fault to justify their constituents in charging them with at least a part of the general distress. Accordingly, in 1837, 1840, and 1858, the collapse of business led to great changes of the public mind upon questions of political economy, and contributed largely to the political changes of those years. Moreover, the Republican party naturally suffers for the moment from the slow progress of reconstruction. Although the author of the plan now in operation, its execution cannot be said to be in its hands; nevertheless, it is not unnaturally held responsible for most of the delays. Some of these have been undoubtedly due to hasty legislation, but most of them to the passive hostility of the Southern people, encouraged by Mr. Johnson and his adherents. The measures, too, which have been taken to hasten the process have been for the most part violent and ill-judged, and have increased instead of allaying the popular distrust. Paradoxical as it may seem, too, the party has been weakened by the President's growing insignificance. When, as in 1866, he was pouring vituperation on Congress while still in possession of all the powers so lavishly bestowed on Mr. Lincoln, and when his intentions and capacity were still unknown, the means of resisting him undeveloped, and when people looked with dread on the possible consequences of an alliance between him and the South or the Democrats, the country naturally rallied to the support of Congress as the sole guardian of the fruits of the war. Since then he has been completely disarmed, tied neck and heels, and has lost the confidence of the South, and is openly repudiated and sneered at by the Northern Democrats. His hostility is, therefore, no longer of much use to the Republicans, and many men who were willing to go to any lengths against the President rampant begin to feel reactionary compunction for the President couchant.

It is very evident that the commercial difficulties of the present time are having an effect similar to that which they had in former years, and that the people are bent on finding relief from their embarrassments through a change in the administration of the public finances. Unpleasant as is the acknowledgment, we think it cannot be denied that the debtor class, constituting a majority of the community (especially at the West), have determined to relieve themselves, no matter at what cost to the honor of the nation, or to those public interests which most men profess to hold dearer than their own private good. At this particular time, the effect of this determination is highly favorable to the Democratic party, which occupies the advantageous position of being responsible for nothing, and being free to criticise everything, without proposing anything. And if the Presidential election were coming off this week, the Republican candidate, no matter who he might be, would have a very poor chance for election. But there are many indications that the Democracy may be disappointed in the hopes which they are building upon the distress and impatience of business men. The pressure has been so severe as to shake the integrity of the Republican party, and it now seems probable that measures will be adopted by Congress which will afford the trading classes all the relief which they need for a year or two to come. Some of these measures, such as a reduction of expenses, and consequently of taxation, are unqualifiedly beneficial. Others, we fear, will give only temporary relief at the expense of permanent disaster. But if the people are determined to resort to such expedients, it is useless to blame severely the small politicians who manage both political parties for yielding to the popular will. We have the same opinion as to the folly of expansion, and the same conviction of the ultimate ruin which it must bring upon all business, which we have heretofore expressed. But people believe it will bring temporary relief to the embarrassed classes; and it seems highly probable that this belief will be decisive of the political campaign of 1868. The Republican managers calculate that if they can revive the apparent prosperity of the country until after the election they will gain a hold upon the people which no arguments as to what the Democratic party could do if it had the power will be able to shake. Business men will fancy that they are, as a matter of fact, restored to prosperity by the Republican party, and they will have little inclination to consider whether the Democratic party might not have done better for them. Moreover, the North is naturally Republican, and will remain so unless something more than merely speculative reasonings calls for a change. The difficulties of reconstruction have driven many Republicans from their party, but these alone will not suffice to change the result of the Presidential election. If the business men of the country are prosperous, or think they are, the Republican party will sweep the North as it has done for twelve years past with only two exceptions.

The New Hampshire election comes on so early (March 10) as to give the Democrats all the advantage of the present reactionary sentiment of the people. It is unreasonable to expect anything less than a reduction of last year's Republican majority, and there is some ground for fearing that the result may be even more unfavorable, as the Democrats made heavy gains in the last municipal elections. Whatever the result may be, however, we think it will mark the lowest ebb of the Republican party, and that nothing worse may be expected for the rest of the year unless Congress is led into some scheme of unusual folly or should revive and press the Reconstruction and Supreme Court bills, which are now sleeping comfortably in the Senate.

It is exceedingly important, with reference to the financial affairs of the country, that the Eastern and Middle States should be kept under the control of the Republican party. Nearly all Western politicians of both parties are demoralized on the financial question, and the only conservative influence remaining is that of the Republicans on the Atlantic shore. That will be seriously weakened by their defeat in the spring elections, and such a result will be construed as an indication that the East as well as the West is in favor of reckless expansion and perpetual insolvency.

No conscientious Republican at the East need hesitate to vote with his party at the approaching elections. It is entirely sound in that section upon the financial issues of the day, and its success is the only hope for national honesty and honor. Even at the West the financial theories of the Republicans are far less objectionable than those of their opponents, and the most rigid upholder of public good faith need not hesitate in his choice of parties. The Republican party in any section of the country has a long way to fall before reaching the level of the Democracy.

INFLATION IN ITS RELATION TO THE MONEY MARKET.

THE multiplex figures of the "Quarterly Reports of the National Banking Associations of the United States" can scarcely be considered very entertaining reading. Indeed, they belong to that class of newspaper information which the great mass of readers turn from with an aversion far from unreasonable. For a healthy mind naturally spurns the unintelligible, or, what is worse, the meaningless; and it is certainly not too much to say that, for all but an infinitesimal minority, these figures are utterly void of meaning or purpose. But when attentively examined by the light of actual developments in business outside of mere banking circles, they are found to be full of practical information of the most valuable kind, and to furnish us with the sole means of judging understandingly some of the important financial problems now under discussion. Indeed, these quarterly bank reports, lightly as they seem to be regarded by most persons, are in reality the most perfect and most comprehensive financial record ever possessed by any people, and by their accumulating fund of facts heretofore unknown will, in a few years, almost compensate for the evils of the system to which they owe their origin.

One of the first things that must strike every careful examiner of these figures is the small amount of money that the banks hold. To the question, Where is the greatest part of the large amount of money now in circulation to be found? nine persons out of ten would probably answer, In the banks. But so little is this the fact that, of 650 millions of money in circulation on January 6, 1868, the banks held precisely 133 millions, or very little more than one-fifth. The United States Treasury, at the same time, held about 25 millions more, making for the Treasury and the banks together about 150 millions. The balance of all the outstanding circulation, to wit, about 500 millions, or nearly four-fifths of the whole, was in the pockets or money-drawers of the people.

If we look back to the quarterly reports of the same time last year, we find that the total amount of money or currency in circulation at that time was about 675 millions, or 25 millions more than now. Of this 675 millions the banks and the Treasury together held almost precisely the same amount as now, namely, about 150 millions, while the people held 25 millions more than now, or about 525 millions. Any one at all acquainted with business knows that at this time last year, with 525 millions in the hands of the people and 150 millions in the banks and Treasury, money was scarce and the rate of interest 7 per cent., while now, with only 500 millions in the hands of the people and 150 millions in the banks and Treasury, money is abundant and can scarcely be loaned at 4 per cent. It is hence very evident that the abundance and cheapness of money are not entirely dependent upon the amount of money in circulation, and that with 675 millions of circulation money may be scarce and dear, while with 650 millions of circulation it may be abundant and cheap.

The inference we draw from this fact is, that the present depression in business cannot possibly, as is so generally supposed, be due to Mr. McCulloch's contraction of the currency. For it is evident that the only way in which a contraction or diminution of the currency can injure business, is by making currency or money more scarce or more difficult to obtain, and consequently dearer. If, after the contraction of 25 millions, money is cheaper than before and more abundant and more easy to obtain, then it is evident that the depression in business has not been caused by the contraction. Contraction certainly has not produced the abundance and cheapness of money, but money is cheaper and more abundant in spite of contraction. Contraction certainly may make money scarce and thereby depress business, but the present depression in business cannot be due to contraction, since contraction has entirely failed to make money scarce.

With the undeniable fact before us that money is cheaper and more abundant to-day after a contraction of 25 millions than it was a year ago before this contraction was made, what sense is there in the arguments against contraction drawn from the present depressed condition of business? If business is more depressed with money at 5 per cent. than it was with money at 7 per cent., what can contraction have to do with it? and if increasing ease in money does not improve business, do the inflation visionaries dream that by making money still more abundant they will make business any better?

In fact, money is not the motive power in business at all, but simply an instrument, a tool. Circumstances can arise which make money so scarce as actually to prevent the transaction of business. In that case an additional supply of money would undoubtedly so much aid and facilitate business that it would have the appearance of actually stimulating and increasing it. But under no other circumstances—all our war experience to the contrary—can a mere increase of money, or increased facilities for obtaining money, or an increased cheapness in money, produce the slightest increase or improvement in business. As a rule, no bank or banker lends money without security. As a rule, nobody borrows money on security unless he believes he can make more than the interest by buying merchandise or other valuables. Hence, it makes no difference to a merchant how many millions he can borrow at four per cent. on good security unless he can buy something with it that is likely to pay him a profit. No man, because he can borrow money at five, or four, or three per cent., rushes into the markets to buy up flour and stocks and cotton merely for the pleasure of the thing and without regard to profit. No sensible merchant buys anything unless he believes that its price will advance, from the nature of things. No one but a fool thinks that his own purchases will advance the market sufficiently to enable him to sell out again at a profit; and if knaves and fools do occasionally combine to "force up" the price of any article because money is easily borrowed to do it with, it does not need much experience in the ways of the world to know the result.

There is nothing in the recent experience of trade in this city to conflict with this. The recent advance in cotton, gold, and stocks is not directly based upon the cheapness of money. Cotton has advanced because the receipts have declined, the stock is light, trade in Liverpool is improving, and the prospects are considered bad for next year's crop. Gold has advanced because the course of politicians in Washington is expected to injure our credit abroad, and thus disturb our foreign exchanges. Stocks have advanced because the extreme dulness and unprofitableness of trade and manufactures have caused many capitalists to purchase railroad and other stocks as likely to pay a better return for the money invested than either trading or manufacturing. It is true that this natural advance in many things has been anticipated, accompanied, and intensified by speculation, and that speculation could not have been carried to the same extent without an easy money market. But it is also true that the natural advance would have taken place even if money had been less abundant, and, further, that the rise in price of some few articles, even if it had been caused by the abundance and cheapness of money, is very far indeed from being an improvement of business, as the great majority of the mercantile classes can readily testify. That the greatest possible abundance of money can be accompanied by a steady decline in all prices and a universal depression of business, is seen not only from our own experience, but far more strikingly from the financial events of the last eighteen months in England. There money has gradually grown cheaper, until it is difficult to lend it at one and one-half per cent. per annum, yet prices of almost every single article have steadily fallen off, business has been in a state of chronic lethargy, ship-yards have been idle, factories running on half-time, strikes have been the order of the day, and the suffering among the laboring poor has been most intense. There is not one sound reason for supposing that with us great abundance of money would produce results which it is found incapable of producing elsewhere, and which cannot by any process of reasoning be fairly anticipated from it. Hence, all the expectations now so generally indulged in of an improved business as likely to result from the cheapness and abundance of money alone are and must be totally unfounded, and the secret hope with which inflation is looked for by the suffering merchants will meet with double disappointment.

Not only will cheap money fail to improve business, but inflation will even fail to make money cheap and abundant. In fact, paradoxical as the assertion may appear, the amount of money in circulation the amount of currency in use, has directly nothing whatever to do with the cheapness or abundance of money. We might have much more currency out, and yet money be scarce; and we might have much less currency out, and yet money be almost worthless.

The quarterly bank reports show that on January 6, 1868, all the banks of the United States together had invested every dollar of their capital in United States securities. It is evident, therefore, that they had no portion of their capital left to employ in loans to any one. They were, however, allowed to issue three hundred millions of national bank-note currency which they could lend. Yes! But the quarterly reports again show that almost every dollar of these three hundred millions was invested in real estate, internal revenue stamps, compound interest notes, coin and greenbacks, or else was held in the vaults of the banks in the shape of currency itself. It is evident, therefore, that they had no portion of their currency left to employ in loans to any one. Their capital was employed in one thing, their currency in another; they could not lend either their capital or their currency, and yet the quarterly returns show that they had lent the community over six hundred millions of dollars. What is it, then, that they have lent the community? It is simply their credit.

When A, a merchant, borrows five hundred dollars of the First National Bank, he does not receive that amount in greenbacks or bank-notes. He simply receives a "credit" on the bank—that is, permission to draw his check upon the bank for the specified amount. The bank does not lend him a single dollar in money; it only lends him its credit; and in ordinary times and for all ordinary business purposes this check, this bank credit, is readily taken everywhere in place of money, and indeed preferred to it. It is very true that every check, if presented to the bank, would have to be paid in greenbacks or bank-notes, but the fact is that nineteen out of twenty checks so drawn never are presented for payment in money, and upon this single circumstance the whole money market hinges.

A borrows five hundred dollars of the First National Bank. He draws his check for the amount and hands it over to B, in payment of goods bought of him. B deposits A's check in the Second National Bank.

C borrows five hundred dollars of the Second National Bank. He draws his check for the amount and hands it to D in payment of a debt. D deposits C's check in the First National Bank.

At night or next morning the two banks compare notes. Each holds checks on the other for the same amount. They simply exchange them, and the accounts between them are immediately settled.

It is evident that these two banks have then loaned to A and C one thousand dollars without taking a single dollar of money from their vaults. It is also evident that if they had loaned in a similar way a million or five hundred millions, the result would have been precisely the same. Now, if there were only these two banks in existence, and each of them loaned precisely the same amount, and they were certain that all the checks drawn upon them would be deposited in one or other of them, or, in other words, would not be presented to them for payment in money, then it is perfectly clear that these two banks could lend an absolutely unlimited amount, and could supply Wall Street with ten times more money than it could use, and could make money cheaper and more abundant than it is in London, without having a single dollar of actual money in their vaults.

Of course there are many more than two banks, and they all loan in very different amounts and different proportions, but in practice the result is really the same, for this reason: If there were only two banks, and the First National loaned out more than the Second, then when night came the Second would hold more checks against the First than the First would hold against the Second, and the difference would have to be paid in actual money. For a day or two this would not make much difference, but if persisted in would very soon deprive the bank thus lending in excess of its neighbors of all its money, and compel it to stop lending or else to fail. In this way each bank is prevented from lending out of proportion to its neighbors, so that fifty banks in a city are really in precisely the same position as two. They are compelled to loan all in nearly the same proportion, and thus so long as all checks drawn upon them are deposited in one or other of them, none of these checks are presented for payment in money, and the banks can loan an absolutely unlimited amount, and can make money just as abundant and cheap as they please, without having a dollar of actual money in their vaults.

It is very true that the law interposes a limit. It says that no bank shall receive on deposit or otherwise owe more than an average of five times the amount of actual money that it has on hand. As the amount of deposits received by all the banks is really nothing but the amounts loaned by other banks, the effect of this law simply is to prohibit the banks from lending more than five times the amount of actual money they have on hand. This seemingly important restriction is, however, for the present, at least, of no practical importance, for the reason that the banks have not been willing or able to lend anything like the full amount allowed by law. The quarterly bank returns again furnish us with illustration and proof. Although the banks of all the United States together had lent on January 6, 1868, over six hundred millions, they nevertheless had at that date nearly seventy-five millions more actual money on hand than the law compelled them to have, and they thus could, without infringing the law, have lent the community three hundred millions more than they actually had lent, if they had been required to do so or had seen their advantage in doing it.

The position we have now arrived at is this: The banks do not lend money—they only lend their credit, which in the commercial world answers all the purposes of money. The amount of these credits is limited only by two restrictions: one is the law, the other is the condition that these credits shall be deposited in other banks. The limit placed by the law is so wide that the banks could to-day lend three hundred millions, in addition to what they have already lent, without infringing it. The other limit, the condition that the credits lent by the banks should be deposited in other banks, we have not space to consider now. It must here suffice to say, that at the present moment this condition is evidently complied with to its fullest extent, since not only in the great Atlantic cities, but even in the Western capitals where money is comparatively scarcest, the deposits in all the banks are steadily increasing. We may, therefore, for brevity's sake, safely disregard this condition here. We conclude: The banks have lent their credit in sufficient amounts to make money worth no more than four to five per cent. per annum in the great commercial centres, and, if the community had profitable employment for them, the banks could lend them three hundred millions more. But the community absolutely has no use for them; absolutely refuses to borrow them even at the unprecedentedly low rates of interest now prevailing. Now, we ask, what sound argument in favor of inflation can be produced against these facts? What, in the name of common sense, can be urged in favor of making still more money? Nobody supposes that when the Government prints money it is given away. It is paid out to some one whom the Government owes. The receiver will not give it away. He can only lend it, and his money will not be borrowed so readily as that of the banks, since the latter is for all commercial purposes far preferable to the printed money of the Government. Now, if we see that the Government money cannot be had for nothing, and that the banks are ready to lend at a cheap rate a better money in larger quantities than the people have any use for, what earthly sense is there in destroying the credit of the country and upsetting all its financial relations by printing additional quantities of inferior money for which there is no possible use? It is difficult to see any difference between inflation and insanity.

THE ALABAMA CONTROVERSY.

The Alabama dispute with England has taken a very singular turn, and now on both sides of the water is in a singular position. When it first began, the prematureness of the recognition of the South by England was strongly insisted upon on the American side for the purpose of more clearly fixing on England the responsibility of the damage done by the Alabama—that is, by way of proving that there was animus and not simply negligence shown in letting her escape and in failing to arrest her when she again returned to British ports, and that her very existence was due to this prematureness. Had the English Government, it was said, waited for the recognition to be forced on them by facts, perhaps the facts calling for it would never have presented themselves; or had they waited till the official acts of the American Government warranting the recognition under the law of nations had been duly communicated to them and maturely considered, it would at least have proved that they had no hostile feeling against the United States when they made it. But they did neither the one thing nor the other. When the Queen's proclamation was issued, no facts making delay inadmissible had come to their knowledge in the regular way. Lord Russell had received no official information about the extent or prospects of the rebellion either from British functionaries or those of the United States. In fact, he has admitted himself that he formed his judgment about it on mere rumor. It is true, when the proclamation of neutrality was issued, the blockade proclamation had reached London, but the new American minister had not, nor were any Confederate cruisers known to be afloat. The unprecedented haste of the proceeding, therefore, even admitting its strict legality, was looked on in this country as proof of unfriendly feeling on the part of the British Government, and helped to raise a strong presumption of wilful negligence in the case of the Alabama. Therefore, it has been constantly insisted here that it must be held to be part and parcel of the controversy on the English liability for Alabama damages.

This liability was, however, treated for a long while as a wild figment of the American imagination. "Historicus" himself, in 1863, was perfectly certain that there was not a shadow of doubt about the matter, not enough even to furnish the smallest ground for referring it to arbitration. He said, in November of that year, that the decision of the English Government in the matter "ought to be final, for they are the sole judges of it;" and that "the 'tall talk' of claims against Great Britain for compensation for prizes taken by the Alabama is mere nonsense, which has no color or foundation in reason, history, or law." He says now, however, in a letter to the London Times, that "in the particular case of the Alabama, and it may be of other vessels, I think, and I have always thought, that it is one which might be fairly made the subject of arbitration." Lord Stanley has, in fact, offered to leave this case to arbitration, but refuses—and "Historicus" supports him in his refusal—to submit the whole controversy, including the recognition of the South as a belligerent, to arbitration. On this, however, Mr. Seward insists, and thus the negotiations have been brought to a standstill. Mr. Seward says, in effect, "Your conduct in the matter of the belligerent rights must form part of the case, inasmuch as it throws light on your conduct in the case of the Alabama." To which Lord Stanley and "Historicus" reply: "We are willing to submit our conduct in the Alabama case to the judgment of an arbitrator, for about our liability for the mischief she did we confess there is some doubt; but our recognition of the Southern belligerency we cannot submit, for about the propriety of our conduct in this case there is no manner of doubt whatever. We know we were right in that. Our decision on it, as 'Historicus' said of the Alabama case in 1863, 'ought to be final, for we are the sole judges of it, and the Federal authorities may inform our judgment, but cannot question our determination.'"

This is where the matter now stands, and it is presented to us in such shape that we are luckily spared the necessity of going over the old and well-worn ground of the justifiability or unjustifiability of the conduct of the English Government. The question is simply whether the whole of their course with regard to the rebellion is proper subject for arbitration, or only part of it. The reason alleged by Lord Stanley for not submitting the recognition is simply that he is sure he is right. "Historicus" adduces this reason and one other, viz., that Mr. Seward's despatches furnish of themselves a complete justification of the Queen's proclamation. Mr. Seward says, in January, 1867, that before the Queen's proclamation the disturbance in the United States was merely a "local insurrection;" that "it wanted the name of war to enable it to be a civil war;" that "this name the President wisely and humanely refused to confer upon it;" but "that the Queen did baptize the slave insurrection within the United States a civil war." He had, however, said in a despatch to Mr. Dayton, in May, 1861, nine days before the proclamation was issued, that "the insurgents have instituted revolution with open, flagrant, deadly war, to compel the United States to acquiesce in the dismemberment of the Union. The United States have accepted this civil war as an inevitable necessity." In fact, "Historicus" rolls up against him any number of contradictions of the same sort; and if he were simply dealing with Mr. Seward, would have achieved an easy victory. Unfortunately, the English public seem to think that he is dealing simply with Mr. Seward, and that having floored him, the controversy is at an end.

Nothing seems plainer than that if no "questions of policy" and no questions in which one party is sure that it is right are, as "Historicus" seems to hold, proper subject for arbitration, arbitration can hardly ever be of any use. The questions of pure law which come up between nations are exceedingly few in number, and hardly ever cause much risk of hostilities. The rules of international law are so lax, so imperfectly defined, that nearly every international dispute is a mixed one, partly of law and partly of policy. If no point of policy, however, can ever be submitted to an arbitrator without loss of dignity, all talk of arbitration is ridiculous. The force of the English argument, that the English Government knows that in this case it is right, is completely destroyed by its course on the Alabama matter. Earl Russell and "Historicus" were sure that England was right in not submitting that to arbitration. Lord Stanley and "Historicus" now confess that Earl Russell and "Historicus" were wrong in feeling sure. This raises the question whether Lord Stanley or his successor may not think, a year or two hence, that he was wrong in not submitting the belligerent-rights affair also to arbitration, and the mere probability of this would justify Mr. Seward in suspending the negotiations and waiting, though we confess we do not believe there is anything to be gained by waiting.

But even if the force of this argument were not destroyed by the inconsistency or conversion of the English controversialists, it would, we think, be destroyed by an examination of the nature of arbitration. We quite agree with the Pall Mall Gazette in thinking that there is no magic in arbitration, and that it cannot make an intolerable decision tolerable; that, for instance, the question of whether a nation has a right to exist is one which could never be submitted to an arbitrator, for the simple reason that if he decided adversely his decision would never be submitted to. But then arbitration, as we understand it, is simply the reference to the decision of reason of questions which must otherwise be decided by war; and if this be a true definition of it, no question can arise between nations which is not a proper subject for arbitration if a proper arbitrator can be found. That one party feels sure it is right and its adversary wrong, so far from being a reason for not submitting to arbitration, is a reason for doing so; because wherever there is doubt on both sides, questions can in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred be settled by negotiation. It is only when unshakable confidence in one's own opinion puts an end to discussion that the intervention of another mind becomes necessary or even desirable. Moreover, the worst that could happen to England if the whole case were submitted and decided against her would be precisely what would happen to her if the Alabama case only were submitted and decided against her. She would have to pay damages, and that would be all. If, too, her conduct in the recognition matter be as unimpeachable as "Historicus" says it is, and Mr. Seward's talk about it as absurd as he maintains it to be, and at the same time totally irrelevant, she should, so far from objecting to its submission, eagerly urge it. If the arbitrators are the right kind of men, they will either discard it from consideration altogether or allow it to weigh in favor of England. If, on the other hand, England's conduct in that matter was not unimpeachable, it must have given good grounds of offence to the United States; and whether it had any connection with the Alabama case or no may for this reason fairly influence American temper in negotiating about the Alabama case. In this case, also, it ought to go before the arbitrators, for the purpose of ascertaining in the forum of reason whether the United States were justified in taking offence at it or not. "Historicus" says they were not, but this is begging the question. Most disputes between nations as well as men turn upon the question whether one party has or has not good grounds for feeling angry with the other. Does "Historicus" mean to maintain that this question must always either remain undecided, or be decided by war? Does he mean to maintain, too, that any question can be said to admit of no doubt on which two first-class powers are divided in opinion?

As to Mr. Seward's contradictions, however much they may tell against him personally, they do not tell at all against the nation. We have always been of opinion that if he had written only half as much as he has he would have been far more useful than he has been, though, doubtless, less happy. He was in 1861 at his wit's end trying to maintain two contradictory theories: one that there was no war at all, in order to prevent foreign powers from interfering, and the other, that there was a tremendous war, in order to justify the blockade and the general treatment of the insurgents as belligerents. To which theory he held most firmly will never be known in this world, and which he supported most vigorously we defy the most acute critic to say. He tried, in one and the same breath, to persuade the world that slavery had nothing to do with the struggle at all, and that it was "a slave insurrection," shifting from one to the other according to the opinions or sympathies of the persons he was addressing. That he would, therefore, sometime come to grief in this controversy has long been plain to every intelligent mind. The worst charge, however, against the United States that can be based on his variations, is that the American Secretary of State said one thing in 1861, and another thing, utterly irreconcilable with the first, in 1867. But then the same may be said of her Britannic Majesty's principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and even of the august "Historicus" himself, with the difference, however, that the British Secretary and "Historicus" took less time to go right-about than Mr. Seward. In the meantime, the fact remains that the United States were offended by the recognition of the South as a belligerent in 1861, and considered it hasty and unfriendly. What Mr. Seward said or says may be good as proof that the American people are unreasonable in being offended, but it does not prevent their being so, and therefore we say, call in an arbitrator, and let England send "Historicus" before him with Mr. Seward's despatches, the Supreme Court decisions, his Latin verses, and all. Surely it is not England that need fear the result. If we were in Mr. Seward's place—we make the wild supposition merely for the purpose of argument—we should, however, be practical, submit the Alabama case, let the belligerent rights stand over for future use, and close the controversy in one monster deliverance on the whole war and all its consequences, present and future.

DEMOCRATIC HOMES.

An English tourist in America—Mr. Vaux, we believe it was—learned from a reliable American whom he met in Washington that, on account of our democratic institutions, President Monroe, when a young man, was obliged to wear his hair short on his forehead, as he would otherwise have lost his eyesight. The dregs of our populace, he meant, bitterly hate superiority of intellect and position, so they twist gentlemen's front hair round their right forefingers and gouge out the eyes with the thumb of the same hand. "And this," Mr. Vaux said to himself,—"this is what they call popular government and the best country on the face of the earth!" It was the same sagacious observer, if we have not forgotten, who noted with indignation this other effect of democracy—namely, that it generates in the souls of its victims an envious hatred of well-dressed persons. He advises British subjects travelling in the States to provide themselves with clothing of some coarse fabric; thus, he says, they will diminish the risk of insult, and even of violence, from impudent, ferocious levellers. And it is the influence of overweening democracy, we dare say, that the Rev. Mr. Newman Hall holds responsible for that speech which, innocently, unconscious of the joke, he reported the other day to his countrymen as so much American opinion of Englishmen. Having fallen into a ditch near West Point he was informed by the democrat who pulled him out that palisades at ditch-sides are not needed in our enlightened country, but that in England they are necessary, as the people there have no intellect! At any rate, whatever Mr. Hall thinks in his patronizing heart, it is notoriously democracies that not only gouge, as President Monroe so well knew, but, as is proved by a cloud of tourists—swift witnesses—democracies chew tobacco; they slavishly worship wealth; they break the windows of any wealthy man's house which is more convenient or pretentious than its neighbors; they are so irreligious that sects multiply in them, and there is no church which depends for support upon the state; they are ill-educated; they are ill-mannered; they annex territory; they boast of their freedom and hold in chains and slavery their fellow-beings; they rob their Southern fellow-citizens of property inherited from their fathers; in various and even ingeniously inconsistent ways; they make the citizen of truly free countries doubtful whether to regard them with more digust and abhorrence or pity and shame.

These charges against democracy are, however, well known to everybody; they are admitted as true by a sufficient number of people. One that is new, so far as we know, is this—that domestic happiness is far more difficult of attainment, and far less often attained, in democracies than in aristocracies and monarchies. Perhaps we have stated the charge too generally. For whatever his words were, it was this particular democracy of which we are part that the speaker had in mind—a fact made evident by the fuller statement of his case and the arguments brought forward to support it. Perhaps his ideas are worthy of some consideration.

Domestic happiness, as he said, depends very largely upon likeness of character in the members of the family, and this likeness is very largely the result of similar education, similar pursuits, similar social position—in short, of having had similar experiences. Now, it happens in democratic America far more frequently than in England, say, or France or Germany, that the education and social position of sons is very different from that of their fathers, and that the two, exposed to widely different influences, before long become so much unlike each other that there ceases to be any strong bond of sympathy between them, and there may easily come to be something so much less than weak sympathy between them that the feeling of the one for the other may be slight distaste or even repugnance—repugnance struggled against in most cases, but still existing to be struggled against. The father of the professor, or the president, or the general, or the governor remains an uncultivated man while his son is growing. He and his wider-minded son are necessarily drawn apart, they soon live in different worlds, their tastes and habits and ends in life are at least not in harmony, and may be in clashing opposition, and in either case the happiness of the family relation diminishes or wholly disappears. To this add that, even were the son and father to remain in sympathy, it much oftener happens here than elsewhere that vast distances intervene between the paternal roof and the place where the son goes to seek his fortune. Let it be confessed that possibly the governor may be as narrow-minded and illiterate as his father on the mortgaged farm in Maine; still, if at seventeen or eighteen years of age he severs the family tie and goes beyond the Rocky Mountains to be governor in Oregon or Arizona, a blow is struck almost as fatal to the home as if he had stayed in his native town and there had learned to travel round the "western isles which bards in fealty to Apollo hold," while all the road his father knew is that to Portland or Saco.

About to this purpose was the newest one of several anti-democratic arguments which we recently heard urged with seriousness. Furthermore, we were asked to compare the beautiful friendliness and necessary happiness of the relation between Lord Lytton and his mother with the relation existing between very many American parents and American children, these latter being as a general thing superior in cultivation to their fathers and mothers, unable to found a friendship for their parents upon like opinions and tastes—unable, then, to find happiness at home.

Supposing all this to be true, it may be doubted if one is wise to attribute all of it or much of it to democracy. The young American leaves home and goes West not because he and his father live under a popular government, but because, going out of the home circle, he can find a fortune in the wilderness. The American home of to-day, if it existed under monarchical institutions, would, by geographical necessity, be on the edge of a vast tract of land abounding in arable soil, rich in minerals, and in every inducement to immigration, and mostly unoccupied by man. And if the American youth goes to college, it is so far from being true that he goes against his father's and mother's wish, and that he becomes an unsympathetically different being from his father and mother, that in the vast majority of cases it is true that it is they who send him to the college, that they send him with all willingness, and that the college itself is such that he must be an exceptional being and sadly in want of a morbidly sentimental grievance if he does not find himself, at the end of the curriculum, quite comfortable at home—quite in the plane of sufficient appreciation by most of the men and women who have been reading the newspapers, and attending town meetings, and acting as overseers of the poor, and carrying on the indoors and outdoors work of farms and factories, and listening to preaching and lyceum lectures, and otherwise living the life of the American town and country, while he has been doing a little Latin, and less Greek, and not much algebra and plane trigonometry, and a few Lowell lectures on ethics and metaphysics, and a small trifle of chemistry. Horace enlarges the mind, but Horace plus a constantly attendant dictionary and a literal translation, does not enlarge the mind out of all recognition, even by the minds of deacons of churches or secretaries of sewing societies. And what is true of Horace with the usual collegiate accompaniments is at least equally true of Homer and Sophocles, who, as most graduates do not need to be informed, wrote in Greek—a language which is more difficult than Latin; and certainly it is as true of the natural sciences—natural lucus a non, the whole nature of most young collegians, appreciated or unappreciated, is apt to cry out loudly. In brief, our higher seminaries of learning not very high, will have to do more than they have been in the habit of doing before they take most or many of their students out of the range of parental sympathy, and so injure the happiness of home. We fancy that the equanimity of most parents is less disturbed by the great difficulty than by the perfect ease of fully comprehending their children after the end of the four years in college.

And the majority of presidents, and successful generals, and governors of States—these we should say are not creatures whom any extremely dazzling effulgence hedges from the sympathetic comprehension of ordinary flesh and blood, whether "their own flesh and blood" or other. The truth of the matter we take to be this—that our institutions, political or educational, do not make and do not demand people so different from the common run of people that our best educated and highest placed men may not be always, and, speaking largely, are not always, in sympathetic harmony with the rest of their kind—in harmony so full, at any rate, that no domestic misery is caused by its want of fulness. For proof of this, nine hundred and ninety-nine men in a thousand need go no further than to their own experience and observation. The necessities of a new country too big for its population, the instability of family fortunes in a land where the temptation to risk fortunes is so great that they are easily and frequently won and lost—these considerations furnish sufficient explanations of the fact, if this fact exists, and we need not seek other causes. If some one objects that the instability of fortunes is just the thing which it is proper to insist upon as the cause of the condition complained of, and that this instability is the result of democracy, it is devolved upon such person to show that his more occult cause, and not our more patent one, is the real cause. And, to illustrate, he will find it necessary to show that the republican institutions of modern Switzerland or modern Vermont have made fortunes in those States more unstable than they have been in modern France, for example.

"If the fact exists," we said a moment ago. Is there really less domestic happiness in this country than in equally enlightened foreign countries under monarchical or aristocratic or middle-class government? It is hard to tell. The question is one of those for which there is no rough-and-ready reply, and for which even careful methods of investigation can hardly find anything like an acceptable answer. It eludes investigation. But if we look at domestic happiness as domestic happiness was considered by the disputant whom we have been quoting, as it is the result of likeness of cultivated intellect and moral sympathies, it may very well be doubted, even by Americans not too patriotic, if the sum of such happiness is not as great in this as in any other country. It may be that more rarely here than in some other countries the very highest sort of home is established—that much one might safely concede—but, on the other hand, it must be very much less seldom that families among us are collections of brutish beings, living in pens and sties, destitute of almost every fellow-feeling that deserves to be called distinctively human. In the total the balance must be in our favor, though we count the poor whites and almost equally poor negroes of the Southern States.

There are many points of this question that we have not touched upon—notably, there is the relation between the American and democratic man and wife—and every point in it is full of suggestion; but we have no space for further consideration of the subject. In whatever direction we have looked, whether cursorily or long, we have failed to find any very threatening obstacle in the way of the prevalence of this belief—which is perhaps in a hopeful way to become platitudinarian—that, however it may be with things pleasing and good, there is nothing which man can reasonably call good enough that ever suffers because of human freedom from class restrictions—from democracy, in other words.

THE DAILY PRESS IN ITALY.

"WHAT stupid papers!" exclaims the foreigner, who, having conquered the difficulties of the Italian language, thinks to improve his general knowledge of the country by a perusal of some of the countless newspapers which strew the table in the middle room of Vieusseux's unrivalled establishment; and be the grumbler English or German, American or French, his discontent is justified, as the Italian daily press possesses neither English talent nor German science nor French esprit nor American pluck and racy judgments on the world in general. It is incontestably inferior to each and all. This daily, we may say hourly, publication of daily and hourly events is a modern invention in all countries; in Italy it may be said to have been introduced but yesterday—seven years since, in fact—and its deficiencies must be attributed to this rather than to want of talent and learning in the conductors of the press, for talent is abundant, erudition by no means rare, and rapid intuition often atones for the absence of experience. Eight years of comparative liberty coming after four hundred years of slavery, which left fourteen millions out of twenty-two totally illiterate, analfabeta (ignorant of the alphabet, as the phrase is), excluded from and utterly indifferent to public affairs—eight years are too short to have changed or even to have visibly modified the situation. The mere fact of learning to read and write does not necessarily produce a desire to read or a personal interest in the interests of the nation. Many thousands who have overcome the difficulties of the rudiments, who can read sufficiently for their own amusement, never dream of taking up a newspaper, but devote their leisure hours to reading the feeble translations in illustrated papers of Ponson du Terrail, of Féval and Kock. Hence the real spur to journalism, the abundance of readers, is wanting in Italy; it has not an innate reason of existence, much less of prosperity. The immense circulation of newspapers, which leads to the profitable system of advertisements, which constitute the chief wealth of papers in England and America, is out of the question in this country. True, the last page of every newspaper is almost exclusively covered with advertisements, but the entire page, ceded by the proprietor to some speculator, brings him in about as much as one advertisement in the Times—i. e., ten or even twenty francs per day if the newspaper is (relatively) popular. Hence, in the absence of a large circulation and of advertisements, the inherent defect of Italian newspapers is dependence. The number of political newspapers in Italy is considerable, not less than three hundred, but not one is self-supporting. Each and all are kept alive by the Government, by a party, or by a sect. Hence Italian journalism may be thus classified: Governmental papers, moderate sectarian papers, democratic sectarian papers, and as every party or fraction of a party has an individual at its head, every paper ends by becoming the organ of an individual. Another cause of the small prosperity of journalism is the absence of one common centre. Palermo, Naples, Florence, Bologna, Ancona, Venice, Verona, Milan, Turin, Genoa, etc., are so many social and historical centres, each with its own newspapers, and a reading population too small to support them. The newspapers of the capital exercise a certain influence, not directly on the mass of readers, but on the local press. Italy has no capital such as London, Berlin, or Paris, no metropolis such as New York. The Sicilians read the Palermitan papers, the Piedmontese those of Turin, etc., etc. The papers published in the capital are, on the whole, the best. They are, at any rate, fair specimens of the Italian daily press. The Nazione, Opinione, Gazzetta di Firenze, Riforma, Opinione Nazionale, Gazzetta d'Italia, l'Italie, and Diritto are the most important.

The Nazione belongs to the Tuscan consorteria, or clique, was founded by Ricasoli when he was ruler of Tuscany in 1859, and is the faithful echo of his views, his sympathies and antipathies, his hopes and aspirations. It is essentially conservative, affects respectability, but does not always maintain the forms thereof; is often violent, does not always adhere to facts, and is sectarian to the last degree. When Ricasoli, whose every act is a monument of civil wisdom, is not in power, the Nazione defends all the conservative cabinets: with Minghetti, it is not adverse to regional decentralization; with Lamarmora, it admits the right of armed force; with Menabrea, renounces Rome, and accepts, with eyes shut, commands from Paris. Its mortal enemy is Ratazzi. The paper is not, on the whole, badly written; the literary appendices are fair; home questions are treated by able hands, but no foreign question is considered of sufficient importance to be expounded. In American questions the Nazione was entirely with the South, and now has strong leanings towards President Johnson.

The Gazzetta d'Italia is an adjunct to the Nazione, but calls things plainly by their names, delights in personalities, revels in scandal, and has no objection to a spice of calumny. In this paper all the lower passions of the consorteria find vent.

The Opinione, born in Turin in 1848, and transported to Florence in 1865, is the organ of Minghetti, the head of the Emilian consorteria. For a long time it was conducted by Bianchi Giovini, one of the ablest writers in Piedmont—a violent adversary of the Catholics, on the one hand, and of the Democrats on the other; a brilliant hand at polemics. It next passed into the hands of Giacomo Dina, a Jew and a deputy; and the paper, if it lost in erudition and in skirmishing ability, gained in calm and in political outlook. As for its morality, at the time of the coup d'état it invented the theory of "useful crimes and useless crimes;" and in 1864 it forged a letter purporting to be in Mazzini's handwriting. Despairing of seeing its chief return to power for a long time, if ever, it discusses with tolerable impartiality, though generally with a touch of irony, the questions of the day as treated by the rivals of its chief. The various arguments are disposed of with simplicity, clearness, and brevity. It is a well-written paper. It backs up most cabinets, even Ratazzi's, as long as they seem likely to stand, nor would it combat a ministry formed from the left ranks if it presented itself strong, and with a serious programme. Hoping for nothing, believing in nothing, the fait accompli governs the Opinione. Until the middle of October it urged Ratazzi to march to Rome before the French arrived. To-day it crouches to France, and recommends prudence, submission, silence.

The Opinione Nazionale lives on the inspirations of the Ratazzian consorteria, proclaims Ratazzi to be the ideal of a statesman. Its style is inflated, but naïf. It religiously follows its chief's evolutions. Up to the 8th October it opposed the Roman movement and approved Garibaldi's arrest, then approved the revolution, sided with the opposition, and now attacks violently all the consorteria, especially the Tuscan.

The Gazzetta di Firenze completed, on the 1st January, 1868, its hundredth year. It has been the passive organ of all despotisms, of the Lorraines, of the Etrurian kings, of the Napoleonides, and of the Lorraines again. In 1859 it began to read in the constitutional spelling-book, ventured in the footsteps of the Tuscan consorteria, and ended by becoming Ratazzian. In one hundred years it has only been once sequestrated, and that was in 1865, when it reproduced the anti-papal deliberations of a Florentine meeting!

The Riforma was founded last June by the democratic consorteria of the "left," headed by Crispi. Its first number contained a most radical programme, signed by five deputies—Crispi, Bertani, De Boni, Cairoli, and Carcassi. The last four took the programme seriously, and prepared to carry it out to its uttermost consequences. But Crispi had quite other ideas in his head. By the assistance of these men and their adherents he counted on ensuring to himself the position of head of the left, which he had been hitherto in name only, and to render himself necessary to Ratazzi, and share the government with him. Step by step the paper became openly Ratazzian, but took care to show that Ratazzi had adopted the principles of the Riforma, and not the Riforma those of Ratazzi, and assumed a semi-liberal, semi-opposition attitude which gave rise to serious discussions between the signers of the original programme. Carcassi withdrew; Bertani wrote in the Riforma against the Riforma, but remained; Cairoli and De Boni grieved, grumbled, but took no openly active steps; Crispi remained chief of the Riforma, which, from the discussion of principles, has descended to the narrow limits of sophistical polemics; from the study of the varied manifestations of national life to daily panegyrics of Crispi himself. Notwithstanding all this, the Riforma is the most liberal and widely circulated newspaper in Florence.

The Diritto differs little from the Riforma; indeed, had the latter kept true to its original programme, the former would have been driven out of the field. It was founded by Lorenzo Valerio, a distinguished old Piedmontese patriot, and was the organ of sub-alpine democracy. On the transfer of capital the Diritto was the most advanced newspaper. The appearance of the Riforma threw it into the background, and nearly all the subscribers went over to the rival. The hesitations and contradictions of Crispi's organ, however, gave it breathing time, and after the failure of the Roman campaign some of the frontier members from right and left of the House united to appall Ratazzi, adopted the Diritto, and concerted a programme, if not more advanced, at least more independent, than that of the Riforma. Conenti, from the right; De Pretis, minister of several moderate cabinets, but who sits on the left; Bixio, the amphibious deputy; Mordini, moderate liberal; Bargoni, idem, and some forty subalterns, compose this "new third party." At present the Diritto protests alike against Crispi and Ratazzi, hence against the Riforma and the Opinione Nazionale, and is equally opposed to the servility to the foreigners of the moderate press; it demands the reconstruction of the internal life of the nation, the initiative of the state, the authority of the Government, and at the head of that Government new men, i.e., its own inspirers, who, by the way, are not new men but have only entered into a new combination. The actual theory of the Diritto differs little from that of the Riforma; both seek to disarm Garibaldi and to get into power with his programme. The first act of the leaders of the Diritto after Mentana was to defeat Ratazzi, the candidate of the left for the office of Speaker, and to give the victory to Lanza, the candidate of the Government.

L'Italie, the paper edited in French by the ex-French republican Pascal Duprat, is the organ of whatever party happens to be in power, yet it manages to keep well with the French Government, Napoleonism being the aim and object of its propaganda.

Almost all these papers are singularly monotonous, poor in correspondence, devoid of the knowledge necessary to the handling of foreign topics of interest; the aim and end of their being is to throw light upon one side of all questions, i.e., the side which reflects the imaginary interests of their respective consorterie.

At Milan the Perseveranza is the mouthpiece of the Lombard consorteria, the ally of the Tuscan. It is a well written paper, on the whole; has plenty of correspondence, and treats foreign subjects with copious erudition, but is arrogant, intolerant, venomous, and scornful—reflects, in short, the characteristics of the Milanese aristocracy, so ably described by Giuseppe Parini in his "Mattino," that chef d'œuvre of satire.

The Gazzetta di Milano, once the Gazzetta Ufficiale of Austria, then the panegyrist of Napoleon III., has now become the organ of the Milanese middle classes, has passed over into the opposition field and wages war to the knife on the Perseveranza. Carlo Cattaneo contributes regularly to its columns.

L'Unità Italiana is the organ of the republican school, at whose head stands Mazzini. It spoils and deteriorates the theories of its master by its sectarianism, its personal dislikes, its theological ire. It does not represent a republican political idea developed in all possible phases according to the tendencies of the epoch and the latest results of political studies, drawing strength from the errors, the crimes, the incompatibility of monarchy; on the contrary, it proceeds by dint of elimination, and ends by denying the idea itself. Like all the other sectarian papers, it consumes half its columns in hymning the praises of its chiefs. Its editors are worthy of all praise for their abnegation and constancy to their ideas of right; but the Unità Italiana, as it exists at present, will never become the organ of the republicans in Italy, whose ideas of a republic and the means of attaining thereunto are "quite other."

The Venetian papers—L'Arena and L'Adige of Verona, the Rinnovamento and the Tempo of Venice, and countless other minors—are but feeble reflections of the Nazione, Opinione, and of the Perseveranza, poor in form and material. New to public life, they have not yet learned the A B C of liberty; for them it means the liberty of who governs.

The Pungolo of Milan, with its brother in Naples, is one of the richest papers in Italy. It is clever, unscrupulous, and boasts of giving the earliest news. It is intensely sensational, and, when times are dull, invents "incidents," for the purpose of keeping the public lively.

At Turin, the Gazzetta del Popolo, a journal that is some twenty years of age, the younger Gazzetta di Torino and Count Cavour, were once the organs of the moderate parliamentary majority, when Turin was the capital of Italy, but in 1864 all these passed over to the opposition. In Piedmont people know how to read, and do read, and the democratic propaganda of these "converted" journals exercises quiet, gradual, but immense influence. The Piedmontese press is the most dangerous opponent of the Lombard and Tuscan consorterie. The great merit of the Gazzetta del Popolo consists in its hostility, from 1848 to the present hour, to clericalism. The circulation is about 15,000, and the Piedmontese, the least prejudiced population of the peninsula, owe not a little to the Gazzetta. These three papers are now the mouthpieces of the "Liberal Permanent Piedmontese Association."

The organs of the clerical party are the Unità Cattolica, Armonia, and other minor papers. The former, edited by a band of literary priests, learned, witty, unscrupulous, experienced, and logical—at the head of whom shines Don Margotto—is perhaps the best paper in Italy. In order to be a Romanist in Italy, to maintain the temporal and spiritual power of the Pope, one must also be anti-unitarian, anti-national, champion of Austria and of brigandage. The Unità Cattolica is all this openly and unreservedly. It defies the national sentiment, defies right, defies history. Its task is difficult, but it has wonderful tact; it is a monument of ability, of sophistry, and of erudition. If facts are wanting, it substitutes argument; if truth refuses its aid, authoritative quotations are at hand. If it cannot wound, it parries its adversary's thrust; but if there be a weak point in the armor of its foe it inflicts a deadly wound. When proved in the wrong, it quotes the deeds or words of twenty years ago, and against our modern weathercocks generally gets the best of it. The moderate press is put to the torture by constant quotations from past professions of faith in open contradiction to the present. One of its habits all Italian papers would do well to imitate; the Unità Cattolica publishes the writings, speeches, sayings of its opponents, be they Mazzini or the King, Menabrea or Ratazzi, Ricasoli or Crispi; the other papers ignore all that does not proceed from their own liege lords or comment and criticise without enabling their readers to judge of the original. Du reste, the Unità, humble or haughty according to the smiles of fortune, is ever cutting, cruel, relentless. The rack and wheel are its beau ideal of government.

PARIS GOSSIP.

Paris, January 25, 1868.

The second of the four state balls given every year at the Tuileries has just taken place with the usual splendor, the Emperor looking on with his peculiar quiet look of latent humor as the waltzers and polkers whisk past him, the gauzy skirts of the ladies not unfrequently brushing his "august" person as he stands at the foot of the raised platform of the throne or moves about with his peculiar slow, cautious, noiseless step on the edge of the crowd, addressing a pleasant word to the persons known to him; the Empress, always with something novel and characteristic in the elegance of her toilette, eclipsing all the other women by the splendor of her jewels, older and thinner than she was—the arms especially beginning to show the approach of middle age—keeping her seat all the evening in her gilded armchair under the canopy of crimson and gold, talking with great animation to all the starred and embroidered gentlemen who come to make their low bows to her at the foot of the throne, and taking very exact mental notes, say the people of the court, of every incident of the evening, however trifling. According to the established etiquette, the Emperor, at half-past eleven, approaches the foot of the platform, and the Empress rises from her chair and descends the steps. On reaching the floor she makes a courtesy to her spouse, who makes her a bow, and gives her his arm, while the chamberlains, in their splendid coats of crimson silk, covered with gold embroidery, wave back the crowd on either hand, opening a narrow lane for the passage of the Imperial pair, who, followed by the diplomatic body, the ladies and gentlemen of the court, and the guests honored with a special invitation to that effect, begin their progress through the long suite of splendid ball-rooms, which, dazzlingly lighted by scores of enormous glass lustres, and filled with gay dresses and brilliant uniforms, present a very imposing spectacle. The orchestra ceases to play when their majesties begin their walk, and the dancing instantly ceases, as everybody is anxious to get a glimpse of the "august couple" as they pass on towards the supper-room, bowing and smiling, and pretending not to see the frantic demonstrations that are going on a few feet ahead of them, nor to be aware of the instantaneous closing in of the crowd upon the dignitaries behind them as they move forward. When the Imperial cortége has entered the supper-room the doors of that apartment are shut against the rest of the company, the orchestra is heard again, and dancing is resumed with more spirit than ever, while a dense crowd gathers at the entrance of the supper-room, ready to make good its entrance on the reopening of the doors. Meantime, the Imperial party having done justice to the refreshments provided, leave the supper-room by another way. The tables are respread exactly as before, the doors are thrown open, and a violent scramble takes place to get in. When the room is filled, the doors are again shut, and a second crowd forms behind them, ready to make good its entrance as soon as they are once more opened. The tables are thus replenished and emptied three or four times in succession until all the assembled thousands have contrived to sup more or less copiously. The Emperor and Empress never return to the ball-rooms after supper, but go directly to rest, leaving their guests to dance as long as they please, the crowd seldom departing until between two and three in the morning.

M. de Sainte-Beuve, whose Causeries du Lundi, continued through so many years in the Débats, have given him so prominent a place in the literary world of Paris, seems to be on the high road to convalescence, thanks, apparently, to the skill of the homœopathic physician he sent for when he found himself "given over" by the practitioners of the orthodox school. He has just sent to all the leading literary men of Paris—his friends or foes, and he has not a few of the latter—a copy of the new edition, recently issued, of his "History of Port-Royal"—a work which, in spite of its solid research and its admirable portraits of Pascal, the two Arnaulds, Mère Angélique, and other leading notabilities of the best days of Jansenism, has never been very popular in France, being rather the work of a moralist skilled in the analysis of the human heart than that of a historian. M. Michelet, who has many of the merits and defects of M. de Sainte-Beuve, is a warm admirer of this book; but the verdict of the public has always pronounced it to be "heavy." M. de Sainte-Beuve is exceedingly sensitive to the opinion of others, and is perpetually dropping friends and acquaintances, who often have no idea how they can have offended him, simply because they may have criticised or failed to praise his productions. To such a point does he carry this sensitiveness that, finding himself included in a group of caricatures, sketched by Lehman in an album belonging to Daniel Stern, and including all the habitués of her salon, where M. de Sainte-Beuve was formerly an assiduous visitor, he never again set foot in that lady's house! On the other hand, his self-love leads him constantly to make advances to his declared opponents, in the belief that he cannot fail to win them over to the admiration with which he himself regards the children of his pen. Thus, in the copy of his "History of Port-Royal," which he has just sent to the learned young historian, Frederic Morin, he has written the imploring words "De judice averso ad judicem attentum" in the fly-leaf. This craving for admiration, which weakness he shares with the brilliant republican deputy, M. Jules Simon, whom his friends accuse of making advances to any political opponents from whom he can hope to extract anything in the shape of praise, has procured for M. de Sainte-Beuve the sobriquet of "the coquette." Having been violently attacked and insulted by his colleagues of the Senate during the angry debates which took place in that assembly in relation to M. Renan, and overwhelmed with insulting letters by the clerical party, M. de Sainte-Beuve, when he was supposed, a week or two ago, to be at the point of death, added a codicil to his will, providing that his body should be carried to the grave without being taken to any church, or having any religious ceremony performed over it—a defiance of Catholic prejudices which has created no little surprise here, where his nervous horror of noise and scandal is well known, and which has excited a violent uproar among the priests and their adherents.

Notwithstanding the evidence of a repressive tendency on the part of the new Minister of Justice, M. Pinard, a great number of new journals, most of a socialistic tendency, are about to be founded. One of these, under the management of M. Arlès Dufour, so widely known for his influential position at the head of the industry of Lyons, his immense fortune, his princely beneficence, his honorable political antecedents, and the great services rendered by him as Secretary-General to the International Exhibition of 1855, is to urge upon public attention the programme of social reform resulting from the ideas of the St. Simonian school, of which the great silk-weaver has always been an ardent partisan. The Fourierist school, which succeeded in reconstituting itself a couple of years ago, is already publishing a weekly paper, entitled La Science Sociale, and has just inaugurated a weekly banquet, to serve as a gathering point for all who share the large hopes of universal peace, plenty, and brotherhood that fired the soul of its founder. Another socialist paper, La Solidarité, is also devoted to the advocacy of economic reform, from a point of view which seems to class it rather as the continuation of the principles of the late Pierre Leroux. Another democratic journal, with no special social programme, is to devote its columns to the advocacy of abstention from the electoral polls—a system which has usually been found to be far more injurious to the party adopting it than to the government against which it is intended to serve as a protest. There is room for much difference of opinion as to the wisdom of the repressive policy by which the Second Empire seeks to obviate the constitutional and traditional tendency of the French mind to make political disquisition the immediate prelude to revolution; there can be none as to the fact that it systematically accords the largest liberty to all attempts to bring before the public any programme, theoretic or practical, aiming at social and economic reform.

The sale of the picture gallery of Khalil Bey has created such an excitement among the artists and dilettanti of this part of the world that the queue of visitors, on the days of exhibition preceding the sale, extended from the doors of the Hôtel des Ventes nearly to the Boulevard. Among the treasures sent to the hammer by the action of the same princely caprice that had gathered them together were two "Inn" scenes, by Teniers; "Windmill," by Ruysdael; a "Boar-hunt," by Horace Vernet (the dogs renowned for their beauty and spirit); two exquisite heads of children, by Greuze; a "Hunt," by Wouvermans; a charming "Girl" (miniature), by Gerard Douw; Eugène Delacroix's great picture, "The Murder of the Bishop of Liége;" "The Boar of Ardennes" (the famous scene of "Quentin Durward"), and "Tasso in the Madhouse," by Robert de la Mark; Decamp's "Duck-hunter," with its magical effects of light and shadow; three fine studies of the nude, by Ingres; five noble landscapes, by Rousseau, whose recent decease necessarily adds to the value of his works, and another by Jules Dupré, who may now be considered as the first living landscape-painter of France; Meissonnier's "Guitar-player" and "Amateur de Peinture;" the "Message," by De Leys, so greatly admired last year at the Champ de Mars; and various fine specimens of the faire of Courbet, Troyon, Diaz, and Fromentin.

The work which fetched the highest price is Delacroix's masterpiece, "The Murder of the Bishop of Liége," first sold to the last Duke of Orleans for 1,500f., purchased by M. Villot (one of the conservators of the Louvre), at the sale of the property of the late duchess, for 4,500f., sold by him last year to Khalil Bey for 37,000f., and adjudged the day before yesterday for 46,000f. It is not uninteresting to see how, in regard to injustice in the field of art as elsewhere, "the whirligig of time brings about its revenges." Original and kindly, but somewhat eccentric, modest, shy, and in bad health, Delacroix was looked down upon by his brother artists and ignored by the public. For years his paintings were constantly refused admission by the juries of fine-arts exhibitions, and it was only by the persistent support of the younger artists that he was at length admitted to the Institute. There he was more than once the butt of the brutality of Ingres, then in the height of his popularity, who one day, in the violence of his anger during a debate in which Delacroix had ventured to express an opinion at variance with his own, sprang from his seat and rushing forward towards the object of his scornful fury exclaimed, "Monsieur Delacroix, you have no conscience in your drawing, your work is that of a dishonest man." The vastly overrated talent of Ingres is now being judged more correctly, as was evidenced at the sale in question, where one of his noted paintings was knocked down at 10,000frs. less than the price at which it was bought, while all the works of Delacroix, now recognized as one of the glories of the French school, were sold at an immense advance on their original price. The remembrance of the long neglect and slow recognition of the lamented artist was doubtless present in the memory of many of those who attended the sale. When his now famous work, "Tasso in the Madhouse," sold originally to the elder Dumas for 800f., was knocked down at 16,000f., a buzz of satisfaction went through the crowded hall, but when the still greater work before alluded to and now regarded as his chef d'œuvre had been carried up to the high sum at which it was finally knocked down, a burst of applause, long and enthusiastic, proclaimed the delight with which this homage to his genius was regarded by his friends.

Delacroix sold his paintings for very small sums. He had faith in himself; but he lacked the power of imparting that faith to the crowd. His physical weakness incapacitated him for grappling with the ill-will of rivals, or asserting his own claims against the indifference of the public. Every sort of accident seems to have conspired in his childhood to cut short his days. He was drowned, burned, stifled, poisoned, and run over, and, though he escaped being killed by these misfortunes, his health was shaken by them for the rest of his days. He suffered constantly from dangerous attacks of sore throat, and was kept alive only by the incessant devotion of an old servant to whom he was greatly attached, and to whom he left a handsome legacy. Having made up his mind, on account of his health, that he must never marry, he led an exceedingly quiet, simple, and regular life, dividing his time and strength between the brush and the pen. Fortunately for him, he had inherited a small competence, which enabled him to live in the modest way which he had marked out for himself, receiving only a very few intimate friends, painting, or setting forth in a series of original and highly interesting papers, most of which were published in the Revue des Deux Mondes, his theory of colors and his observations in regard to art.

Notes.

LITERARY.

CERTAIN Germans of Iowa have just done a thing which is unexampled, we believe, in our political history. They have ordered of the publishers, Messrs. Leypoldt & Holt, two hundred copies of Mr. Charles Astor Bristed's "Interference Theory of Government," and intend to distribute them gratuitously among the members of the Iowa Legislature. Doubtless there are not many members of Iowa or other legislatures whom a careful perusal of the work in question would not benefit greatly, and the action of our German fellow-citizens seems worthy of imitation as well as commendation. "The Interference Theory of Government" and Mill's essay "On Liberty" might profitably be scattered broadcast amongst our law-makers. Legislative Lycurguses we have in plenty, and even Dracos are not few in our Assemblies, but of Solons there is always a scarcity.

—The Athenæum, edited by Mr. W. Hepworth Dixon, is an English literary weekly paper not so well known among us as the Saturday Review or the Spectator, and not deserving to be so well known as either of those able journals or the very learned Chronicle. It is proper to describe the Athenæum as a paper of much value as a repertory of literary news and a third-rate paper as regards critical ability. Recently, as has been stated by several American journals, daily and weekly, the Athenæum brought a very heavy charge against a highly respected Congregational clergyman, the Rev. Dr. March, of Philadelphia, who is the author of a little book entitled "Walks and Homes of Jesus." The "Walks and Homes of Jesus," if one takes the judgment of the Athenæum as intelligent and honest, is nearly all "lifted out of Mr. Dixon's pages." Most of our readers know Mr. Dixon as the writer of "New America," a work of which it is true to say that almost any book-maker might very well be glad to have made it, for it sold well, and was well put together, but which most writers above the class of clever book-makers would perhaps not think extremely creditable to the author. Mr. Dixon is also the writer of another new book and of another old one, neither of which is different, as regards the point of which we have just spoken, from "New America." "Spiritual Wives" is the new work and "The Holy Land" is the old one. The Athenæum pretended to show, by printing in parallel columns an extract from the editor's book and an extract from Dr. March's, that the "Walks and Homes of Jesus" was made up bodily of pilferings from the "Holy Land." The attempt was really so entirely a failure—would have been so obviously a failure if a real offender, a Scotch plagiarist, had not been shrewdly put forward first and unmistakably proved guilty—and the attack seemed so wanton and insolent, that, after reading the criticism, we began to make preparations for showing, by a careful comparison of the English book and the American, that gross injustice had been done the author of the latter—injustice no less cruel to the man on whom it was inflicted than injurious to the character of the journal inflicting it. We have been spared the labor, however, for Dr. March, in a letter to the Round Table—which journal had spoken of him as "pilloried by the Athenæum for a flagrant act of plagiarism"—justifies the high opinion in which he is held by all who know him by showing conclusively the careless untruthfulness of the Athenæum. The "Walks and Homes of Jesus" (English edition) contains two hundred and twenty-four pages. Of these pages Dr. March offers to prove that eighty-two were written and published from the pulpit ten years before Mr. Dixon's "Holy Land" appeared. This proof depends on the veracity of "many living witnesses" and on "double record made at the time." What the last phrase means we do not precisely know. One hundred and forty-eight of the two hundred and twenty-four pages were written and made public not ten years before Mr. Dixon went to Palestine, but yet before his work was published. Of the seventy-six remaining pages there are fourteen—and Dr. March defies Mr. Dixon to point out what fourteen—in the preparation of which reference was had to the "Holy Land." Finally, the Athenæum's critic made a blunder in talking about the book as a book of travels. That it made no pretensions of being. It was offered to the public just as tracts are offered, and with the same intent with which tracts are offered, by the Presbyterian Publication Society. It indeed "expressly disclaims all original investigation," and is simply a book of sermons or religious lectures, delivered by a minister to his congregation, and put forth in book form by the society above-mentioned, without expectation that the author would get money or honor by it. The American journals which helped to hurt an honorable man's reputation—in the Times we saw reference made to the matter, and a singular paper called the Church Union had something to say about it—ought to copy Dr. March's letter to the Round Table.

—Some weeks ago we spoke of a national German political organization called the Independent Progressive Party, one of whose aims is to abolish the present executive and substitute for it one appointed by Congress. No doubt many of its members belong also to the "Society for the Spread of Radical Principles," whose headquarters are at Indianapolis, lock-box 93. These principles are not political solely, as may be seen on examining some of the society's publications. No. 1 is entitled "Die Reconstruction und die Neger," by Ludwig Greiner, and is dated the last of June, 1865. Its views were those commonly held by the Radical Republicans of that time, all of which were perhaps sound and wise at a particular stage of the reconstruction process, but not all have remained so. No. 2 is by the same author: "Die Union und der President," end of August, 1866. The remainder, so far as we are informed, consist of various works by Mr. Karl Heinzen, editor of the Boston Pionier, a thoroughly brave, outspoken, and honest man. He would not be accepted by all his countrymen, especially by the religious portion of them, as their teacher and leader, but his ability is readily acknowledged, and his audience is intellectually a select one. The society publishes of his: "Teutscher Radikalismus in America," a bound volume of selections from his writings on a variety of topics; "Die Wahrheit," which is based on the theorem that "all is vain save Truth and her exponent Radicalism." Radicalism is further defined as seeking the truth on every hand, for the truth's sake, and demanding supremacy for it; also, as shrinking from none of the consequences of truth, and for love of it silencing all other considerations. From this pamphlet we extract the remark that "Bishop Berkeley was just the philosopher for the Hottentots, whose language has no expression for 'I am.'" "Sechs Briefe an einen frommen Mann," "Six Letters to a pious Man, with a preface to a Jesuit and a postscript to a Humbug,"—third and enlarged edition—is an argument for atheism and materialism, the Jesuit being complimented for his logic in warring against reason, and the "humbuger," for his belief in creation—or "the art of making something out of nothing, which is humbug"—being satirically accorded the royal title "by the grace of God." The pamphlet which will most commend itself to Americans is "Die Teutscher und die Amerikaner," written in view of an increased German emigration to this country, and discussing pleasantly and in a judicial manner the characteristics of the two peoples and their duties toward each other. Mr. Heinzen rejects the advice so frequently given to the Germans to "Americanize" themselves, and bids them—instead of taking Mr. Banks for a model, or eating pork and beans and Boston brown bread—be Germans still, but without Teutonism. He would have Americans neglect the classics in favor of German, which should be understood by every cultivated person. Finally, he declares: "Not 'Americans' must rule America, but intelligence, humane culture, and principles of freedom." Mr. Heinzen devotes a separate chapter to German as compared with American women, and finds the former more restricted, less widely active, less independent than the latter. The companions of their husbands at all places of amusement, they never appear at political gatherings. He believes that they have much to learn from our women, and he anticipates the complete enfranchisement of both—a hope which we judge is not shared by many German men. The latest manifesto of the society is a petition which appeared in the Pionier of Dec. 25, 1867, occupying two pages. It is a good illustration of the parallel drawn by Mr. Greiner, in his second tract, between the Americans and Germans, who respectively trust and mistrust, hope and dread, expect and doubt. We say this rather of the tone of the petition than of its object, which is to get from Congress a constitutional amendment abolishing the Presidency, and establishing an executive after the Swiss committee or cabinet pattern, this executive in turn to be watched by a Congressional committee during vacations. The arguments for this reform are mostly familiar; the à priori being that our co-ordinated government is an unstable compromise between an absolute monarchy and an absolute democracy. One of the strongest points made is that, no matter how good your President, the office is a perpetual source of party strife, individual ambition, and general corruption. Much of this, however, could be removed by a rigid civil-service bill such as Mr. Jenckes has in keeping. The petition reminds us of the parallel just cited when it says: "That is surely the best government which makes most unnecessary any trust in the possessors of the public authority, while it renders misuse of that power most difficult."

—Keith Johnston's "Royal Atlas of Modern Geography," published by Blackwood of Edinburgh, may not be in all respects the best existing atlas, but it is the most beautiful and the pleasantest to use that we have ever seen, and it answers nearly all possible purposes—of course we mean for the Old World; our indefinitely great country here requires an atlas of its own, and we have several to choose from. But concerning the "Royal Atlas"—the price of it is five guineas and it is very bulky. Next comes a smaller book published by the same house, called the "Handy Royal Atlas," at three guineas. Scribner, Welford & Co. import this. It seems to be the best atlas for family use and for college students that has been published in the English tongue; this, with even a common-school atlas for Yankeeland, will take one to nearly every place he may want to find. At the same time with these books should be named "The Globe Atlas of Europe," a convenient hand-book or overcoat-pocket-book. It contains forty-eight maps on the same scale, and a general map of Europe on a small scale, upon which as a diagram are laid down the outlines of the different detailed maps. It is not complete enough for use in the library or class-room, but an excellent traveller's companion. It is a volume of Macmillan's Globe series, and is imported by Scribner, Welford & Co.

—The Art Journal, a monthly published in London and New York by Virtue, Yorston & Co., is giving a continuous illustrated catalogue of the great French Universal Exposition. The Art Journal has a large broad page; the printed form is just as high as that of the Nation, and about half an inch narrower, and is divided into three columns; each number formerly contained three full-page engravings on steel, which could be pretty large, and thirty-two pages of letterpress thickly strewn with wood-cuts. Since the Paris Exhibition opened, one engraving and twelve pages have been suppressed, and sixteen pages given of the illustrated catalogue, which work is paged for binding separately. This catalogue is certainly thickly set with pictures. Of the sixteen pages which came with the January Art Journal, five pages have one wood-cut each—these quite large—four pages have two cuts each, one has three cuts, two have four, one has five, two have six, and one has eight, or fifty "figs" to the sixteen pages. Of course, as they illustrate the efforts to outdo each other of modern cabinet-makers and silversmiths, these pictures are commonly of subjects poor enough. As a bit of history—and by way of suggestion and spur to our own yet more tasteless and very unenterprising people—this catalogue will have a sort of value, but artistically it will be nearly worthless. The Art Journal itself is not a critical journal in any sense of the word. The editorial tone is rather the reverse of really critical, rather suggestive of "genial" and "favorable" notices of works of art, old and new, and books upon art sent to the editor. But there are exceptions, as sometimes in the notices of exhibitions of pictures in London, although the strictures are generally upon unpopular works, and have the air of echoing rather than disregarding the general voice. When the contrary is the case, the bit of genuine criticism is so lonely and out of tone with the rest that it seems false. Thus in the January number the notice of French pictures has very good things in it, but the severe, yet mainly just, unfavorable criticisms upon Jalabert and Gérôme seem like wantonly exaggerated attacks when contrasted with the general tone of the Art Journal for ten years past. Mention of a few of the articles in the January number will partly set forth at once the value and the shortcomings of the Art Journal. We have a wood engraving of the extraordinary design by Miss Hosmer for a freedman's monument to Abraham Lincoln, which we reviewed last March (Vol. IV., p. 238). One is satisfied to have a picture of that very feeble and pretentious design that he may lecture upon it, and try to prevent the carrying out of anything so bad; but the half-page of warm praise of it is less delightful. Then among the book notices Mr. Hamerton's very able and interesting "Contemporary French Painters" is rather slightingly reviewed in a column notice, which leaves the impression that the critic thought but little of it. And below we find the beautiful "Story without an End"—reviewed in the Nation for December 19—decidedly pooh-poohed, while the "Æsop's Fables," noticed by us on December 12, illustrated with really unrefined, ungraceful designs, poorly lithographed, is noticed in this way: "England has this year supplied us with no book so entirely good as this which we receive from America. . . Lithographs so excellent as to rival wood or even line engravings. . . . There is no one of these engravings that does not exhibit genius of the highest order!" Mr. Ruskin has sometimes written for the Art Journal; still more recently Mr. Hamerton has written for it. Other writers of ability do so now and then, generally over their own signatures. If you miss a number, it will be sure to have in it something you ought to have seen. But the off numbers are mainly valuable for their numerous illustrations, some of which are very good indeed.

—The leader of the French liberal Christians, Athanase Laurent Charles Coquerel, has recently died in Paris. He was an old man, having been born in August, 1795. At twenty-three years of age he was a graduate of the theological school of Montauban, and when thirty-five years old, after twelve years of preaching in Holland, he became pastor of a Protestant church in Paris. In 1848 he was elected a member of the National Assembly. He was always liberal in his political as in his religious faith; he supported the administration of Cavaignac and of Louis Napoleon before the coup d'état; after that event he withdrew himself wholly from public life; during our war he was a warm friend of the North. His liberality as regards religious creeds was so great as to offend very many people—not Catholics only, but Protestants. Guizot looked on him much as we may imagine Doctor Wayland looking on a very liberal Unitarian preacher. He demanded for himself perfect freedom of belief. It is told of him that a gentleman who had long attended his church called on him, with candor confessed his doubts as to Coquerel's belief in the divinity of Jesus—doubts founded on Coquerel's constant avoidance of allusions to Christ as the Saviour—and asked his pastor to certify him as to his belief; but Coquerel refused to give him satisfaction, and denied his right to make enquiry. It is told, now that he is dead, that many people—Protestant as well as Catholics—are not a little scandalized to learn that for upwards of fifty years he kept in his library a bust of Jean Jacques Rousseau. His works as an author have been thrown into eclipse by his fame as a pulpit orator. Yet he was not so mere an orator that little of value is to be found in his books; he loses less in such a comparison—perhaps, other things being equal, the Protestant preacher always loses less—than his Catholic rival Lacordaire; his sermons, of which some have been translated into German and English, are not without depth, force, and fineness of thought. He died at the age of seventy-three, and was followed to his grave in the cemetery of Montmartre by a concourse of more than two thousand persons. Through the corner of this cemetery, by the way, Haussmann, the Prefect of the Seine—to whom, as to Mademoiselle Thérésa's sapeur, nothing is sacred—is about to run one of his new boulevards.

MR. JENNINGS ON REPUBLICAN GOVERNMENT IN THE UNITED STATES.*

Mr. Jennings's object in writing the work before us has been, he tells us in the preface, "to explain the original plan and design of the American Constitution, to review the changes which have been made in it in subsequent times, and to describe its present condition and working." His opening chapter contains a very fair and lucid statement of the theory of the Government, but when he comes to point out what he considers the aberrations from the constitutional standard which have taken place in practice, particularly during the last six years, he gets into difficulties. For instance, in talking of the differences of opinion which have prevailed as to whether or not the Constitution can be stretched so as to make it meet such emergencies as the civil war, he talks of the decision of the Supreme Court in the Milligan case as having given "authority and sanction" to "the party" which contended that "the Constitution was binding on the nation for ever, and could neither be abridged nor extended, no matter what perils or difficulties arise." All that was decided in that case, however, was that the President could not suspend the habeas corpus and order men to be tried by military tribunals in places in which the courts were open and their process was obeyed. The discussion of which Mr. Jennings speaks, touching the powers of Congress, was entirely irrelevant, bore on no point before the court, and gave no "authority or sanction" to any party or to any particular set of opinions. When, also, Mr. Jennings deliberately asserts, as he does in the same chapter, "that the Constitution has been subjected to so many violent changes that its framers, could they see it once more, would detect but few traces of their work," he talks in a style which deprives the remainder of his work of all claim to the confidence of the candid reader. This is the sort of stuff one hears every day from declaimers of the extreme Southern party, but it is not the language of a philosophical observer. We assert, on the contrary, that if Hamilton or Madison were to revisit the earth, he would not find in a single State in the North the slightest indication of any change whatever in the Constitution. There is no act of Congress enforced in any of these States, and no doctrine enunciated by the courts, either State or Federal, of which the constitutionality has ever been disputed. In the South the case is very different. There the Government is dealing with a state of things for which the framers of the Constitution professed their inability to provide, and it is doing divers things for which it would be hard to find a warrant in the fundamental law, but nobody talks of them as precedents or as having effected changes in the Constitution. The Constitution is not in force there just as it was not in force on the field of Gettysburg during the battle; but to say that it was abolished or changed in the State of Pennsylvania because a writ of habeas corpus could not have been executed in the village during the fight would be very wild talk.

* "Eighty Years of Republican Government in the United States. By Louis J. Jennings." New York: Charles Scribner & Co.

We say the same of the assertion "that under the influence of an organic national law which every side might interpret as it pleased, which might be held to mean one thing one week and a totally different thing the next, the whole character of the Government has been changed. No one can say with any certainty what will be even its leading features in ten years to come" (p. 25, Am. ed.) That is, nobody can say with certainty that in 1878 the United States will not be governed by an absolute monarch. Anybody who knows American society as well as anybody ought to know it to write a disquisition on its political tendencies, can, we submit, pronounce on this point, and on many others about which Mr. Jennings is extremely doubtful, with the utmost certainty. With a similar want of perspicacity, Mr. Jennings takes Webster's assertion in the Hayne debate in the Senate, that "the people may, if they choose, throw off any government which becomes oppressive and intolerable and erect a better in its stead," to be an admission of the constitutional right of secession. Nothing is better known than that Webster was talking of the right of revolution, which lies behind all constitutions, just as the right of self-defence lies behind all courts and policemen, but the existence of which has to be proved by success.

We do not like to accuse Mr. Jennings of misrepresentation—we are quite sure he is not knowingly guilty of anything of the kind—and yet there is something which can hardly be called by any other name; we refer to it not because it is of any great importance in itself, but because it is illustrative of the temper in which Mr. Jennings has performed his task. Talking of the disgust excited by Mr. Johnson's boasting of his low origin, he says the people "knew who and what Mr. Johnson was before they elected him Vice-President. If the people do not like mechanics to be their chief officers, they need not to go to that class for them. But the truth is, that many of the results of popular government are unsatisfactory to Americans when they are brought into close contact with them." Now, there is in this a very marked suggestio falsi. Mr. Johnson was not nominated for the Vice-Presidency because he was of the mechanic class. Neither his origin nor his calling had anything to do with it. He was nominated by the Republican convention because he was a prominent Tennesseean politician, and was the only senator from any of the seceding States who had remained faithful to the Union. He happened to be of low origin; but that circumstance exercised no more influence on his nomination than his height or the color of his hair. In other words, he was selected, as all presidential candidates are, from amongst those whom the various States present as their picked men, and a more intimate knowledge of American society would have prevented Mr. Jennings from supposing that the origin of a politician exercises here, as it does in England, any material influence on his fortunes. Mr. Pendleton is at this moment the most popular Democratic politician in the West, and for much the same reason that Mr. Lincoln was at one time the most popular Republican politician, and yet Mr. Lincoln began life as a rail-splitter, and Mr. Pendleton is "a gentleman" by birth and position.

Here is another extraordinary statement:

"The executive is a prize contended for chiefly by hungry place-hunters, or by the obscure and illiterate puppets of a faction. The educated class has been driven from the ranks of competitors. The office has almost ceased to be an object of ambition," etc., etc.

We shall only say of this, that the only men who have ever occupied the place by the deliberate choice of the people who could be called "illiterate" and "obscure," have been Jackson and Lincoln. Jackson was a distinguished soldier—the first after Washington. Lincoln was the ablest debater in behalf of the free-soil doctrine the West had produced. All other presidents have had as good an education, either from books or society, as the country can afford. The candidate on whom the choice of the North is now falling is a general who has few, if any, living superiors—a regularly educated soldier, on whom the highest military distinctions have already been conferred. His possible rivals are the Chief-Justice of the Supreme Court, ex-Governor Seymour, of New York, and Mr. Pendleton, of Ohio, the two latter being men of as good education, both in the technical and in the larger sense of the word, as are to be found in the country; both men of fortune, and of high social position and of good family. We are getting rather tired of being told that educated men have been driven from political life in America. If we had the time or space, we should have little difficulty in showing that the politicians from every State are fair representatives of the society from which they come; that if poets and philosophers do not abound in Congress or in the State legislatures, it is because they do not abound amongst the people. We may add that we should find some difficulty in mentioning a single man of education, possessing the qualifications which would fit him for political life in England, who wants to get into political life in America and cannot. It is not every man of education who is fit to be a politician in any country.

In the chapter on the judiciary Mr. Jennings falls into some other errors—in themselves slight, but yet sufficient to impair his authority still further. The Dred Scott decision, for instance, was not, "as a general rule, disregarded till slavery was abolished." That decision was simply that persons of African blood could not sue or be sued in the Federal courts, and it was in no case disregarded till slavery was abolished. So also, as we have already remarked, the Supreme Court in the Milligan case did not decide that all military tribunals, under all circumstances, were unlawful, but that military tribunals established by the President alone, away from the scene of hostilities, were unlawful. Mr. Jennings also asserts, in contradiction to De Tocqueville, that "the people practically compel the Supreme Court to apply laws which it has pronounced unconstitutional. The legislature first passes such laws; the people support the legislature; and the Government is obliged to see that the laws are carried into execution." It would be difficult to get more confusion into the same space than we find here. The Supreme Court does not pronounce laws unconstitutional, except incidentally in giving judgment in controversies between private suitors; it only "applies laws" to the cases which come before it in the regular way; and to talk of the people "practically compelling it to apply laws" which it has already pronounced unconstitutional is simply absurd. The Supreme Court does not pronounce laws unconstitutional till after they are passed; but it is not its business either to enforce or hinder their execution. A court, as Hamilton says, "exercises judgment, and not will; it declares the sense of the law;" with its execution it has nothing to do; and no attempt till the introduction of the recent bills into Congress has ever been made to prevent its declaring the sense of the law.

Mr. Jennings mentions as a monstrous thing that Congress, in 1867, refused to admit into the Union two Territories as States "unless they changed the organic law of their constitutions so that it should not exclude negroes from the suffrage." He has surely forgotten that Congress has always held, and has frequently exercised, the right of insisting on the insertion in, or exclusion from, the territorial constitutions of any condition it pleased as a condition precedent of admission to the Union. "The measure," he says, "was not carried without protests and arguments from many members." Very likely not; but were they not the same members who, before the war, argued and protested in vain against Congress forcing Territories applying for admission to the Union to prohibit slavery in their organic law?

We had marked a great many other passages for the same kind of criticism. We have space, however, for only two more citations. Mr. Jennings says: "The House of Commons, since the year 1862, has been said to be an epitome of the English nation; the House of Representatives is nothing but a deputation from the least cultivated classes in America. There is no great interest, whether of capital or labor, in the world of commerce or in the world of thought, which has not hitherto been faithfully reflected and honestly guarded without detriment to other interests in the House of Commons." We may fairly turn this last proposition over to the authors of the "Essays on Reform." Of the first we shall only say, that it reveals a singular notion of the nature and object of representation. The representative body of every country represents "the least cultivated classes." In what country are the scholars and philosophers in possession of the government? One other specimen of what we must call Mr. Jennings's loose writing and extravagant talking, and we have done. He says: "The best known preacher in America gains his notoriety solely by the freedom with which he discusses on Sunday morning, from a text of Scripture, the acts of public men, and the turn affairs are likely to take." The singular incorrectness of this statement it would be difficult to make anybody understand who was not a regular hearer of Mr. Beecher, who is, of course, here meant.

Mr. Jennings indulges in one practice which we consider unfair and misleading. He quotes exposures of abuses from American newspapers and other periodicals as proof of the failure of the government; that is, he points to the use of the principal instrument of reform, in a free country, as proof that reform is hopeless. He cites, for instance, the Nation's denunciation of the caucus system, d propos of the nomination of P. T. Barnum, but forgets to mention that Barnum was defeated, and forgets also to call attention to the fact that the ups and downs of party warfare in America are caused entirely by the revolt of the voters against the caucuses.

We might say a great deal that is good of the book. All the narrative parts—all parts, in short, for which Mr. Jennings could draw his materials from books, are admirable, and the tone is throughout kindly. The author, too, writes like a gentleman, and evidently tries—as well as strong conservative prejudices and a too great eagerness for generalization will let him—to do justice. We, however, regret the success of the book in England, as indicated by the sale of two editions. We are satisfied it will only thicken the fog through which most Englishmen look at the United States.

MODERN STREET BALLADS OF IRELAND.*

THE street ballad is a very important element in the life of the Irish peasant. It supplies the place of the newspaper, not only appealing to his passion or his reason, but being a general chronicle of news, both local and general. Every remarkable event—wedding, wake, execution, robbery, race, hunt—within a wide circle is seized with avidity by the ballad singers as a subject for verse, and not only these, but any notable political or religious event abroad that appeals to the knowledge or interest of the Irish peasant is sung, instead of being read, all over the country.

The peripatetic Homers themselves who give bodily form to the voice of the people are to be found in greatest abundance at fairs and market days, although in cities like Cork or Waterford one or more is pretty sure to be encountered every day except Sunday. At a fair in a market town, amid the throng of buyers and sellers, arguing for the odd shilling or ha'penny with Celtic vehemence, you are sure to come upon a denser crowd than usual grouped around a common centre, from the midst of which arises a voice in an indescribable, melancholy cadence, soaring and falling in a sort of pillelu falsetto, like no tone of voice producible by human throat except an Irish ballad singer's. Here is a ballad singer, perhaps two, for they often sing in couples. The first voice will "rise" it:

"Come all you feeling Christyuns, with me now sympathi-i-i-ze," then a second will join, and both together soar to the heights of lamentation and fall to the depths of woe with the next line in unison, and so on single and double alternately to the end. While the leading woman is singing her solo, the second is rapidly selling from the bundle in her left hand to the audience, never failing to join in refrain at the proper instant, although in the very act of dealing out a ballad or taking a ha'penny. The female minstrels are usually dressed in long cloaks faded to a greenish-brown, their faces pale and worn, and their voices lost to all semblance of woman's characteristic from being strained in continual falsetto. They sing with lack-lustre eyes, and apparently without the slightest feeling of the subject-matter. All the ballads are not lamentations. Many of them are quite jovial in expression, but "Finnegan's Ball" is transformed into the same melancholy cadence, at once outrageously comical and lugubrious, as "Willy Reilly" or any other tragedy. The men are not a whit more jaunty than the women. Usually clad in a long and tattered frieze great-coat, the old caubeen is not boldly cocked, but rather hung on the back of the head, and the whole air is one of despondency. In fact, the ballad singers are the most melancholy set of beings in all Ireland. The beggars wear a jovial look beside them. All poets are popularly accused of melancholy, however, and every ballad singer is his own poet. Any one will improvise a ballad of the established pattern in an hour's time on any theme in the heavens above or on the earth beneath, not to mention a glimpse of purgatory or the lower regions.

The patriotic songs are disappointing. There are but few which stir the blood like "the sound of a trumpet." Centuries of oppression have stifled the voices, if not chilled the hearts, of the minstrels. There were no great victories to sing, no triumphant heroes to reward their strains. Everything to be proud of was associated with defeat and woe. The songs of the vanquished were silenced in the presence of the victors, and their secret voices were only of hope or despair. In most of the political songs even at the present day allegory is largely used. Ireland is usually typified under the name of "The Old Woman," "The Green Linnet," "The Dear Black Cow," or as some resplendent maiden in despair, "Roisin Dubh" (Black Rose), etc. The police keep a sharp lookout on the ballad singers, and the singing of "The Wearing of the Green" or the like would be the signal for instant arrest. The seditious ballads which are sung by stealth, and often unprinted, are not usually the production of the hackneyed professionals. They have a bolder mint-mark. The following verses are taken from a composition entitled "The Irishman's Farewell to his Country," which is a specimen of this class. It was probably composed by some indignant peasant as he brooded in his cabin with an empty cupboard and a cold hearthstone. Its feeling is too deep to be artificial:

"On Irish soil my fathers dwelt since the days of Brian Borue;
They paid their rent, and lived content, convenient to Carricmore.
But the landlord sent on the move my poor father and me.
We must leave our home, far away to roam, in the fields of America.

"No more at the churchyard, store machree, at my mother's grave I'll kneel.
The tyrants know but little of the woe a poor man has to feel.
When I look on the spot of ground that is so dear to me,
I could curse the laws that have given me cause to depart for America.

"Oh, Erin machree, must our children be exiled all over the earth?
Will they evermore think of you, astore, and the land that gave them birth?
Must the Irish yield to the beasts of the field? Oh, no! acushla store machree,
They are coming back in ships, with vengeance on their lips, from the shore of America."

Among the Fenian poets of the present day there is but one that deserves the slightest shred of laurel. Charles J. Kickham, now under sentence of fourteen years' penal servitude in the prison at Dartmoor, has written two or three ballads of genuine merit, which the people have at once adopted as household songs. His "Rory of the Hills" is the finest of the genuine Fenian ballads. It begins—

"'That rake up near the rafters,
Why leave it there so long?'
The handle, of the best of ash,
Is smooth and straight and strong.
And, mother, will you tell me
Why did my father frown,
When to make hay in summer time
I climbed to take it down?'
She looked into her husband's eyes,
While her own with light did fill,
'You 'll shortly know the reason why,'
Says Rory of the Hill."

The love songs are more numerous and of higher quality than the patriotic. The pulses of the heart are free, and its utterance clearer in human love than in that for the country. Nevertheless, the love songs of a modern date are inferior to those written in the Irish language. There is nothing to compare with such gems of ancient melody as "The Cooleen," "Cashel of Munster," "Youghal Harbor," "The Exile's Flower of Love," "Maire in Milleoin," and many more, which make the Irish poetry of love hardly inferior to that of Scotland even. Translations of the ancient Irish love songs, transmogrified though they may be into barbarous verse, are still among the most popular favorites, and their expressions and images are to be found in almost every song of modern date.

There is one thing particularly noticeable about all these ballads, and that is the utter absence of licentiousness or vulgarity. There is in but very few even that plainness of speech which could be called coarseness in refined society. This is a fact that speaks volumes for the native purity of the Irish heart. The Irish peasant girls are the most virtuous of their class and condition in the world. This is owing to the influence of the confessional and the strong feeling of family pride, which retains its hold on even the poorest, as well as to the custom of universal and early marriage. Not but there are cases of unfortunates who have "made a slip," and are obliged to flee from the wrath of their kindred with base-born offspring in their arms, to tramp the roads in beggary, or herd in vice and misery in colonies, of which the "Wrens" of the Curragh of Kildare are by no means solitary specimens. But the cases are comparatively few, although the ballads often relate such homely tragedies.

* Street Ballads. Cork, 1866. Street Ballads. Dublin. 1866.

Bits of poetry can be picked out of almost every love ballad of description or feeling, as witness the following:

"One pleasant evening, when pinks and daisies Closed in their bosoms one drop of dew."

. . . . . .

"'Twas on a bright morning in summer,
I first heard his voice spakin' low,
As he said to the colleen beside me—
'Who 's that purty girl milking her cow?'"

. . . . . .

"My love is far fairer than the bright summer's day,
His breath is far sweeter than the new-mown hay,
His hair shines like gold revived by the sun,
And he takes his denomination from the Drien Dhun." *

. . . . . .

"Her hands are whiter than the snow
Upon the mountain side,
And softer than the creamy foam
That floats upon the tide."

. . . . . .

"More welcome than the blossom to the weary, dusty bee."

The "lamentations" or confessions of condemned criminals come next in point of popularity, murder next to love being the most entrancing theme for the uncultivated muse. The "lamentations" supply the place of the reports in Police Gazettes of more cultivated lands, and all follow a stereotyped pattern. The first verse begins with a soliloquy by the prisoner on his unfortunate condition and impending fate; then an account is given in the third person, varying at will to the first, of the particulars of the tragedy, concluding invariably with an appeal, in the first person, to all good Christians to pray for his soul, and a regret at the disgrace he has brought upon his relatives. The death penalty has not of late been inflicted for political offences, and it is seldom now, in comparison with the good old times, that agrarian troubles lead to tragical results. The shooting of an agent or a landlord and the consequent hanging of the murderer, once of common enough occurrence, are now seldom known, and the martyr element in these ballads, the cursing of the cruel laws, and the exhortation of vengeance on the informer, are extinct also.

The lamentations are of more unequal merit, and generally inferior to the love songs. They are seldom adapted even to the melancholy melodies in which Irish music is so abundant. Once in a while is a touch of untaught pathos:

"The anguish of a troubled heart no mortal tongue can tell,"

"The mother got distracted, and fell to deep despair
With the wringing of her hands and the tearing of her hair."

There is one of these lamentations which is occasionally to be met with in a bunch of modern ballads, although it is upwards of eighty years old, which is of singular strength and pathos. It is sung to a sweet and melancholy air, and may be occasionally heard at wakes in the County Waterford, around the Loomeragh Mountains, where William Crotty, a notorious highwayman and robber, lived. The air, when sung in the presence of the dead, and in the stillness of the hushed faces around, generally by a woman, is profoundly touching. It is the prisoner's wife who laments:

"William Crotty, I often tould you
That David Norris would have sould you,
In your bed, as you lay sleeping,
And lave me here in sorrow weeping.
Oh! hone, O!

"O! the judge, but he was cruel.
Refused a long day to my jewel.
Sure I thought that you would may be
See the face of your poor baby.
Oh! hone, O!"

Among the narrative ballads of the present time occurrences in America, particularly of the war, are very prominent. Among a people almost every one of whom looks on America as a future home, or has one or more relatives in it, the war was of absorbing interest, and was a fruitful source of profit to the ballad singers. As a general thing, the sympathies of the Irish peasantry were with the majority of their kindred in the North. The acts of the substitute brokers in enlisting emigrants just landed did not fail to be noticed, and "the glorious victory of seven Irishmen over the kidnapping Yankees in New York" relates the defeat of a party of such by the blackthorns of the "sons of Granua Vaile." The Know-Nothing excitement also produced its crop of ballads; "the pulling down of the chapels by the infidel New Lights in America" had more than one veracious chronicler, and the burning or wreck of any emigrant ship is straightway told in doleful verse. The mundane affairs of Pope Pius are a fruitful subject. O'Connell's death produced more elegies—than there were hairs on his head, we were going to say—but he wore a wig. Napoleon's downfall has not yet passed to oblivion as a subject of lamentation, and almost every priest or popular landlord is honored at his death with an extemporized effusion.

The eulogies of person or place, a gentleman or his seat, are innumerable, and in these the climax of absurdity is reached. The themes which sometimes stir the simplest mind to poetry are absent; gratitude, prospective or retrospective, for food and whiskey, is the only incentive, and the result is a "composition," as the bards are fond of terming their productions, which the broadest imagination must fail to burlesque. The longest words, the wildest metaphors, the most outrageous anti-climaxes and misapplied long words, given, as O'Connell called a witness a "naufragous ruffian" because it sounded well, are the main staple of these performances.

We should like to say a word concerning the wealth of old ballad poetry, which the extinction of the Irish as a living language has destroyed in the hearts and tongues of the people, but a portion of which has been preserved in collections more or less complete by the few who have seen their merit, and translated them well or ill into language by which they can be known to the general English reader; but even to glance at their characteristics, or to give any intelligible idea of their nature, would require a larger space than has been already occupied.

* Brown thorn.

GOLDWIN SMITH'S THREE ENGLISH STATESMEN.*

We are reminded of our long delay in calling attention to the work before us by the news which comes to us from the other side of the water that the author is about to take up his abode in this country for as long a period as may be necessary to complete a book on civilization in the United States, which he has now in contemplation. He feels, we believe, that the political work on which he has for so many years been engaged in England is done. When he entered upon it, the popular cause received little or no assistance from men of culture. Before the passage of the last Reform bill the ranks were crowded with members of the universities, and hundreds of pens and tongues which had received the highest training were employed in laboring for the political and social elevation of the great mass of Englishmen. The step has been taken which makes the working-classes to a large extent the arbiter of their own destinies. Whether they will go any further in the work of political change it now rests with themselves to say. Mr. Smith feels, we believe, that he may safely and honorably do what enfeebled health and his own tastes have long prompted him to do—retire for a season, at least, from the political arena and devote himself to the arts which he has always loved best, and to the successful cultivation of which he has owed nearly all his success as a politician.

As a politician he has had some necessary, and, we may add, honorable, defeats—defeats which he shares with Mr. Gladstone, with Falkland, with Hampden, with Fletcher of Saltoun, with Romilly, with every man who, having in the closet produced and cherished a high and pure idea, brings it down with him into the tumult of the forum, and seeks to realize it or exact its realization of others engaged in the practice of politics. Such men cannot but be exacting, cannot but be hard to satisfy. They would lose half their value if they were not. It is only by being exacting, and exacting to the verge of intolerance, that they can ever keep the eyes of the common herd of politicians fixed on any standard higher than that which their own petty interests and small passions may create. Goldwin Smith, too, made his entry into political life when all or nearly all men of education who took any part in politics had become deeply imbued with the Palmerstonian feeling about politics—that it was absurd in a gentleman to get excited about them, and that earnestness was a sign of wildness. The appearance of a man of his temperament and tone in the field was almost as distasteful as the appearance of a Puritan amongst Rupert's horse, and the easy-going Liberals found him a fellow-soldier whose ardor made both march and bivouac anything but easy, and who, not sparing himself, forgave nobody else for taking his ease.

He has had no equal amongst modern English writers and politicians in that most difficult and yet most useful art, the extraction from history, for contemporary use, of doctrine, of reproof, and of instruction. There is no greater master of the earnest rhetorical style living, and he has the power of saturating his brain with his subject, if we may so speak, before beginning to treat it, in a degree to which few if any modern writers have ever attained.

The three essays on Pym, Cromwell, and Pitt are excellent specimens of what he can do in this field. They are, though in form simply historical essays by a professor of history, in reality political articles written by a practical politician in the service of a momentous though peaceful revolution, and, in fact, that they are really this, and little else, is their raison d'être. He makes no contributions to our stock of knowledge regarding either of the three, and does not by any means exhaust, it is evident, his store of comment or generalization. But he so handles them and the times in which they lived as to make their lives a great political lesson. Pym is his typical member of Parliament, his typical constitutional reformer, his typical gentleman devoted to public affairs; Cromwell his typical democratic chief, brought to the front by bloody revolution; Pitt the typical aristocratic minister, though he divides him into two—one, the ante-revolutionary reforming Pitt; the other, the post-revolutionary repressive, coercive Pitt, contending vainly with the forces of a new age. In treating the latter the author draws a vigorous picture, though in very few strokes, of the political degradation by which Pitt was surrounded, of that ripeness for the reforming sickle which the English Government of that day showed.

* "Three English Statesmen: A Course of Lectures on the Political History of England. By Goldwin Smith." New York: Harper & Brothers. 1867.

There is hardly a page which does not contain some bit of political wisdom worth pondering and retaining. Some of the applications of the lessons the author makes to the circumstances and men of our own time are, to our minds, so direct and pointed as to injure the literary finish of the essays, which would, as political homilies, have, we think, been more effective if their precise bearing on modern politics had been oftener left to the reader to decide for himself. But even as works of art the essays will repay the most careful study. In days when most political writers are either mere bloated enthusiasts, panting and groaning with every blow they receive, or else awkward louts, half whose blows are foul, and whose clumsy violence makes all their blows ineffective, it is a real treat—we hope Mr. Smith will forgive us the simile—to have a real master of the manly art show us what training can do for eye and hand and wind and muscle.

Leaves from the Journal of our Life in the Highlands from 1848 to 1861. Edited by Arthur Helps. (New York: Harper & Bros. 1868.)—There is really very little to "notice" in the Queen's second volume. There are only a few pages in it which can be said to be more than a mere itinerary, and these were all published by the daily papers within a few days of the appearance of the book. Of the work itself, taken as a whole, we have much the same opinion that we expressed about the former volume. It reveals the Queen to the public as a model wife and mother; that is, as a much better specimen of what is called "the true woman" than the world at large was disposed to believe a queen could be, or ever was; but it unquestionably helps to make queens qud queens seem of very much less value than the world was disposed to think them. For this reason we look on the publication of this volume as another political mistake—as one of the many incidents which are day by day loosening the hold of feudal royalty and feudal aristocracy on the popular imagination. We do not rejoice at this; we regret it. If we are to have monarchies, we prefer monarchies like Queen Victoria's, based on sentiment, to monarchies of the new Cæsarist type, based on force and existing by the will of the Zouaves. But we fear Queen Victoria has done more than any one has ever done to make monarchy based on sentiment impossible. People may weep as much as they please over the charming picture of her domestic life she draws in this volume; but no nation will ever, in this age of the world, long surround with veneration an office which it is told can be filled with great credit and perfect efficiency by an excellent woman, of very moderate abilities, very imperfect education, entirely absorbed in her husband and children, thinking his thoughts, repeating his most commonplace sayings as the profoundest wisdom, and making his comfort and happiness the great object of her life. Burke denounced very fiercely the French Jacobins for "tearing off all the decent drapery of life," "all the superadded ideas furnished from the wardrobe of the moral imagination," and maintaining that "a king is but a man and a queen but a woman;" but we doubt if their "scheme of things" was ever more effectually aided than by the revelations of life at the English Court which are now being delivered to the public.

The share of Mr. Arthur Helps in the undertaking is only justifiable on the theory that kings are the anointed of the Lord, and that a "divinity" hedges them about. But this theory has not been recognized in England since 1688. Looking at the Queen in the character assigned her by the English Constitution, his preface is very amusing reading, though when one remembers his claims on the gratitude and respect of the reading world it is worse than amusing. If anybody wants a really merry half-hour, however, we recommend him to the reviews of the book which have appeared in the English Radical papers. These journals try, and have always tried, to atone for their radicalism in politics by being far more loyal than the Tories, and they accordingly almost go into hysterics over the "Journal in the Highlands." The Morning Star recommends the issue of a cheap edition, and roars for a circulation of two or three hundred thousand, like that of "Uncle Tom's Cabin."

There is only one feature in the book which tends to give even a shade of unpleasant feeling with regard to the Queen personally, and this is the picture of complete absorption in her personal interests and enjoyments which it presents. But this may be, and doubtless is, due to the exclusion, of which Mr. Helps speaks, of all matter of a political character or bearing.

UNITED STATES BANKRUPT LAW.

LITTLE, BROWN & CO.,

110 Washington Street, Boston,

Have just Published

THE BANKRUPT ACT OF 1867,

Compared with the Act of 1841, the English Bankrupt Law, and the Insolvent Law of Massachusetts. With a Digest of Decisions of the Courts of the United States, the several States, and of England; and with Forms of Proceeding. By Edward Avery and George M. Hobbs. 8vo, law sheep, $4 50.

"In preparing this edition of the Bankrupt Law the Editors have not intended to present a treatise on Bankruptcy, but simply to take the statute as it stood, and so arrange the notes and references as to present the leading cases under their appropriate heads.

"By sub-dividing the sections, and placing notes under each sub-division, it was believed that those consulting the law would find the authorities much more readily than by any other arrangement.

"Wherever the law has presented particular terms, or the authorities have seemed conflicting, such suggestions have been made as would lead to fuller and more critical examination than the scope of this work required.

"Much of the matter was prepared for their own practice, and the arrangement is that which they have found most convenient; and it is believed the work will be of service, not only to the profession, but will aid the business community in obtaining a better understanding of the scope, purpose, and principles of the law."—Preface.

"The arrangement we consider to be simple and convenient. The notes contain a reference to all the cases bearing upon the preceding section, and the points decided in these cases are very clearly and concisely stated. The improvements often made on the original head-notes show how thoroughly the editors have done their work. As a manual, we cordially recommend this book to the profession, and do not hesitate to affirm that it is the best work on the Bankrupt Law of 1867 which has appeared."—American Law Review.

"The profession, especially those who may be engaged in cases of bankruptcy, will gladly avail themselves of this very essential aid to practice. It is prepared with great care, and the volume contains all that is needful to a thorough comprehension of the Bankrupt Law."—New Bedford Mercury.

"The simple arrangement of this volume, by which immediate reference can be made to any point, ought to recommend it to the profession."—Philadelphia Press.

THE DIVINE PROVIDENCE.

By EMANUEL SWEDENBORG.

1 vol. 12mo, extra cloth, bevelled boards, gilt top, $1 25.

The object of this work is to unfold the laws of order according to which the Lord's moral government is regulated. It shows that the Divine Providence works according to certain invariable laws; that it is universal, extending to the least things as well as to the greatest; that it has respect to what is eternal with man, and to things temporary only for the sake of what is eternal.

All the writings of Swedenborg and collateral works constantly on hand.

Publishing House of the New Jerusalem Church, 20 Cooper Union, New York.

JOS. R. PUTNAM, Manager.

 SEND FOR A CATALOGUE.

The Christian, 60 Cents!

A large, live, eight-page monthly religious and family paper, containing facts, incidents, tales, sketches, music, poetry, true stories, pictures, reading for young, old, saints, sinners, one and all. No sectarianism, controversy, politics, puffs, pills, or patent medicines. 60 cents a year; 10 copies $5. For Sunday-schools, 10 copies, $4. Send 10 cents for three specimen copies before you forget it. Vol. III. begins January, 1868. 1,000 pages new, live tracts for $1. Address H. L. HASTINGS, Tract Repository, 19 Lindall Street, Boston, Mass.

THE WIDOW BEDOTT PAPERS.

By FRANCES M. WHITCHER.

WITH AN INTRODUCTION BY ALICE B. NEAL.

A NEW EDITION.

With Eight spirited Illustrations.

1 vol. 12mo, 403 pages, price $1 75.

Sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of price.

OAKLEY & MASON, Publishers,

21 Murray Street.

J. B. Lippincott & Co.

HAVE JUST ISSUED:

THE CHRISTIAN COMMISSION.

Annals of the United States Christian Commission. By the Rev. Lemuel Moss, Home Secretary of the Commission. With Illustrations. One vol. 8vo, containing 752 pages, toned paper, fine cloth, bevelled boards, price $4 50.

THE DERVISHES.

History of the Dervishes; or, Oriental Spiritualism. By John P. Brown, Interpreter of the American Legation at Constantinople. With Twenty-four Illustrations. One vol. crown 8vo, cloth, $3 50.

THE SCIENCE OF KNOWLEDGE,

Theoretically and Practically Considered. By J. G. Fichte. Translated from the German by A. E. Kroeger. 12mo, tinted paper, cloth, bevelled boards, $2.

WITH THE FRENCH IN MEXICO.

By J. F. Elton, late of the 98th regiment. Frontispiece. Three Maps and Forty Illustrations. 8vo, cloth, price $2 50.

THE WHITE ROSE.

A Novel. By G. J. Whyte Melville, author of "Cerise," "Digby Grand," "The Gladiators," etc. 12mo, cloth, $1 50.

SKETCHES OF CENTRAL ASIA.

Sketches of Central Asia. Additional Chapters on my Travels and Adventures, and on the Ethnology of Central Asia. By Arminius Vambery. 8vo, cloth, $3 75.

 These works are for sale by booksellers generally, or will be sent by mail on receipt of price by

J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO.,

Publishers,

PHILADELPHIA.

HARPER & BROTHERS,

NEW YORK,

HAVE JUST READY,

THE COMPLETION OF MOTLEY'S HISTORY OF THE NETHERLANDS. A History of the United Netherlands. From the Death of William the Silent to the Twelve Years' Truce—1609. By J. LOTHROP MOTLEY, D.C L., author of "The Rise of the Dutch Republic." In four volumes. With portraits. 8vo, cloth, $14.

The Volumes sold separately at $3 50 each.

DR. SMITH'S SMALLER HISTORY OF ENGLAND. A Smaller History of England, from the Earliest Times to the Year 1862. Edited by WILLIAM SMITH, LL.D. Illustrated by Engravings on Wood. 16mo, cloth, $2.

Uniform with Dr. Smith's Smaller Histories of Greece and Rome.

QUEEN VICTORIA'S JOURNAL. Leaves from the Journal of our Life in the Highlands, from 1848 to 1861. To which are prefixed and added Extracts from the same Journal giving an Account of Earlier Visits to Scotland, and Tours in England and Ireland, and Yachting Excursions. Edited by ARTHUR HELPS. 12mo, morocco cloth, bevelled edges, $1 75.

QUEEN VICTORIA'S MEMOIR OF THE PRINCE CONSORT. The Early Years of his Royal Highness the Prince Consort. Compiled under the Direction of her Majesty the Queen, by Lieutenant-General the Hon. C. GREY. Portraits. New Edition. 12mo, morocco cloth, bevelled edges, $2.

SMILES'S HISTORY OF THE HUGUENOTS. The Huguenots: their Settlements, Churches, and Industries in England and Ireland. By SAMUEL SMILES, author of "Self-Help," etc. Crown 8vo, cloth, bevelled edges, $1 75.

DU CHAILLU'S GORILLA COUNTRY. Stories of the Gorilla Country. Narrated for Young People. By PAUL B. DU CHAILLU, author of "Discoveries in Equatorial Africa," Profusely Illustrated. 12mo, cloth, $1 75.

MRS. COMFORT'S FAIRY STORIES. Folks and Fairies: Stories for Little Children. By LUCY RANDALL COMFORT. With Engravings. Square 4to, cloth, $1.

BARNES'S EVIDENCES OF CHRISTIANITY. Lectures on the Evidences of Christianity in the Nineteenth Century. Delivered in the Mercer Street Church, New York, January 21 to February 21, 1867. On the "Ely Foundation" of the Union Theological Seminary. By ALBERT BARNES, author of "Notes on the New Testament," etc. 12mo, morocco cloth, bevelled edges, $1 75.

THE LOVER'S DICTIONARY: A Poetical Treasury of Lovers' Thoughts, Fancies, Addresses, and Dilemmas, Indexed with nearly Ten Thousand References as a Dictionary of Compliments and Guide to the Study of the Tender Science. Post 8vo, cloth, $3 50; gilt edges, $4 25.

THREE ENGLISH STATESMEN: Pym, Cromwell, and Pitt. A Course of Lectures on the Political History of England. By GOLDWIN SMITH, author of "Lectures on the Study of History," etc. 12mo, cloth, $1 50.

THE NEW NOVELS

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS,

New York:

A FRENCH COUNTRY FAMILY. By Mme. DE WITT, née GUIZOT. Translated by DINAH MULOCK CRAIK, author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," "A Noble Life," "Christian's Mistake," "Two Marriages," etc. Illustrations. 12mo, cloth, $1 50.

BROWNLOWS. By Mrs. OLIPHANT, author of "Agnes," "Madonna Mary," "The Laird of Norlaw," "The Days of my Life," "Carlingford," "Life of Edward Irving," etc. 8vo, paper, 38 cents.

MARGARET'S ENGAGEMENT. 8vo, paper, 50 cents.

PLAYING FOR HIGH STAKES. By ANNIE THOMAS, author of "On Guard," "Dennis Donne," "Theo Leigh," "Walter Goring," "Played Out," "Called to Account," etc. 8vo, paper, 25 cents.

GUILD COURT: A London Story. By GEORGE MACDONALD, author of "Annals of a Quiet Neighborhood," "Alec Forbes," etc. 8vo, paper, 50 cents.

THE BROTHERS' BET; or, Within Six Weeks. By EMILIE FLYGARE CARLEN. 8vo, paper, 25 cents.

THE HUGUENOT FAMILY. By SARAH TYTLER. 12mo, cloth, $1 50.

MABEL'S PROGRESS. By the author of "Aunt Margaret's Trouble." 8vo, paper, 50 cents.

THE WATERDALE NEIGHBORS. By the author of "Paul Massie." 8vo, paper, 50 cents.

CARLYON'S YEAR. By the author of "Lost Sir Massingberd." 8vo, paper, 25 cents.

STONE EDGE: A Tale. 8vo, paper, 25 cents.

 HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

Messrs. HURD & HOUGHTON,

459 BROOME STREET, NEW YORK,

Beg to announce that they will publish,

SATURDAY, February 15,

I. THE GREAT EXHIBITION, with Continental Sketches, Practical and Humorous. By HOWARD PAYSON ARNOLD, author of "European Mosaic." In 1 vol. 16mo, price $2 25.

 Mr. Arnold has been for the past two years the regular correspondent of the Boston Post, and his weekly letters have been extensively read and copied by all the principal papers in the country. In this new publication are embraced, in the shape of valuable and permanent essays, the results of many original studies and careful observations in various out-of-the-way places, and on numerous odd subjects that are seldom treated of by modern tourists.

II. GRANDPA'S HOUSE. By HELEN C. WEEKS, author of "Ainslee," etc. With six full-page illustrations by Geo. G. White. 16mo, price $1 50.

 Mrs. Weeks is known to all readers of the Riverside Magazine by her stories of "Ainslee and Sinny." The truthfulness, sprightliness, and fidelity to nature shown in the story place the author in the first rank of writers for children, while older readers will be surprised at discovering how much real literary power is displayed in this simple narrative of children's life. No portion of the book has appeared in the magazine.

III. CAKES AND ALE AT WOODBINE. From Twelfth Night to Christmas. By BARRY GRAY, author of "Married Life at Hillside," etc., etc. 1 vol. crown 8vo, price $1 75.

 Uniform with Barry Gray's other works.

NOW READY:

A LIFE AMONG THE MORMONS.

BY A U. S. OFFICER, NOW LIVING IN UTAH.

This book gives a graphic description of the manners and habits of the Mormon people, and is of thrilling interest. Finely illustrated.

Price $1 25, cloth.

Sent postage paid on receipt of price.

MOORHEAD, SIMPSON & BOND,

PUBLISHERS,

61 Duane Street, New York.

VALUABLE NEW TEXT-BOOKS.

NOW READY.

EASY FRENCH READING.

Being Selections of Historical Tales and Anecdotes, arranged with Copious Foot-notes, containing Translations of the Principal Words, a Progressive Development of the Forms of the Verb, with Designations of the Use of Prepositions and Particles, and the Idioms of the Language. 16mo, cloth, price $1.

This volume is on a unique plan, and has been prepared in consequence of the remarkable success of "Easy German Reading" on the same plan, lately published. While that book has already been adopted by several eminent teachers, it is peculiarly fitted for self-instruction.

CONDENSED FRENCH INSTRUCTION.

Consisting of Grammar and Exercises with Cross References. By C. J. DELILLE. First American from the thirteenth London edition. 18mo, cloth, 50 cents.

"An excellent elementary text-book. . . . . The author has shown much discrimination in the selection of these exercises, which seem chosen with the double purpose of furnishing a useful vocabulary to the beginner and of bringing out the most important principles of grammar. The grammatical portion of the book is excellently arranged, the principles clearly stated, and the verb, the pièce de resistance for young scholars, carefully arranged, is placed most conveniently at the end."—Nation.

LANDMARKS OF ANCIENT HISTORY.

12mo, cloth, $1 50.

Being Part III. of Miss Yonge's Landmarks of History. Parts I. (Ancient History) and II. (Mediæval History) have already been received with distinguished favor.

The reader is invited to send for our COMPLETE CATALOGUE, which will be sent, post-paid, to ANY ONE who applies. It contains titles and descriptions of many valuable works kindred to those named above, and will be found valuable by students of FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN, SPANISH, PORTUGUESE, EARLY ENGLISH, SAXON, HEBREW, the CLASSICS, or GENERAL PHILOLOGY, and also by persons seeking MISCELLANEOUS BOOKS for public or private LIBRARIES.

LEYPOLDT & HOLT, Publishers,

451 Broome Street, New York.

PUBLISHED THIS DAY.

THE LAST TWO VOLUMES OF THE

SELECT WORKS OF J. K. PAULDING.

I.

A BOOK OF VAGARIES.

With a Portrait of the Author.

II.

THE DUTCHMAN'S FIRESIDE.

* A Novel. Edited by WILLIAM I. PAULDING.

Each 1 vol. crown 8vo, cloth, each $2 50.

These volumes are uniform with the "Literary Life of James K. Paulding," the "Tales of the Good Woman," and "The Bulls and Jonathans." The five together comprise all the writings of this distinguished and popular author worthy permanent preservation. The collection is the Standard Edition of the works of Mr. Paulding, and it should have a place in every library which contains the productions of leading American authors.

JUST READY:

FORTIETH THOUSAND OF KATHRINA: Her Life and Mine, in a Poem. By J. G. HOLLAND (Timothy Titcomb). 1 vol. 12mo, cloth, $1 50; full gilt, $2 50.

SIXTH THOUSAND OF

PRAYERS FROM PLYMOUTH PULPIT. By HENRY WARD BEECHER. 1 vol. 12mo, cloth, plain, $1 75; gilt, $2 50.

THIRD AND NEW EDITION OF THE

QUEENS OF AMERICAN SOCIETY. By Mrs. E. F. ELLET. 1 vol. crown 8vo, with fourteen steel engravings, by Hall, Ritchie, and others. Price $3.

ALSO, JUST PUBLISHED,

EIGHTY YEARS OF REPUBLICAN GOVERNMENT IN THE UNITED STATES. By LOUIS J. JENNINGS. 1 vol. 12mo, cloth, $1 75.

FRED, AND MARIA, AND ME. By the author of the "Flower of the Family." Illustrated by W. MAGRATH. Second edition. 1 vol. square 16mo, cloth, full gilt, $1 50.

EXTEMPORARY PREACHING. By F. BARHAM ZINCKE. 1 vol. 12mo, cloth, $1 50.

LANGUAGE AND THE STUDY OF LANGUAGE. By WILLIAM DWIGHT WHITNEY. Third edition. 1 vol. crown 8vo, cloth, $2 50.

SHORT STUDIES ON GREAT SUBJECTS. By JAS. ANTHONY FROUDE, M.A. Third edition. 1 vol. crown 8vo, uniform with the History of England, cloth, $3.

THE OLD ROMAN WORLD. By JOHN LORD, LL.D. Third edition. 1 vol. crown 8vo, cloth, $3.

THANKSGIVING. By WILLIAM ADAMS, D.D. Second edition. 1 vol. 12mo, cloth, $2.

PAULDING'S SELECT WORKS. Bulls and Jonathans. Tales of the Good Woman. Each 1 vol. crown 8vo, cloth, each $2 50.

DAY'S COMPOSITION. Third edition. DAY'S DISCOURSE. Second edition. Each 1 vol., cloth, $1 50.

 These works are for sale by all Booksellers, or they will be sent, post-paid, by the Publishers to any address upon receipt of the price.

CHARLES SCRIBNER & CO.,

654 Broadway, New York.

ENLARGED, IMPROVED, REGENERATED.

1868. MERRY'S MUSEUM. 1868.

An Illustrated Magazine for Boys and Girls. Twenty-eighth year of publication. Vol. I. New series commenced with the issue of the January number. A specimen number of "Merry's Museum" will be furnished gratis. Single subscriptions, one year in advance, $1 50. Special terms to clubs.

AGENTS.—One thousand good canvassers, male and female, are wanted to obtain subscribers for "Merry's Museum." Specimen numbers and circulars furnished on application. For terms, which are very liberal, address

H. B. FULLER, Publisher,

245 Washington Street, Boston.

The Nation.

VOL. VI.—NO. 138. THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 20, 1868. { FIVE DOLLARS PER ANNUM. TWELVE CENTS PER COPY.

CONTENTS.

THE WEEK 141

EDITORIAL ARTICLES:
The Reconstruction Process 144
The Chinese Embassy to Christendom 145
The Use of the Supreme Court to the Union 146

Authors versus Readers 147
England 148

CORRESPONDENCE:
The Supreme Court and Congress .. 150
Mr. Bagehot's View of the Executive 150
The Late Peter Force 150

NOTES:
Literary 150

Badeau's Grant 152
Agassiz in Brazil 153
Recent Republications.—The Voice in Singing.—History of the Microscope, etc.—The Poetry of Compliment and Courtship.—Time and Tide, by Weare and Tyne.—Gemma 154, 155, 156, 157

Five Dollars per annum, in advance; Six months, Three Dollars; Forty Dollars to Clubs of Ten; Clergymen, Four Dollars.

THE NATION is sent till positively ordered discontinued, and all arrears have been paid. Subscribers are particularly requested to note the expiration of their subscriptions, and to forward what is due for the ensuing year, with or without further reminder from this office.

GEORGE STREET, 30 CORNHILL, LONDON, E. C., AGENT FOR THE RECEIPT OF SUBSCRIPTIONS AND ADVERTISEMENTS.

E. L. GODKIN & CO., PUBLISHERS, Box 6732, NEW YORK CITY.

The Week.

THERE has been but one speech on reconstruction in the Senate this week. It was by Mr. Garret Davis, who proposed that, as the South had suffered enough, all the reconstruction bills should be repealed. In the House on the same day, the 11th, the bill introduced by Mr. Banks for the protection of American citizens abroad was discussed, and met with much opposition. President Johnson's letter in reply to Grant, accompanied by letters from members of the Cabinet, was laid before the House, which, by resolution, called for General Grant's rejoinder. On Wednesday, in the Senate, Mr. Sherman introduced his bill providing for the immediate admission of Alabama. It declares that the people of Alabama, assembled in convention, have formed a constitutional government, which has been ratified by a majority of all voters who voted on the question, and that therefore the State is entitled to be restored to her old relations with the Union. The Appropriation bill—judicial, legislative, and executive—occupied the House, and Mr. Banks's bill above-mentioned was discussed. On Thursday, the Senate went back to the case of Mr. Thomas, senator elect from Maryland, and opposition stronger than was expected to his admission became evident. A case precisely the same in principle was, on the same day, settled in the House; Mr. J. Y. Brown, for saying, in 1861, that any Kentuckian joining the Lincoln army ought to be "shot down in his tracks," was declared ineligible to the office of representative in Congress. During the debate, Mr. Sumner cited out of Sallust the case of a certain senator who put his son to death for engaging in a conspiracy, and he thought that though Thomas should not have slain his son, he should have had him arrested. By an odd coincidence, Mr. Sumner quoted in the Senate, while Mr. Dawes, speaking on the Brown case, was quoting in the House, certain lines beginning,

"I hear a lion in the lobby roar."

On Friday, the Senate had the case up again. The probability that Mr. Thomas will be refused admission seemed to increase. The gift of one hundred dollars to his son who was about to join the rebel army seems to be the point relied on to secure his rejection. As a precedent, his rejection is not necessary. On Saturday, the Senate was not in session; the House continued consideration of the Kentucky expulsion case, and refused Mr. Smith, the contestant, the seat to which Mr. Brown has been elected. On Monday, Mr. Bingham brought in a substitute for the Senate bill in relation to Alabama. It differs from Mr. Sherman's in little except its wording. Both ignore the provision of the Reconstruction Act which requires that a majority of all qualified voters should vote on the question of ratification, both refuse a new election, and both admit Alabama to the Union almost at once. Mr. Bingham's goes into details more, and insists on the ratification by the State Legislature of the amendment to the Constitution and the passage of an impartial suffrage act. There will be no difficulty in harmonizing the provisions of the two bills. The Senate Judiciary Committee, on the same day, reported a bill declaring a majority of the votes actually cast in any of the elections held under the Reconstruction Act shall be sufficient. Mr. Trumbull offered a bill in regard to the jurisdiction of courts. In brief, it is this: The judicial power of the country, as many decisions of the Supreme Court testify, does not include political power, and reconstruction is a political business. So the bill, which seems to us a wise one, dismisses the McCardle case, and orders similar ones dismissed.

Both the Alabama bills substantially repeal the Reconstruction Act, as they provide not that a majority of the votes cast at an election to be hereafter held shall be sufficient to ensure the adoption of the constitution, but that a majority of the votes cast at an election which has already taken place, and in which a large body of voters abstained purposely from voting, as under the law they had a right to do, is sufficient. Either is, in other words, to all intents and purposes, an ex post facto law, and introduces an entirely new principle into reconstruction, throwing overboard that on which the process has hitherto proceeded, namely: that the new constitution ought to be such as the people of the State, minus certain defined exceptions, approve of. The abstaining of the Alabama whites was, no doubt, a demonstration of hostility to the Government; but it must be remembered that the law not only permitted, but suggested, that the new constitution might be opposed by simply staying away from the polls, as well as by voting. That provision was certainly a mistake. Everybody now admits this; but is not the way to rectify it to order another election with the stipulation that a majority shall suffice to adopt the constitution? Mr. Bingham's bill strikes us as in fact a trick in return for a trick; but is it dignified or wise for Congress to engage in a game of this sort with the Southern whites? The proceeding, too, though it will, of course, bring Alabama into the Union, can have no moral effect. The whites will not consider it in any way binding, and will break it up at the first opportunity. Moreover, the new bill makes no provision for the case of the other States, and therefore, if passed, is likely to throw the whole work of reconstruction into confusion. We say no more about it at present, however, because it is not likely that it is the plan which will be finally decided on.

In Florida, the seceding convention, led by a Mr. Liberty Billings, offers to rejoin the majority convention if Billings can be made the nominee of the convention for Congress. Mr. Alpeoria Bradley's private character is so bad that he has been expelled from the Georgia Convention by a unanimous vote; nothing is said against Mr. Billings's character, but if it were possible for the convention to send him—not to Congress, but out of the convention, Florida, we are very sure, would not in the least suffer. He is entirely destitute of qualification for the leadership of any class of voters yet existing in this country or any other. General Meade's advice to the two conventions to expunge their separate records, elect a new president, and begin work over again, has been taken. We hope sincerely there may arise some opportunity for General Meade to arrest Mr. Billings as an obstructor of reconstruction.

The Georgia Convention has, as we have said, honored itself by turning Mr. Bradley out of doors. His insolence while in power is said to have been quite equalled by his abjectness in disgrace, and there is no doubt that he has in profusion all the gifts of the lowest sort of demagogue. The convention is still at work, and is still almost or wholly without pay for its services. A petition to Congress for a loan to the State of $30,000,000, for the restoration of the agricultural interest, has been adopted—a substitute, possibly, for the wild confiscation measures which were to have been adopted "when the brutal African," etc. In Louisiana, a similar petition will be adopted. General Hancock, it is said, intends to order that the vote on the election of State officers shall be held on another day than the one appointed for voting on the ratification of the Constitution. The convention is of opinion that the popularity of candidates, and the interest taken in their fortunes, will tend to bring out a full vote. Perhaps General Hancock is of the same opinion, and perhaps he is of another; at all events, Senator Trumbull's bill, presented last Monday, most likely makes it a matter of perfect indifference whether the expected order is issued or not. The South Carolina Convention asks Congress for $4,000 with which to purchase lands for the homeless. General Canby, whose excellent administration of affairs in Louisiana procured him the sincere respect of every man in the State, though it once in a while made Radicals, and oftener Conservatives, grumble, is winning respect in the Carolinas also. There is little fear of intimidation of voters while he remains in command. In Arkansas, General Gillem has ordered the voting on the constitution, just completed, to begin on the 15th of March, and continue five days. In Virginia and Mississippi, work in convention is going on slowly; Mississippi has had her "personal difficulty," but no lives were lost.

As we said last week, the decision of the Supreme Court in the Mississippi and Georgia cases does not remove all cause for anxiety about the result of the McCardle case. The court, on Monday, denied Mr. Trumbull's motion to dismiss the case for an error of procedure, and the question of jurisdiction has, accordingly, still to be decided before the merits are reached. To meet the contingency of a decision adverse to the military authorities, Mr. Trumbull has introduced a new bill, which, it is thought, will be passed in lieu of the one about which we have heard so much lately, but which the Senate has judiciously let sleep. The last bill, which is No. 4, declares that Congress alone has the power to decide political questions—which the court has repeatedly acknowledged—that no civil governments, recognized as such by Congress, exist in any of the unreconstructed States; that reconstruction is a political process, and the reconstruction acts are political acts, the propriety and validity of which no judicial tribunal is competent to pass upon, and forbidding the court to entertain any process whatever arising under these acts. We have at last got into the right track, and we have to thank Mr. Trumbull for it. This bill exactly meets the case, and no more than the case. It prohibits the court from interfering with what is in reality, as we said some weeks ago, the making of a treaty of peace after a long and bloody war; but it does not doctor or manipulate the court, or curtail its jurisdiction in ordinary times and for ordinary cases, and does not treat it as the tool of the majority for the time being or as "the creature" of the legislature, and leaves its dignity unimpaired. When Congress, however, makes four or five experiments—as it has in this Supreme Court business—and at last settles down on a plan differing completely from all that have gone before, one cannot help reflecting with curiosity as well as anxiety on the mental condition of the party orators and editors, who, as each plan makes its appearance, swear before heaven that it is perfect in all its details, essential to the national salvation, and that anybody who doubts it is either a traitor or a blockhead, or both.

A correspondent of the Cincinnati Commercial, writing from Alabama, gives an interesting account of the election in that State, and of the cause of the defeat of the Constitution. He says the Conservative tactics were simple enough: There were 171,000 registered votes in the State; under the law 86,000, therefore, had to vote for or against the constitution to secure its adoption even by a majority; but if anything less than 86,000 voted for it, even if nobody voted against it, it was defeated. So they stayed away. A Conservative was asked by the correspondent if he did not think this "a little obliging" on the part of Congress, to which the unrepentant rebel replied, profanely, but with a good deal of truth, "Yes, sir, obliging out of pure d—d stupidity." The rebels ought in fact to erect a monument in some conspicuous place to the Previous Question.

The key of the position having been discovered, the plan of the Alabama Conservatives was of course simple and easy of execution. Each intelligent white man stayed away from the polls, and kept away also as many ignorant whites and negroes as he could, partly by false information, partly by intimidation, and partly by whisky. The correspondent of the Commercial mentions one conservative who "paired off" with fifteen different Radical voters. He confirms the opinion prevalent here, that the great hope of the malcontents at the South is, after all, in a Democratic victory in November; that for this they are waiting with confidence. It being clear that these men would sooner be disfranchised themselves than have the negro enfranchised, the question arises, what is the value of the "punishment" of disfranchisement, to the infliction of which we have all so long attached so much importance?

The latest symptoms of the growing weakness of the Western wing of the Republican party on the subject of the public credit, are Senator Sherman's consolidation bill—which threatens, by implication, that if the holders of bonds which now pay six per cent. in coin, and are worth 110 or 111 in the market, do not convert them at par into bonds of longer date, and paying only five per cent. interest, they will be paid off in paper—and General Logan's resolutions providing for the taxation of United States bonds to the extent of two per cent. per annum. If either of these projects were carried into execution, of course the national credit would be ruined. A forcible reduction of interest would be equivalent, in the eyes of the world, to repudiation, and so would taxation in defiance of our express agreement not to tax. A government which reserved the power of taxing its own obligations could of course not borrow money, for it might any day tax them out of existence; still less could a government which taxed them after agreeing not to tax them. We trust a little more discussion and reflection will show that the people are in this, as in other matters, at least as wise as their servants in Washington and more high-minded. Repudiation in any form may fairly be regarded as a surrender of the principle of nationality vindicated by the war, for it makes secession once more possible and probable. We have received since we last spoke of this subject the report of the Superintendent of Savings-Banks in this State, from which it appears that these institutions hold forty millions of United States bonds. Accurate returns from other States would probably show the amount of the savings of the poor invested in this way through the banks to be little, if any, short of two hundred millions.

The New York Times had a singular article on Monday, apropos of General Logan's resolutions looking to the taxation of the Government bonds. It did not deny that the public faith was pledged, when the loan was contracted, that the bonds should not be taxed, but declared that the people were determined not to endure their exemption any longer, and coolly informs the bondholders that "they will not be wise in attempting any resistance." The fact that exemption from taxation was one of the conditions on which the bonds were taken would be "sufficient," the writer says, "to close all abstract argument on the point. But government and politics are not conducted strictly according to abstract principles." We do not well know what is meant here by "abstract principles," but we do know that both politics and government have to be conducted, in order to succeed, on principles of common sense and common honesty. There is nothing "abstract" whatever about the nation's engagements with its creditors, nor will there be anything "abstract" about the swindle, if it swindles them. The whole affair is an ordinary promise to pay an ordinary debt. We trust, too, that the bondholder will not be bamboozled into taking a metaphysical view of his case, or of the people's behavior. Every bondholder, if he is either bullied by Senator Sherman's bill into exchanging his six per cent. for a five per cent. bond, or by General Logan's resolutions into submitting to taxation, will owe it to the great interests of morality, to the national honor and welfare, to cry out against the iniquity, to remind the world that a swindle committed by a million is as much a swindle as a swindle committed by one, that the moral law cannot be altered by a popular vote, and that either of the transactions which are now proposed, by way of lightening the public burdens, would sink the national credit below that of Greece, Spain, or Turkey, because those countries are poor, while the United States is rich. The assertion of the Times, by-the-by, that "the compulsory reduction of the interest is in accordance with the practice of England," is not only a very mischievous assertion, but has no foundation in fact. This story was concocted by that ingenious financier, General Butler, when he first introduced his little greenback scheme to public notice.

A curious theory of the law of commercial crises has just been propounded in England, at a meeting of the Manchester Statistical Association, by Mr. John Mills, a banker of great experience, and which takes these phenomena out of the domain of political economy, properly so-called, and places them in that of psychology. He says that commercial panics occur now every ten years, with almost perfect regularity, under all systems of currency and banking—for instance, both in England and America, in 1825–6, 1836–7, 1857, 1867—and, he believes, through the working of a law of the mind. He divides the commercial cycle into the post-panic period—one of great depression and timidity; the middle period—one of revived activity and renewed hope, though marked by caution; and the highly speculative period—when the whole machine is working at high pressure. He thinks the change which takes place in the personnel of most firms in the course of ten years, and the steady influx of young men into business, prevent the experience of one crisis being of much use in preventing others. The fact that in times of speculation able and experienced business men use their experience and sagacity rather in getting out themselves and getting their friends out before the crash comes, than in not going in at all or in repressing it, is also worth consideration.

We wish sincerely our leading agitators for the legislative interference between capital and labor had in their hands the French Almanach de Coöpération for the year 1868, which has just been published, and which contains in a series of able articles the experience of the large body of French working-men who, after long and bitter experience of various devices for bettering their condition, are now successfully engaged in co-operative industry. Their most striking feature is the supremacy they assign, in all efforts to raise the working-man in the social scale, to individual thrift, intelligence, and industry. They repudiate all state aid and state interference as a curse, and treat strikes as simply a clumsy and ineffective expedient for mitigating the hardships of a position which, whether wages be high or be low, is one of helplessness and dependence. We are glad to say the co-operative movement is making rapid strides in France, and the Schultze-Delitzsch co-operative banks have been introduced with eminent success. If our working-man pamphleteers and orators who are now clamoring so loudly for more wages and legalized short hours would lay down their pens, and go to work with their friends and neighbors to make their own wages and fix their own hours, they would do more for their own class and for society at large than they will ever do by political spouting.

The Globe, a new paper started in Paris, in telling the story of Train's arrest in Cork, mentions that he has claimed $500,000 damages of the British Government, but holds that he has erred in asking so much, inasmuch as the English law only allows him ten dollars for the first and twenty dollars for every succeeding hour of his detention in prison, and says the British Government is ready to pay him $1,500 as his lawful due under this tariff. We hope the great man will listen to the advice of a disinterested and well-informed neutral, and compromise with the unfortunate Derby, who, though he may err in judgment, can hardly be accused of malice.

The statement of the French Minister of Finance, M. Magne, has been laid before the world, and it is not a very hopeful document. The floating debt (unprovided for) amounts to $187,000,000. The revenue of 1867 shows a deficit of nearly $6,000,000, and added to this there is the expense of the expedition to Rome, and an extraordinary credit voted by the legislature in 1867, amounting in all to $69,000,000, for which funds have to be secured. Over and above all this there are the extraordinary military and naval expenses of the two coming years, caused by the increase in the army and the change in the weapons. So the minister proposes a new "popular loan" of $88,000,000, to be taken in twenty instalments extending over twenty months. The delay has been supposed by some to be a guarantee that there would be no war till the loan had been all paid up; but once a man begins to take the loan he is not likely to stop and forfeit his paid-up subscriptions because of an outbreak of hostilities. Moreover, a loan was issued on similar terms only four months before the Crimean war, and a fresh one was issued before all the instalments had been paid in. The loan will probably be offered on very low terms, which in other countries usually excites suspicion and makes bidders shy, but the effect on the French peasantry, who are large takers, is said to be very different. The easy terms they look on as a proof of the Emperor's "kind-heartedness." The financial future of France grows more and more cloudy.

The army bill has passed the French Senate, M. Michel Chevalier, the economist, enjoying the honor of voting against it in a minority of one. He made a powerful speech in opposition, setting forth what may be called the Cobden view of standing armies and international relations, and warning France that while the four great powers of Western Europe were wasting their resources and bringing on premature decline by their prodigious armaments, two great empires were rising in the East and West—Russia and the United States—which bid fair before many years to hold them all at their mercy. The bill is, however, very unpopular in the country districts. The private advices are unanimous on that point. The certainty of having to serve is a crushing blow to the young men.

Paris, on the other hand, as the seat of French thought, is rent and torn by the new Press bill, which bids fair to reduce newspapers to imbecility. M. Thiers, Pelletan, and Emile Ollivier have made eloquent speeches in opposition, but evidently to one of the least impressible audiences ever assembled in a great capital. The way in which business is conducted in the Corps Législatif may be guessed from the fact which has just transpired, that mistakes constantly occur in counting the vote in the divisions, which are never rectified and are treated by the president as of no consequence. The votes of members not present are put down frequently, and cases have occurred in which members, who did not wish to be disturbed when reading in the library, have requested friends in the Chamber to vote for them against "the order of the day." The effect of the press law is aggravated by the recent press prosecutions, which have resulted in ten convictions, the penalty being fines of two hundred dollars each. It may help to give an idea of the condition of the press in France to say that the court ruled that the papers, in commenting on the parliamentary debates, must not lay before their readers a chronological summary of the order of the debates, and must not mention "the impression produced on the Chambers by the speeches," or say that a particular speech "produced a considerable sensation and ultimately induced M. Rouher to break silence," or "give a picture of the physiognomy of a sitting," or say that "the debate was animated," or "reproduce textually" two extracts from a speech, or "analyze a speech," or "describe the impression produced on the Chamber" by certain speeches. The articles printed by the Fenian papers in Dublin are curious reading beside the reports of this trial in Paris.

Articles on any of the subjects usually discussed in this journal will be received from any quarter. If used, they will be liberally paid for; if rejected, they will be returned to the writers on the receipt of the requisite amount of postage stamps.

All Communications which pertain to the literary management of THE NATION should be addressed to the Editor.

THE RECONSTRUCTION PROCESS.

We believe the result of the late vote on the new constitution in Alabama is not yet accurately known, but it appears to be all but certain that the constitution has been rejected, not because the majority of the registered votes were cast against it, but because they were not cast for it. In other words, it appears that the Southern plan of registering and then staying away from the polls has been in a measure successful. This contingency was foreseen before Christmas, and Mr. Stevens introduced a bill providing that a majority of all votes cast should be sufficient for the adoption of the new constitutions, and it passed the House; but, like so many other measures conceived in that body, it was laid aside in the Senate, and now reposes there. The Senate was probably influenced in letting it drop by some very obvious reflections as to the effect on public sentiment of the adoption of a constitution by a small fraction of the legal votes of a State, and determined, whether wisely or unwisely remains to be seen, to stand by the original measure.

The situation now is, in plain terms, simply this: The execution of the plan of reconstruction on which Congress settled after two years of discussion and experiment has, after a full trial, in spite of all the encouragement it could receive from military commanders and Northern political organizations, been arrested by a cunning device of the Southern whites—of whites, too, whom it has not been possible to disfranchise for a share in the rebellion. One of the unfortunate results of the state of political feeling at the South is that the white population is nearly a unit. The disfranchising a large portion of it has not resulted in dividing it into two parties. On the contrary, it seems to have cemented it together more closely than ever. Those whom we have permitted to retain the franchise have used it to carry out the wishes and ideas of those from whom we have taken it away, and we have now proof of what all intelligent men have so long suspected, that the negro, even with the United States Government at his back, and his enemy's hands tied, is no match for him in the game of politics. If the white cannot influence him, he can intimidate him; and between influence and intimidation the white man, or, as it is the fashion to call him, "the unrepentant rebel," has even now, with all the restrictions which Congress has thought proper to impose on men of his class, with the United States troops keeping watch and ward over him, been able to have things his own way.

The question what is to be done is, therefore, fairly before the country as well as before Congress, and has to be answered at once. The majority in Congress have been for some time writhing under the delay in reconstruction from the consciousness that the party was suffering from it, and that if it were protracted much longer it would endanger the Presidential election. For this reason great exertions have been made to push it on in Alabama, so as to get one State in at least, and show that the thing could be done before the New Hampshire election. The present check is therefore a great disappointment from a party, as well as from a national, point of view. The Congressional leaders have therefore almost lost patience, and seem indisposed any longer to stick at trifles. The law under which the Alabama vote has just been taken prescribed distinctly who were to vote and who were to be excluded from voting, and ordained that unless a majority of the qualified voters whose names stood on the registry list voted for the constitutions which the conventions were to draw up, such constitutions would not be put in force or recognized by the United States Government. We dare say the intention of the framers of the Reconstruction bill and their expectation also were that all registered voters should vote, and that the decision should rest with the majority. The wording of the statute, however, makes refraining from voting altogether serve the same purpose as voting no, and the malcontents prefer it, as it enables them not only to defeat the constitutions, but to bring additional discredit on them by showing the world that only a very small proportion of the population takes any interest in them whatever, even enough to induce it to go to the polls. The intention of the framers of the bill is therefore defeated, and their expectation disappointed, and by the aid of instruments furnished by themselves. It is now proposed to disregard the provisions of the Reconstruction Act altogether, and to pass another which will bring in Alabama at once as she stands. The argument by which the New York Tribune—from which we always get more of the theory of Congressional doings than we ever get from Congress itself—justifies this proposal is substantially this: That the end and aim of the reconstruction process is, of course, first, the restoration of the Union and the protection of the loyal men of the South; now, those who vote against the new constitutions, and those who refrain from voting at all, are equally disloyal; those who vote for them are sure to be loyal, and these are and ought to be the first care of Congress. These, be they few or be they many, are the real "people" of the State. Therefore, though they be only "ten" in a State, when they bring us a constitution which complies with Congressional requirements, and ask us for admission to the Union, we are bound to recognize them as the State, and let them come in.

There are, however, two serious objections to it. A bill of the character now proposed, whatever else it might do, would not disguise or color the fact that Reconstruction Act No. 1, which we have all been defending so strenuously for the last year, had been abandoned by its authors as a failure. If this would not furnish a triumph to the "unrepentant rebels" and to the Northern Democrats, and would not do much to dishearten and disgust weak-kneed Republicans, they must be either more or less than human. The original Reconstruction Act, under which the election has just been held, defined the people of a Southern State to be all that portion of the population who should satisfy certain officials as to their qualifications and procure the inscription of their names on a certain register, and engaged that the State should be admitted to the Union under any constitution which a majority of these voters so registered formally approved of. The bill which it is now proposed to pass, however, would furnish an entirely new and contradictory definition of "the people"—making it that portion of the registered voters, be it large or small, which approved of a certain constitution. There is no way of making the last bill appear supplemental merely to the first one. It contradicts and supplants it. Whoever supports the one admits that the other was of no value. Therefore, we hold that the change, whether necessary or not, is a confession of failure, and will injure the party in a way which the failure without the confession could not have injured it.

But perhaps, even if it be a confession of failure, it is the best way out of the difficulty, and, although it may injure the party, it will serve the cause. To this, we regret to say, we cannot assent either. Reconstruction Act No. 1 was based on certain principles which we hold to be good not for one, but for all cases, and which must govern any plan of reconstruction that is to be sure and lasting; and first and foremost, on the principle that the constitution of a State ought to be the work of the majority of its people—meaning by people male inhabitants; that it is for them, both on grounds of usage and of reason, to make it; and after they have made it, it is for Congress to say whether they, the State, can come into the Union under it or not. We took this ground in February, 1866, when there was still some uncertainty as to the course Congress ought to pursue after ousting Mr. Johnson from his share in the work of reconstruction; we hold to it still. Congress was doubtless justified in excluding from the registry certain persons whose acts had raised a presumption of their hostility to the Government and reserving the task of drawing up a constitution to the remainder; but we know of no argument and no state of things which will justify Congress in committing this task to any infinitessimal minority of the population whom it may select by an ex post facto law or who may choose to call themselves friends of the Union. If there are only "ten men" in a State willing to come into the Union under a certain constitution, tha is a reason for rejecting the constitution and holding the State under military rule. It can never be a reason for "making believe" that the few ought to govern the many—that a fraction of a population constitute "the people." An oligarchy is an oligarchy, and has all the vices of an oligarchy, whether based on "loyalty," on birth, or on money. Its defect does not lie in the principle on which it rests, but in its very constitution. Moreover, the acceptance by Congress from the hands of a small body of persons of a constitution of which nobody else approved would be tantamount to the imposition of a constitution by Congress on the majority—a thing new in American political history and most dangerous as a precedent.

It is said that we should in this way put an end to military government. But this is another "make-believe." If we admit States into the Union on the demand of little knots of loyalists, on terms obnoxious to the rest of the people, we shall have to leave troops behind to protect the "loyalists" against their subjects. Who would obey their decrees? What regard would the masses pay to their legislatures or their sheriffs, and what chance would "the powers that be" have in the conflicts which would be sure to arise every time an attempt was made to levy a tax or execute a writ?

It is high time we all came down and looked the cold, hard, stern facts in the face. The "guilt of the rebellion" or the "moral right" of Congress has really very little to do with this matter. The problem before us is to pacify the South, and to secure the freedmen against legalized degradation and oppression. To effect this there must be a great deal of wrath smothered, a great many prospects of vengeance and retribution given up. But the way out of the present dilemma, the path of safety as well as of honor for the Republican party, we hold to be the retention of the South under the present military régime until the whites have got rid of whatever delusions as to the possibility of defeating the Congressional policy Mr. Johnson may have inspired them with. In the meantime, military rule is doing no harm. It is the best and most civilizing rule to which the South has ever been subjected, and certainly the one best suited to the crisis through which she has just been passing.

THE CHINESE EMBASSY TO CHRISTENDOM.

The intelligence recently received from China that the Chinese Government had appointed Mr. Burlingame, the late American minister at Pekin, to be its ambassador to Washington and the courts of Europe, was startling even to the foreign residents at the treaty ports of China, and was received here with some surprise and incredulity. We are in possession of information from China, however, which shows that this is only a logical step in the ladder of progress which the Chinese have been steadily mounting for several years past.

The old policy of exclusion was religiously adhered to by the Pekin cabinet till the English and French armies thundered at their gates, and enforced the ratification of the new treaties. Even then the leaders of the old school carried off their debauchee of an Emperor to Tartary, and proposed to continue their flight to the boundaries of the empire sooner than yield to the foreigner. But, on the death of the Emperor, his brother Prince Kung and Wensiang, two men who appreciated and accepted the new situation, gained control of the regency by a brilliant coup d'état, and inaugurated a progressive policy. Its first-fruits were an acquiescence in the residence of foreign ministers at Pekin, and a willingness to profit by their advice so far as the distracted condition of the empire would allow. Their attention was next forcibly drawn to the foreign inspectorate of customs at the treaty ports, on which England and France had insisted as a collateral security for the indemnity due them. This institution was at first distasteful, but as each year brought into the imperial exchequer a rapidly increasing revenue from this source, the Chinese have accepted the idea in its entirety, and have developed a revenue service which for efficiency, honesty, and convenience can compare more than favorably with our own. The navigation of the Yangtse River was also conceded, and the substantial advantages to them of the fleet of steamers now trading on that great internal highway of the empire operate in favor of still further opening of their waters to foreign commerce. In various places they have established arsenals under foreign supervision, where arms are manufactured to equip their foreign disciplined troops. They are building gunboats to police their coasts, and repress the piracy which has been their curse. They have issued wise pilot regulations, and appropriated funds for light-houses where the need is most urgent. Wheaton's "Treatise on International Law" has been translated into Chinese, and they have adopted it as their text-book—understandingly, too, as they proved when a Prussian frigate violated the neutrality of their waters in the last Danish war. In Pekin itself a college has been established for the instruction of natives in Western knowledge by the ablest professors that could be procured, and there can be no doubt of the benefit that will almost immediately flow from this substitution of positive sciences for the dead husks of the Confucian classics.

By such reforms have Prince Kung and Wensiang proved their desire for progress to the diplomats of Pekin. But the governments of the West, goaded on by the incessant cry of commerce for wider expansion, have been too prone to disparage the importance of what is already accomplished, too willing to doubt the sincerity of Chinese professions, and too unmindful of the incubus of native superstition and crass ignorance against which the Pekin cabinet must struggle in its efforts to bring the empire into the comity of nations. Nor could the Chinese hope to combat these prejudices, or prove that they are really anxious to reap the advantages and assume the responsibilities of intercourse with civilized peoples, so long as they refused to use their privilege of being represented at the courts of treaty powers. To send such an embassy was to abandon for ever their old pretension that China had nothing to ask from the outside world, the nations of which were mere tributaries of their Emperor. Bold as was the move, however, it was, as we have seen, the next step in the rational development of progress at which these statesmen have aimed, and they have decided to brave the ancient traditions of their country. There is no reason to assume, as has been done by a clever contributor to one of the Shanghae papers, that this embassy was planned in Washington two years ago. The idea originated with the Chinese themselves, and the mission has therefore a deep political significance, while on any other supposition it would have been as futile a plot as the Lay-Osborn flotilla scheme.

The facts are, briefly, that when Mr. Burlingame called at the Foreign Office to take his congé as American minister, this mission was offered to him by Wensiang, after many expressions of gratitude for the fairness which had characterized his diplomacy, and of their desire to be represented by him in those countries whither he was going, and where they had few friends who understood them. Mr. Burlingame, after careful consideration, accepted their offer, and a few days afterwards received in due form the Imperial decree nominating him ambassador to all the countries having treaties with China, viz., United States, England, France, Russia, Prussia, Italy, Sweden, Denmark, Spain, Portugal, Belgium, and the Netherlands. The diplomatic corps at Pekin were informed without delay of the new mission, which they seem one and all to have welcomed. Indeed, whatever soreness or irritation any of them may have felt, it is hard to see how they could have done otherwise, inasmuch as the Chinese have only exercised an undoubted right, to which no objection can be urged except as a shield for interested or sinister motives.

Looking at Mr. Burlingame's nomination from the Chinese standpoint, it seems as astute on national grounds as it is personally natural and appropriate. In the first place, the men who had foresight enough to see the advantages of the embassy saw also that to send a Chinese would be to place themselves in the hands of the foreign employees whom it would be necessary to attach to their envoy, ignorant as he would be of Western languages and untrained in European diplomacy, It remained, therefore, to select some foreigner who should possess, together with their confidence, a perfect knowledge of their foreign relations, with an insight into their internal condition and practicable policy. Of all the great powers who have had treaties with them America stands alone as their constant friend and adviser, without territorial aspirations, without schemes of self-aggrandizement—the unpretending but firm advocate of peace and justice. It therefore seemed safest to entrust their interests to the citizen of a country which had persistently avoided aggression, and which they knew was not hampered or committed by any alliances with the powers they had most to fear. Besides, they had seen enough in Pekin and learned enough of current history to know how hopelessly entangled are the various nations of Europe. To have appointed an Englishman would have irritated the French; a Frenchman or German would have been distasteful to England; a Russian would have been a slight to the other three; so that the choice of an American seemed, as the event has proved, the only means of reconciling their own wishes with the conflicting interests of other nations.

On the other hand, apart from his nationality, there seems a special fitness in the selection of Mr. Burlingame. He was the dean of the diplomatic corps at Pekin, and, as such, better and longer known to them than any other high foreign officer there. They have had good reason to thank him, above all others, for initiating what is termed the "co-operative policy," by which the great powers have guaranteed the territorial integrity of China, binding themselves to act in concert on all questions of common interest, and pledging themselves to use fair diplomacy in place of the old cut-throat, bayonet-point policy which assumed that China had no rights which foreigners were bound to respect. England and France had come to look on China as a great preserve for their own use, over which they should exercise a virtual protectorate and despoil as occasion might offer. But with the increasing interests of other nations in China this policy would have led to constant complications, and, for the common peace, must have been sooner or later abandoned. It is due to Sir Frederic Bruce and M. Berthamy, the British and French ministers, to say that they united cordially with Mr. Burlingame in inaugurating a juster and more sensible policy, and that they yielded with a good grace the preponderating influence at Pekin which their countrymen cannot yet see has of necessity become lost to them. More or less of a veil of mystery hides most Pekin diplomacy, still it is well known that Mr. Burlingame has been the incessant adviser and mediator between the conflicting interests at the court. His good offices, for instance, relieved the Chinese from the burden of the "Lay-Osborn flotilla," a filibustering scheme by which two English gentlemen, with more or less of their Government's concurrence, hoped to convert China into a satrapy of England. And when the French became embroiled in the Corea through their missionaries, and threatened to levy a war of propagandism in China, Mr. Burlingame, in like manner, calmed the troubled waters and saved France from the stigma of doing a great wrong.

There is, therefore, no one whom the Chinese can so confidently trust to state to Western nations their wrongs, difficulties, and aspirations as the man who has so long proved himself their disinterested friend. And it is understood that this confidence has been fully and implicitly bestowed, so that on arriving in Europe he will find himself unfettered by instructions and free to act as to him may seem fit. Those who fear that the embassy bodes no good to foreign interests need only refer to Mr. Burlingame's political record to be satisfied that he will not lend himself to any retrograde policy. We are all too apt to complain of the slow movement of the Chinese in the direction of progress; but the most far-seeing policy, after all, consists in the slow, gradual, but steady development of powers which centuries of stagnation have paralyzed. No one understands this better than the new ambassador from China to the outer world.

THE USE OF THE SUPREME COURT TO THE UNION.

Why the advocates of absolute or of limited State sovereignty should have been in the past, or should be now, openly or covertly the opponents of the Supreme Court, is easy to understand; why those who assert the essential nationality of the United States should join in the same opposition is utterly inexplicable. That court is the one department of the General Government which has uniformly been ranged on the side of the sovereign people, one and indivisible; the executive and the legislative have occasionally wavered, this never. Without its aid there would now have been no national party, simply because there would have been no nation. For those, therefore, who uphold the principles of government which emerged victorious from the agony of the late war; who lead the party of the Union and shape its administrative measures; who are laboring to define and exalt the nature of American citizenship, and to protect the American citizen from all the effects of local hostilities—for them to weaken the authority of the court by directly abridging its jurisdiction, or by destroying its moral influence and the popular confidence in its judgment, is more than an act of folly, it is an act of suicide. The history of the court establishes beyond a doubt the correctness of these statements.

It is well known that in the Convention of 1787 the opposing forces of nationality and of State independence and sovereignty were nearly equal, and although the former triumphed in the general plan of the Constitution, their victory was not won without many concessions and compromises. The conflict immediately recommenced upon the organization of the new government, continued without intermission, received an accession of bitterness and violence from the added element of slavery, and finally culminated in the rebellion. Into this contest the court at once threw itself, and dealt most vigorous blows. Called upon to decide cases arising under the Constitution, it could not evade the summons, and answered the call with no uncertain response. In its first great judgment involving an interpretation of the organic law (Chisholm v. Georgia, 1793) it proclaimed the absolute nationality and paramount supremacy of the one people with a clearness, force, and emphasis which leave nothing to be supplied, and thereby opened the way for far-reaching results which we are just beginning to apprehend. From the position then assumed it has never departed. For the first fifty years of its existence it was constantly engaged in sustaining the authority of the General Government against the encroachments of the States. A deliberate attempt was made by many State legislatures, and persevered in with an unpatriotic determination, to restrain Congress within the narrowest limits, and to reduce it to the condition of its confederate predecessor. State laws were passed creating local regulations of commerce, interdicting free navigation, imposing duties upon vessels and goods, demanding licenses from importers. State taxes were laid upon the stock of the United States, upon its bank, and upon the salaries of its officers. Had these incipient and somewhat tentative measures been successful, they would speedily have been followed by others yet more aggressive, and the final result would not have been doubtful nor far distant. That they were not successful, and that the threatened result was made for ever impossible, was due alone to the Supreme Court. In a series of masterly judgments, called forth by these State laws, the functions of Congress were examined, and the two great fundamental principles were established, that within the range of subjects committed to it its powers are as absolute as those of the British Parliament, and the supremacy of its legislation as perfect, and that while acting within this range of subjects its choice of particular measures is unlimited. The attempt of the States to reclaim the practical independence which they had enjoyed during the confederation was thus frustrated, and they were reduced to the position of subordination which the Constitution assigned them. The importance of this judicial action, and of the high national principles thus made a part of the fundamental law, may be appreciated when we reflect that every extraordinary statute of the present and of the late Congress must be sustained by a reference to these doctrines. It is a very remarkable fact that, with the three exceptions soon to be mentioned, the only United States laws which have ever been declared invalid were one or two conferring jurisdiction upon the Supreme Court itself or upon the inferior tribunals. On the other hand, many most important enactments have been upheld, the prohibitions of the Constitution, whether contained in express provisions or involved in the national supremacy, have been sternly enforced against the States, and Congress has been secured in its position as an imperial legislature. The three additional instances in which the court has pronounced against the validity of United States statutes are the Dred Scott case, the Test Oath case, and the case of Milligan. However much we may object to and repudiate at least one of these decisions, it must be said that they do not impair the nationality of the people and the supremacy of the Government, but profess to be based entirely upon prohibitory clauses of the Constitution, which expressly forbid the legislation under review.

Mr. Parton has recently said that the life-work of Daniel Webster was the education of the North in respect to the nature and value of the Union. The same may be said, with even more truth and emphasis, of the Supreme Court. Its solemn judgments have given an authority to the claims of the nation as against those of local sovereignty; the States have been compelled to yield, and their judiciary, though sometimes reluctantly, have adopted the doctrines of the higher tribunal, and thus these doctrines have finally become the settled convictions of the people. Without this education and these convictions, the war for the suppression of the rebellion could not have been prosecuted; indeed, it would never have been commenced. The opponents of the court have hitherto been found among the partisans of State sovereignty. This was natural. These men sought its complete overthrow, or at least the destruction of its semi-political function, because they saw in it an obstacle to the success of their disorganizing efforts. They might hope to obtain control of Congress and the Executive, but to move the judiciary from its position they knew to be impossible. It is more than strange, it is pitiable, to find the national men of the present day repeating the stale arguments so often used by their adversaries, and quoting with approval the sneers of Jefferson and Jackson. Do they reflect that they cannot afford to lose the aid of the Supreme Court? To remove the legislation of Congress from the reach of all judicial action is simply impossible. If the judges of the nation are silenced, those of the States will be left entirely uncontrolled. The laws of the General Government must operate within States, and the officers of the General Government must act within the jurisdiction of State tribunals. Remove the supervisory function of the national judiciary, and these laws will become the sport of local partisanship; upheld in one commonwealth, they will be overthrown in another, and all compulsive character will be lost.

We might be content with the simple fact established by its history, that the Supreme Court has been an invariable supporter of our nationality, but there is an evident reason why this should continue to be so. The judges are in great measure withdrawn from local influences; they are the permanent branch of the Government; the precedents for their action are all in favor of upholding the national authority; their habit of mind is opposed to any violent change. To restrict their jurisdiction and weaken their moral power is, therefore, to sacrifice in a most unnecessary manner that department of the Government which, more than any other, will make national ideas triumphant, not only in the legislation of to-day, but in the permanent convictions of the people.

AUTHORS VERSUS READERS.

MR. HENRY C. CAREY, of Philadelphia, was requested fourteen years ago, by a "Pennsylvania Senator," to put on paper his ideas as to the nature of the property which authors held, or were entitled to hold, in their books, apropos of the copyright discussion which was then raging. He did so in a series of letters, of which a second edition has just been published, with the addition of a long preface, as a reply to Mr. Parton's recent article in the Atlantic Monthly. This article, Mr. Carey says, he has read carefully, and "he finds in it nothing beyond a labored attempt at reducing the literary profession to a level with those of the grocer and tallow-chandler," and he concludes that most of the "eminent persons" whose cases Mr. Parton cites as illustrations must have read his plea with "profound disgust."

We do not propose to enter into the merits of Mr. Carey's case against Mr. Parton, however, nor into Mr. Carey's standard of good taste, or even of expediency. What we are going to say is about Mr. Carey's own theory of the nature of literary property, which we shall endeavor, as far as our space will allow, to give in his own words:

"The facts or ideas contained in a book constitute its body. The language in which they are conveyed to the reader constitutes the clothing of the body. For the first no copyright is allowed. Humboldt spent many years of his life in collecting facts relative to the southern portion of this continent; yet so soon as he gave them to the light they ceased to be his, and became the common property of all mankind. Captain Wilkes and his companions spent several years in exploring the Southern Ocean, and brought from there a vast amount of new facts, all of which became at once common property. Sir John Franklin made numerous expeditions to the North, during which he collected many facts of high importance, for which he had no copyright. So with Park, Burkhard, and others, who lost their lives in the exploration of Africa. Captain McClure has just accomplished the Northwest Passage, yet has he no exclusive right to the publication of the fact. So has it ever been. For thousands of years men like these—working men, abroad and at home—have been engaged in the collection of facts; and thus there has been accumulated a vast body of them, all of which have become common property, while even the names of most of the men by whom they were collected have passed away. Next to these come the men who have been engaged in the arrangement of facts and in their comparison, with a view to deduce therefrom the laws by which the world is governed, and which constitute science. Copernicus devoted his life to the study of numerous facts, by aid of which he was at length enabled to give to the world a knowledge of the great fact that the earth revolved around the sun; but he had therein, from the moment of its publication, no more property than had the most violent of his opponents. The discovery of other laws occupied the life of Kepler, but he had no property in them. Newton spent many years of his life in the composition of his 'Principia,' yet in that he had no copyright, except in the mere clothing in which his ideas were placed before the world. The body was common property. So, too, with Bacon and Locke, Leibnitz and Descartes, Franklin, Priestley, and Davy, Quesnay, Turgot, and Adam Smith, Lamarck and Cuvier, and all other men who have aided in carrying science to the point at which it has now arrived. They have had no property in their ideas. If they labored, it was because they had a thirst for knowledge."

For the real producers of the ideas by which the race is elevated and carried forward, and its stock of knowledge increased, therefore, according to Mr. Carey, no property in these ideas is claimed or can be created.

"For what, then, is copyright given? For the clothing in which the body is produced to the world. Examine Mr. Macaulay's 'History of England' and you will find that the body is composed of what is common property. Not only have the facts been recorded by others, but the ideas, too, are derived from the works of men who have labored for the world without receiving, and frequently without the expectation of receiving, any pecuniary compensation for their labors. Mr. Macaulay has read much and carefully, and he has thus been enabled to acquire great skill in arranging and clothing his facts; but the reader of his books will find in them no contribution to positive knowledge. The works of men who make contributions of that kind are necessarily controversial and distasteful to the reader; for which reason they find few readers, and never pay their authors."

He cites in illustration, also, Webster, Prescott, Bancroft, Pitt and Fox, Sir Robert Peel, and Kent—all of whom, he says, were mere collectors and arrangers of facts and ideas produced by other men, and of which "the world at large is the owner." But here again we must quote Mr. Carey himself. The slightest deviation from his own statement would interfere with our purpose:

"The world at large is the owner of all the facts that have been collected, and of all the ideas that have been deduced from them, and its right in them is precisely the same that the planter has in a bale of cotton that has been raised on his plantation, and the course of proceeding has thus far been precisely similar; whence I am induced to infer that in both cases right has been done. When the planter hands his cotton to the spinner and weaver, he does not say, 'Take this and convert it into cloth, and keep the cloth;' but he does say, 'Spin and weave this cloth, and for so doing you shall have such an interest in the cloth as will give you a fair compensation for your labor and skill, but when that shall have been paid the cloth will be mine.' This latter is precisely what society, the owner of facts and ideas, says to the author. 'Take these raw materials that have been collected, and clothe and put them together, and clothe them after your own fashion, and for a given time we will agree that nobody else shall present them in the same dress. During that time you may exhibit them for your own profit, but at the end of that period the clothing will become common property, as the body now is. It is to the contributions of your predecessors to our common stock that you are indebted for the power to make your book, and we require you, in your turn, to contribute towards the augmentation of the stock that is to be used by your successors.' This is justice, and to grant more than this would be injustice."

We do not know who the Pennsylvania senator to whom the foregoing was addressed may have been; but if he ever received any decent drilling in the art of seeing distinctions, it must have set his teeth on edge. The reader, doubtless, imagines that even if Mr. Carey denies the character and rights of producers to historians, orators, and legal commentators, he will at least concede them to great novelists. Nothing of the kind. They, too, are mere collectors and arrangers:

"Let us turn now, for a moment, to the producers of works of fiction. Sir Walter Scott had carefully studied Scottish and Border history and thus had filled his mind with facts preserved and ideas produced by others, which he reproduced in a different form. He made no contribution to knowledge. So, too, with our own very successful Washington Irving. He drew largely upon the common stock of ideas, and dressed them up in a new and what has proved to be a most attractive form. So, again, with Mr. Dickens. Read his 'Bleak House,' and you will find that he has been a most careful observer of men and things, and has thereby been enabled to collect a great number of facts that he has dressed up in different forms; but that is all he has done. He is in the condition of a man who had entered a large garden and collected a variety of the most beautiful flowers growing therein, of which he had made a fine bouquet. The owner of the garden would naturally say to him, 'The flowers are mine, but the arrangement is yours. You cannot keep the bouquet, but you may smell it or show it for your own profit for an hour or two, but then it must come to me. If you prefer it, I am willing to pay you for your services, giving you a fair compensation for your time and taste.' This is exactly what society says to Mr. Dickens, who makes such beautiful literary bouquets. What is right in the individual cannot be wrong in the mass of individuals of which society is composed.

Nevertheless, the author objects to this, insisting that he is owner of the bouquet himself, although he has paid no wages to the man who raised the flowers."

Mr. Carey's having himself supplied the illustrations of his arguments saves those who think him mistaken a good deal of trouble, because they furnish the materials for refuting him. More than this: they furnish full justification for saying that a man of Mr. Carey's powers is inexcusable in bringing such loose thinking as we have in the pamphlet before us to bear on a question which so deeply affects the national morality as well as the national culture. We shall, to make assurance doubly sure, cite one more of them:

"The man who makes a book uses the common property of mankind, and all he furnishes is the workmanship. Society permits him to use its property, but it is on condition that, after a certain time, the whole shall become part of the common stock. To find a parallel case, let it be supposed that liberal men should, out of their earnings, place at the disposal of the people of your town stone, bricks, and lumber in quantity sufficient to find accommodation for hundreds of people that were unable to provide for themselves; next suppose that in this state of things your authorities should say to any man, or men, 'Take these materials, and procure lime in quantity sufficient to build a house; employ carpenters, bricklayers, and architects, and then, in consideration of having found the lime and the workmanship, you shall have a right to charge your own price to every person who may, for all times, desire to occupy a room in it;' would this be doing justice to the men who had given the raw materials for public use? Would it be doing justice to the community by which they had been given? Would it not, on the contrary, be the height of injustice? Unquestionably it would, and it would raise a storm that would speedily displace the men who had thus abused their trust. Their successors would then say: 'Messrs. ———, our predecessors, did what they had no right to do. These materials are common property. They were given without fee or reward, with a view to benefit the whole people of our town, many of whom are badly accommodated, while others are heavily taxed for helping those who are unable to help themselves. To carry out the views of the benevolent men to whom we are indebted for all these stone, bricks, and lumber, they must remain common property. You may, if you will, convert them into a house, and, in consideration of the labor and skill required for so doing, we will grant you, during a certain time, the privilege of letting the rooms at your own price to those who desire to occupy them; but at the close of that time the building must become common property, to be disposed of as we please.' This is exactly what the community says to the gentlemen who employ themselves in converting its common property into books, and to say more would be doing great injustice."

This is the whole argument. Now, the case of society dealing with the author is not only not "precisely similar" to the case of the planter dealing with the manufacturer, but it is totally unlike it. The reason, and the only reason, why the planter retains a share in the cloth—or, in other words, why the manufacturer's property in the cloth is limited—is that the planter's supply of cotton is limited, and when he parts with a bale he has a bale the less in his store, and the manufacturer has a bale the more in his. When society furnishes facts and ideas, however, to book-makers, it parts with nothing. The author takes and uses, but society does not lose. As many facts and ideas remain in its possession after he has written as before he began to write. Nobody can get up and say to Macaulay or Prescott or Bancroft: "In consequence of your having drawn on the general stock of facts and ideas for your history, a number of valuable facts and ideas which before you wrote were accessible to me, are accessible no longer unless I buy your book." If any one were foolish enough to address a historian in this way, the reply would of course be: "I drew from the common stock, it is true; but in drawing I did not diminish it. As many ideas and facts remain in it as ever. They are exactly as much within your reach as ever. You can go and get them yourself, as I did, without buying my book. If you would rather not do so, or have not the skill or industry or patience to do so, you must pay me for my labor in collecting and arranging and making them comprehensible to you." We need only suggest to the reader how much more forcibly even the novelist might reply. What a stinging rebuke Mr. Dickens might give "society," if society had the impudence to justify its refusal to pay him for his bouquets by laying claim to the flowers of which it was made.

Mr. Carey's house illustration makes the case against him still stronger. When the noble-minded persons furnish the builder with bricks and lumber, they diminish perceptibly the town stock of these articles. They prevent somebody else from building a similar house. They can put on paper in dollars and cents the value of their contribution to his enterprise, or, in other words, the extent of their loss in case he refuses to share his profits with them or surrender the building to them; but to base a refusal to acknowledge the author's absolute property in his works on this or similar ground is simply absurd. It is like refusing protection to a fortune accumulated by extracting salt from sea-water by evaporation, on the ground that the ocean is the property of the human race.

Moreover, Mr. Carey, if he proves anything, proves too much. If his argument be sound, the men whom he mentions as real producers of "facts and ideas" are as much indebted to society as the mere bookmaker. Newton and Bacon and Leibnitz and Descartes were all immeasurably indebted to society. They were indebted for everything they had learnt from books or teachers, for the social training which inclined them to science, for the security and comfort in which they pursued their investigations, for the civilized sympathy and encouragement by which their labors were cheered. Hayes went to the Polar Sea, it is true, but where did he get the art of navigation, the ship he sailed in, the intelligence which executed his orders, and the hope of honor which consoled and sustained him under his hardships? What right has he to say that he, and he only, produced a "fact?" Who has brought to market any "idea" to the production of which the labors of the race have contributed nothing?

Speculations like these of Mr. Carey's, which try to refine away property in what he calls "the clothing of ideas," would, if successful, destroy all right of property in civilized society, at least for more than a limited period, the length of which would have to be fixed with reference to the danger of putting an end to production altogether. When a man makes a fortune in trade, it is hard to say in what proportions he and society have contributed to the result. He furnishes the sagacity and the foresight and the industry and the self-denial, but society furnished him with the training which fostered and developed these qualities, furnished him with security, with transportation, with the post-office, with certainty as to the future, and so on. What would be thought if it were to step in and say that in consideration of all this he must at the end of forty years surrender his wealth to found an almshouse or establish a public library? And yet this is substantially what society says to the author.

What makes literary property so obfuscating in its effects on many minds is not any peculiarity in it, but in the means by which society has to provide for its protection. No property can be said to be absolute. Society has and exercises the right of prescribing the conditions on which it will protect any property whatever, and these conditions are usually framed with reference not simply to the immediate but to the remote good of the community at large. But all property, except literary property and inventions, can be and is protected by simply affording the owner security. Literary property, on the contrary, requires for its protection that society shall bestow a monopoly on the author. The proprietor of lands, houses, or diamonds has all he requires if he has police placed round one or two fences, or, if worst comes to the worst, he can assemble his friends, arm them, and hold his possessions with the strong hand. But the writer of books is utterly helpless unless the government guarantees that within its jurisdiction nobody but he shall for a definite or indefinite period have the right of selling a certain article. This peculiarity of his position naturally causes a harder bargain to be driven with him than with other proprietors. Literary property differs from other property not, as Mr. Carey and Mr. Merriam suppose, in its nature, but in the demand it makes on the community. There is nothing, we affirm without hesitation, in its nature to justify the present practice of taking it away from the owner at the end of forty years, and distributing it amongst the public—which is what is really done when a "copyright expires"—any more than there is anything in the nature of real estate or in bank stocks to justify their seizure at the death of the owner, and appropriation to the endowment of a college or almshouse.

When one remembers that it was only in Lord Mansfield's day that the usages of trade and commerce began to be recognized by the courts and incorporated in the common law, one cannot help believing that we shall see even in our time a similar revolution, not simply in the feelings and opinions of society, but in the legislation of all civilized communities with regard to the vast and novel species of property which the diffusion of education and the improvement in the art of printing and in the means of communication have been creating within the last fifty years. The practice of refusing to protect authors and inventors in the products of their labor for more than a brief period will disappear before the growth of sounder and more enlightened juristic ideas, and society will come to see that when it takes away a copyright for public use, it ought not to take it, any more than houses or lands, "without just compensation."

ENGLAND.

LONDON, January 30, 1868.

THIS season of the year is favorable to the discussion of questions which will before long occupy the attention of our legislators. We resolve ourselves, as it were, into a committee of the whole nation, and indulge in a very rambling series of controversies. The particular topic which at present looms the largest is that of education. Behind it, and in many respects closely connected with it, lies the even more difficult problem of pauperism. An excellent London clergyman—Mr. Rogers—wrote to the Times the other day to declare that the only way of stemming the advancing tide of pauperism was by thoroughly educating the people. On the other hand, the Bishop of Oxford, in one of his flippant humors, has just made a speech pointing out the obvious fact that pauperism is the great difficulty in the way of education. The meeting of reformers at Manchester proposed that education should be compulsory, and the expenses paid by local rates. Excellent! says the bishop; but how are you to force an agricultural laborer with a family of half a dozen children and ten shillings a week to send his eldest boy to school instead of sending him to pick up a shilling or two by field-work to eke out the family finances? And how are you to squeeze rates enough for school-building out of a parish when half the rate-payers are on the brink of pauperism? These are practical difficulties which demand, and, I doubt not, will receive an answer; for I am somehow persuaded that, when a bishop declares a thing to be impracticable or impious, it is generally on the verge of accomplishment, and we are not yet so poor but that we can manage to build schools and pay for schoolmasters, however the charge is to be distributed.

I only mention this, however, to point the obvious moral of the connection between ignorance and poverty. There is the fatal circle, that when people are on the brink of starvation they have no spare energy to give to learning, and that when they are grossly ignorant they have not the foresight and intelligence to rise out of their slough of misery. The same truth is receiving a rather different application at the East End of London. The accounts of the miserable position of the laboring population at Poplar and the Isle of Dogs, and other amphibious districts below the port of London, have been something heart-rending. As a natural consequence, a vast stream of charitable contributions has been poured into the district. Unluckily, the money has been distributed amongst a number of associations, with no particular guarantee for its judicious application. Some of the funds are distributed with an eye to doing a little religious conversion. A man gets his loaf or his shilling if he attends a lecture on the evils of Popery. And there has till the present moment been no proper attempt at establishing a mutual understanding amongst the administrators of the different funds, or between them and the poor-law officers. I hope that things are now being put on a rational footing. Meanwhile, the evil has resulted that the most independent amongst the poor have been left to starve, whilst the idle and profligate have gone round to the different charitable funds and obtained better pay than they could earn by labor. The report of a delightful district, where the fountains of charity were running with unusual freedom, has spread amongst the begging classes generally. They have naturally gravitated towards the East End to put in a claim for the good things that were going. Thus around the nucleus of honest men who were starving there has grown up a mass of chronic pauperism pressing upon the poor-rates, and hiding the genuine distress from public notice. To deal with this is difficult enough; but the real sufferers are not altogether free from another imputation. A great meeting of artisans was held the other day to consider the difficulties of their position. The primary cause of the distress seems to be that the ship-building trade has deserted the port of London for other districts where labor and materials are cheaper. For example, it has been improving on the Clyde whilst falling into decay on the Thames. Meanwhile, between the workmen and their masters there rages one of those disputes of which an outsider can never come at the truth. The masters declare that they are ready to begin ship-building to-morrow if only the laborers would accept lower wages. The shipwrights, they say, consider it a law of nature that they should receive 7s. a day; sooner than put up with 6s. 6d., they will starve or live upon charity. It was said at the meeting that the destitution of the men should induce them to accept a lower rate of wages. "No," exclaimed a workman of defective logical powers, "if we are poor, that 's the more reason our wages should be 'rose!'" It is obvious that these men, who have been in the receipt of excellent wages when in employment, have not found time to study some of the first principles of political economy. It is right to say that there is, I believe, another side to the question, and that the men have at least some substantial grievances to complain of. Meanwhile, there is an obvious difficulty about helping men who will not recognize the fact that it is better to take sixpence a day less wages than to come upon the parish. In other words, want of intelligence would seem in this case to have a very direct influence in favoring pauperism.

The efforts that were made last session towards removing one of the evils to which paupers are liable have not hitherto borne much fruit. In the intervals of the Reform battles, Mr. Hardy succeeded in carrying a bill for establishing decent hospitals in place of the sick wards at workhouses, whose gross mismanagement had been exposed in the newspapers. The bill was one of those patchwork bits of legislation to which we are only too well accustomed, especially in the midst of exciting party struggles upon other matters. The plan which was carried, and for which Mr. Hardy received great credit even from his political opponents, was at best a mere instalment of reform. It was a more vital defect that it depended for efficiency upon the co-operation of the parochial authorities. In some parts of London they have simply taken up an attitude of dogged resistance. The rates, they say, are quite high enough already. They won't raise any more money to build hospitals or for any other purpose. If they increase the taxation, they will only drive more people over the brink of pauperism, and, in short, be cutting off one end of the blanket to mend the other. They will probably agitate for equalizing the metropolitan rates. If all the rich people live at one end of London and all the poor at the other, it is hardly fair that each district should keep its own pauperism. The metropolis forms one organic whole, and taxation should be equally distributed throughout. But when this question is thoroughly opened it will be but one step towards overhauling the whole theory and system of the poor-laws But I need not anticipate a discussion which will probably come up before long on a larger scale.

A discussion very directly connected with this topic has lately taken place in the newspapers. Mr. Fawcett, the blind member for Brighton, and professor of political economy in the University of Cambridge, made a speech advocating a change in the law of real property. He proposed that in cases of intestacy landed estates should be equally divided amongst the children, instead of going to the eldest son. He admitted that the direct influence of the change would be trifling, as of course a landed estate is very seldom, if ever, left to the disposal of the law. He maintained, however, that it might gradually influence public opinion, as the onus of an unequal distribution would be left to individual proprietors. All the orthodox opened fire upon him with dire indignation. They plunged into the intricacies of the law of entail and settlement to prove that, as a matter of fact, the English law did not favor the accumulation of landed property nor prevent an estate from being broken up. I cannot follow them into the technical difficulties, but can only say credat Judæus! There can be little doubt that in practice the landholders who have made our laws have favored the unequal distribution, which suits their prejudices, although it is also true that there is much popular exaggeration as to the stringency of the laws in this direction. Secondly, Mr. Fawcett's opponents declared that the accumulation of land was a natural and inevitable result of civilization—rather a bold assertion in the face of Prussia and France, to say nothing of the more exceptional circumstances of the United States. They declared that the utmost possible facilities for the sale of landed property would only give greater facilities for this accumulation, instead of tending to establish a class of small proprietors. This is a question which can only be answered by experience, and there is no doubt that the accumulation is a result of certain social prejudices and customs which could not be uprooted by any simple act of legislation. We are far removed from any period at which small proprietors will be anything but a rare exception in England, and a great change must take place in public sentiment before any serious attempt is made to realize such a state of things. But the change may be approaching more quickly than is generally supposed.

A curious instance of a rapid change of opinion is afforded by the condition of the female franchise question. Two members of Parliament addressed their constituents in favor of female voting a short time ago. The possibility of a speedy alteration of the law is increased by an odd accident. The other day a woman was accidentally put upon the register at Manchester, and recorded her vote in favor of Mr. Jacob Bright (Mr. John Bright's brother). If an attempt should be made to strike her name off, the question of law will be argued. The Reform bill, it is true, gives the right of voting to men only; but there is an act of Parliament declaring in the most positive terms that "man" shall be taken in all cases, where the contrary is not expressly enacted, to include women. Mr. Denman made this remark on the occasion of Mr. Mill's motion last session, and was ridiculed by his hearers. Further consideration, however, has convinced many lawyers that he was in the right. It is, of course, possible that an act may be introduced this session to declare the exclusion of women, but it is doubtful whether it would pass; it is much more difficult to turn women out of doors than to prevent them from entering; and it is not improbable that this accidental circumstance will enable them to acquire the franchise at once. Of course, the effect of the measure would be limited; for it would only apply to women who are householders. Mr. Disraeli, as I have been told on good authority, has declared that he will never vote for the exclusion of women; and before the division of last session he walked out of the House.

I ought to notice a discussion which has taken place in the Times and elsewhere with regard to the termination of Mr. Seward's correspondence with Lord Stanley. I will not express any opinion upon the matter myself, for I am quite incompetent to do so. I think it right, however, to tell you what is at present the prevailing opinion. Most Englishmen believe, rightly or wrongly, that Lord Stanley has gone as far as is possible, and that it would be utterly impossible to submit to arbitration the question of whether we were or were not justified in recognizing the belligerency of the Southern States. They hold further that Mr. Seward was not really seeking for a settlement of the question; but that, whatever concessions we had made, he would have found some pretext for keeping it open. There is, of course, a minority in favor of the concession demanded, but the present impression is undoubtedly that which I have described. I am, of course, quite unable to guess what it may be six months hence.

Mr. Hepworth Dixon has published a book called "Spiritual Wives," which is a kind of appendix to "New America." I have only glanced at it, but the general opinion is that it is marked by the same faults of flippancy and bookmaking as his former production, and has, in addition, the worse defect of being grossly and wantonly indecent. It will, therefore, probably command a large sale.

Correspondence.

THE SUPREME COURT AND CONGRESS.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: The articles in the Nation on the Supreme Court bill seem to me to fail to meet the true point. It seems to me that the relation of the bill to reconstruction, and cases to arise out of reconstruction, is the sole view in which the worth and propriety of the measure are considered by you. The question, to my mind, would present the same aspect if every State were reconstructed and in the Union which it now does. It is this: Is there not a sound and just reason why cases the decision of which, in favor of one party or the other, involves a decision that an act of Congress is unconstitutional, should require a greater preponderance of the judicial opinion of the court than where mere questions involving private right alone are concerned? I believe that they should, and the reason seems very obvious. Ordinary cases involve only the matter in controversy between the respective parties to the suit; but a decision which determines a law to be unconstitutional involves all others whose rights are based under the same act. Take, for instance, the act to authorize sales of land for taxes in Southern States. A suit in which that law should be adjudged unconstitutional would avoid every title held under the law, and render it worthless in the market.

A decision by the Supreme Court which pronounces any act of Congress unconstitutional is widespread in its consequences. It affects values and interests not before the court, and affects them directly and immediately.

It seems to me that decisions so important as these, and of so extended an influence, and having the effect to nullify an act of the legislature, may well be required to be supported by something more than the bare majority of the court, and it would be a just and right provision to require for such decisions that they should receive a vote of at least two-thirds of the court.

Ordinary cases decide nothing but the bare point in issue between the parties; and even where principles reaching beyond the case are uttered, they are, in fact, mere obiter dicta, and not binding on the subordinate district courts; but a decision by the Supreme Court in any case that any act of Congress was unconstitutional, would have the effect instanter to render the law a nullity all over the land. Under these circumstances, it seems to me that the soundest reason and most judicious policy would dictate that the difference in the number of votes required by the act, where an act of Congress is to be affected by the decision, should be established.

Your obedient servant,
E. C. L.

Chicago, Feb. 8, 1868.

[The case put by our correspondent and many others like it might arise; but in legislating on matters of this sort probabilities rather than possibilities have to be considered. Taking into consideration the nature of the two bodies, we believe Congress is far more likely to legislate improperly than the Supreme Court to decide improperly. The history of the Government, as we have endeavored to show elsewhere, proves that it is. We venture to assert that Congress, legislating without the control of the Constitution, would unsettle more titles, impair the obligation of more contracts, and diffuse more alarm amongst property-holders in twenty years than the Supreme Court in a century. The best way of ensuring the solemn and mature consideration of important questions, such as the constitutionality of legislation, is, it seems to us, the way in which most of the questions of English law have been settled for centuries—by repeated arguments before the whole court. For whatever we cannot secure in this way, we must trust to the character of the judges. If nine men cannot be selected from the whole bar of the United States for seats on the bench of the court, whose character can be so trusted on the whole, and making due allowance for human infirmities, then not only the American Government but American society is a failure. We have, however, not reached this conclusion, and, until we do, shall oppose the subjection of the court to the majority of either Senate or House of Representatives.—Ed. Nation.]

MR. BAGEHOT'S VIEW OF THE EXECUTIVE.

To the Editor of the Nation:

In the instructive article upon the Executive in the Nation for Jan. 25, Mr. Bagehot's view is said to be "absolutely novel in this country." It may not be amiss to say that this subject was discussed from almost precisely his point of view in an article on "The American Executive" in the Christian Examiner for March, 1866. The ground there taken is that, if our system suffers from rigidity and routine, the English system is quite as defective by reason of its lack of regularity; and the Trent case is adduced, as by your correspondent, to illustrate precisely the point he does—the advantage we may have on occasion in the impossibility of changing the Executive suddenly. It is maintained, however, that on the whole our system would be improved by some infusion of the elasticity of the English form of government; and it is suggested that this might be attained by giving up the method of electing the President for definite terms—let the House of Representatives, or Congress, by joint resolution, once a year, and no oftener, have the power to order an election. If the House should be in harmony with the Executive, this right would not be exercised; if the election should be ordered, the country might sustain the President. At any rate, we should change our Executive just when we wished, which at present we have no power of doing; and the degree of irregularity and elasticity thus obtained would not, it is thought, take away from the workings of our institutions any but that excessive regularity in procedure which, it is easy to see, degenerates in practice into an absurd formality and rigidity.

Marcel.

THE LATE PETER FORCE.

To the Editor of the Nation:

In the number of the Nation just received, you characterize the late Peter Force as "a book collector" who "once—in John Quincy Adams's administration—published a political paper, and, before that time, 'The National Calendar,' a serial statistical work."

The phrase "book collector" is incomplete and therefore inaccurate when applied to one who collected books as implements for the prosecution of his studies.

If it was not worth while to name his minor historical publications, at least it would not have been out of place to mention the chief labor of his life—the "American Archives"—a work referred to with grateful acknowledgments by every recent writer upon American history.

You would hardly give a fit account of Mr. Bancroft if you should define him as "a book collector who once taught school at Round Hill."

Very respectfully,
M. F. Force.

Cincinnati, February 8, 1868.

Notes.

LITERARY.

Messrs. Charles Scribner & Co. have succeeded in persuading Mr Robert Bonner to allow the publication, in book form, of Mr. H. W. Beecher's novel of "Norwood." We do not know that Mr. Bonner has ever before broken his rule of having no part of the Ledger republished.——Mr. James Miller has in preparation a new edition of Beckford's "Vathek." It was a happy thought to add the "sublime tale" to the little library so well begun with "Undine" and "Sintram and his Companions."——The National Publishing Company of Philadelphia, Cincinnati, Richmond, and Atlanta will publish, in two volumes, Alexander H. Stephens's politico-philosophico-historical book. Its title is as follows: "A Constitutional View of the Late War between the States; its Causes, Character, Conduct, and Results. Presented in a series of Colloquies, at Liberty Hall."

—Mr. Stephens's book, the title of which we have just given in full, will no doubt be interesting. From the few pages of it that we have seen we conclude that it may very likely become the political bible of all that class of American politicians who think that the war made by the late Slave States upon the Free States was made on account of a difference of opinion as regards the sovereignty of States in the Union, and that slavery was but the question on which two opposing principles, consolidation and federation, came into collision on the battle-field. That it will be a clear and valuable statement of the State Rights doctrine appears also to be evident from the few pages that we have seen. It seems a pity that the author should needlessly make a true doctrinaire's mistake at the very outset, and set his readers laughing by calmly denying that slavery was at all a cause of our late war. As if—whatever may happen in the future—anything else than slavery could at that time or previously have put dangerous life into the State Sovereignty theory. Mr. Stephens feigns that three representative men—with the pseudonyms of Judge Bynum, of Massachusetts; Professor Norton, of Connecticut; and Major Heister, of Pennsylvania—meet together at Liberty Hall, and, conversing together, make an enquiry into the nature of the Government of the United States, "or the nature of that Union which exists between the States under the Constitution" (unamended, we presume), "with the cause or conflict of principles which led to a resort to arms." Secondly, they discuss "the conduct of the war on both sides so far as it affected constitutional principles, with its final results upon the organic structure of the entire system of American democratic free institutions." Judge Bynum is the representative of the Radical wing of the Republican party, Professor Norton of the Conservative Republicans, and Major Heister is supposed to be a War Democrat. The proprietor of Liberty Hall, we suppose, represents the party of decentralization. As regards typography, the new volumes will be very good. The paper, if the pages before us are a sample of what is to be used in the completed work, will be too thin, though fine and white.

—A correspondent at Marquette, Michigan, sends us some proofs that Messrs. Clarke & Bowron, publishers in Chicago, are practising on the reading public, at our expense, a deception like that one of which the Boston Nation was the other day proved guilty. They send to the Chicago Evening Journal what purports to be an extract from a notice in this journal of two books by a Dr. Thomas Clarke. It reads as follows:

"We have seen two books written by Thomas Clarke, of Chicago, namely, 'The Two Angels' and 'Sir Copp,' and we must say that they are extremely good, and we shall look with interest for the other works promised by the same author, as we wish to see literature advanced and fostered in the great West."—N. Y. Nation.

We do wish to see literature advanced and fostered in the great West, though we never made that patronizing remark. But Messrs. Clarke & Bowron are not doing anything in the way of advancing or fostering it. And the cause of virtue and religion, which the Advance thinks subserved by Dr. Clarke's poems, certainly owes as little to his advertisements as the cause of literature owes to his books. This is what we really said of the two specimens of his work which we had seen:

Messrs. Clark & Bowron, of Chicago, announce that they will publish in quick succession twelve volumes—or what we take to be twelve volumes—in prose and verse, from the pen of Thomas Clarke. Dr. Clarke is a British gentleman who woos the muse in Chicago. Some of his poems are already in their sixth edition. The publishers say that all the works of Professor Clarke, which they are going to publish in the fall, "are of the deepest interest and the highest order of merit." These are their titles: "The Battle, and Other Poems, Patriotic and Humorous;" "Demetrius; or, The Conspirators: A Tragedy in five acts;" "The Aminta: A Sylvan Drama, translated from the Italian of Torquato Tasso;" "Miscellaneous Poems," "A Pastoral, and Other Poems" (reprinted from the London edition); "Donna Rosa and the Silent Village" (reprinted); "A Day in May" (reprinted). All these are in verse; we have seen none of them, but we take the risk of saying that they are not extremely good. Two poems of Mr. Clarke's we have seen, namely, "The Two Angels" and "Sir Copp," which means "Sir Copperhead." As we have passed what may seem an unfavorable judgment on these works, it is fair to say that the publishers have information that "no book since the days of Hudibras has produced so great a sensation as 'Sir Copp.'" The forthcoming prose works by the same author are "Philip Thornton; or, The Adventurers;" "Life in the West," "The New Sentimental Journey," "Lectures and Essays," and "Miscellaneous Pieces."

—Mr. Laughton Osborn, who has recently published two tragedies and two comedies, and who is commonly thought to be a new American author, is, in fact, an author who was pretty well known twenty years ago and more. He wrote "The Vision of Rubeta," which Poe called the best of all satires then published in America. But Poe's criticisms one cannot depend upon. He was able to see "the thing as it is," and he certainly was not wanting in acuteness and courage; also he had more knowledge than almost anybody who in his day professed to be a critic. But although an intellectually truthful man he was morally untruthful, and in his critical writings habitually gratified his personal animosities and indulged his whims instead of expressing with candor and calmness the opinions which he really entertained. It is altogether probable that he knew very well how much Mr. Lowell's "Fable for Critics" was superior to "The Vision of Rubeta." The two works just mentioned and Halleck's trivial "Croaker" and Trumbull's "McFingal" were then almost our only satirical works in verse. Since then all these have been cast into shadow by Lowell's "Biglow Papers," and, in fact, only Lowell's "Biglow Papers" and "Fable for Critics" can now be said to exist as American satirical poetry. Still, as a part of the literature of the country, it is necessary to take account of Trumbull's "McFingal," if not of Mr. Osborn's book. It is, therefore, not uninteresting to learn the origin of "McFingal:" A descendant of the poet, the Honorable J. Hammond Trumbull, of the Connecticut Historical Society, has discovered that the germ of the poem is to be found in a burlesque, in verse, of that proclamation of General Gage's, issued on the 12th of June, 1775, in which he proscribed Hancock and Samuel Adams, and extended a free pardon to all infatuated Massachusetts men except the two great leaders and their abettors and adherents. The burlesque, which at once became popular, was published in the Hartford Courant on the 7th and again on the 14th of August, 1775. The Honorable Mr. Trumbull now first makes it known that his ancestor wrote the squib in question, and that fifty of its two hundred and sixteen lines were transferred by the author to his later poem of "McFingal." The fact has hitherto escaped the notice of all gleaners of Revolutionary newspapers, and has never been observed by editors of "McFingal." As not very many people now undertake the perusal of our earliest satire, we give a sample of its force. We give also the corresponding lines of the burlesque and the original of both:

"By Thomas Gage, whom British frenzy
Stiled Honourable and Excellency,
O'er Massachusetts sent to stand here
Vice Admiral and Chief Commander,
Whose Power Gubernatorial still
Extends as far as Bunker-Hill,
Whose Admiralty reaches clever
Full half a mile up Mystick River.
Let ev'ry Clime and ev'ry Nation
Attend once more
A PROCLAMATION."

McFingal says:

"Tho' Gage, whom proclamations call
Your Gov'nor and Vice Admiral,
Whose power gubernatorial still
Extends as far as Bunker's Hill,
Whose admiralty reaches clever
Near half a mile up Mystic River," etc.

McFingal.—Canto 2.

Gage was at that time shut up in Boston though, and was governor and admiral of little or nothing. His proclamation is thus prefaced:

By his Excellency the Honourable Thomas Gage, Esquire, Governor and Commander-in-Chief in and over His Majesty's Province of Massachusetts Bay, and Vice-Admiral of the same.

The Honorable Mr. Trumbull very well makes out his case.

—The earliest of the satirists of whom we have been speaking was truly what is called a phenomenon of precocious intellectual development. From a manuscript authority his descendant—whose article may be found in the Historical Magazine of last month—has made some additions to his ancestor's biography, from which we take these facts: At the age of two years, that is in 1752, he began his primer; in six months he had learned to read. Before that he knew by heart all the primer verses and Watts's "Children's Hymns." Before he was four years old he had read all the Bible, and it is related of him that at this same period, having begun to make verses, he cried because he feared he never should be able to write poetry as good as Dr. Watts. At five years of age he made attempts to write down, in print, his own poems—"large hugeous letters," says President Stiles, for he had not learned copyhand. At six he began without his father's knowledge to learn Latin, and at seven years and six months old he was admitted on examination to Yale College. He then knew the four Gospels in Greek and in Latin, had read Corderius, twelve of Cicero's orations, and the eclogues and "Æneid" of Virgil—a "fit" in the classics which would take a young man into most American colleges of the present day. His father was, however, judicious enough to take the boy home again, and he was not a matriculated student at Yale till he was between thirteen and fourteen years of age. At twenty-one he was a tutor there. "McFingal" was finished when he was thirty-two years old, he having previously—at the age of twenty-three—been admitted to the bar in Connecticut; studied one year—a part of his twenty-fourth and twenty-fifth—in the office of John Adams, in Boston, and written many articles in the newspapers, none of them without some small cleverness, but none of them nearly so good as his Hudibrastic "McFingal," some few lines of which, having gone into the books of familiar quotations, will keep his name alive, and be attributed, when quoted, to Butler.

—Not impossibly, not improbably even, when Mr. Matthew Arnold's desired chair of Celtic literature is set up in Oxford or Cambridge, some future O'Curry may discover in the mass of Welsh and Irish manuscripts some valuable information now unknown in regard to probable voyages, made no one knows how long before Columbus, between the British Islands and the shores of this continent. Then the Prince Madoc ap Owen Gwinneth and his Floridian expedition may perhaps be rescued wholly from the realm of fable. Humboldt seriously entertained such a hope, and after what has lately been made current information in regard to the extent of Celtic literary remains it seems a hope not unreasonable. Of knowledge already gathered together in regard to pre-Columbian voyages to America we suppose Professor Rafn's "Antiquitates Americanæ" to be the best repository. Referring to it in the last Historical Magazine, Mr. J. Carson Brevoort, of the Long Island Historical Society, quotes from it two passages, of which, as it seems to him, Professor Rafn had not perceived the full significance as bearing on earliest American history. To Mr. Brevoort they seem to give not proof but certainly some ground for supposing that traders from Europe had visited this continent before even the first Scandinavian voyager of whom we have accounts. One of the passages referred to is from the Heimskringla (Rafn, p. 191). It relates how Leif, the bishop, was sent by King Olaf to Greenland, and that he went also to Vineland (Vinlandia Bona), "which is generally conceded to be New England," Mr. Brevoort asserts. Somewhere in his journey, but the Heimskringla does not say where, whether near Vineland or east of Greenland, the bishop found men in the open sea floating on the planks of their wrecked vessel. In the other of the two passages (Rafn, pp. 290–3) we have a fragment of a manuscript which is conjectured to have been written about two hundred years after the date of the Heimskringla. It speaks of Leif's rescue of the shipwrecked men. "Leifus," it says, "fortunatus dictus, primus Vinlandiam invenit, in quo etiam itinere mercatores oceani periculis vexatos, reperit." The mariners are here called merchants, and Leif is said to have picked them up while making the voyage in which he discovered Vineland. So, if we could be surer about the age of this manuscript, and knew whether Leif found the shipwrecked men in the early or latter part of his voyage, and whether or not an easterly storm blew them to the place where he found them; and were more certain that Vinlandia was New England, and knew whether the writer of the manuscript was talking carefully or inaccurately—making, by conjecture, the homines of the Heimskringla into mercatores—we might hazard the guess that before the year 1000 European merchants visited the shores of this continent. As Mr. Brevoort says, it would as yet be rash to do more than make the guess.

BADEAU'S GRANT.*

The official Army Register for 1867, bearing date the 1st of August, 1867, shows that Adam Badeau was at that date a first lieutenant in the Fourth Regiment of infantry, and an aide-de-camp, with the rank of colonel. He holds his staff rank under the act of July 25, 1866, which provides that the General of the Armies of the United States may select from the line of the army, for service upon his staff, such number of aids, not exceeding six, as he may judge proper, who, during the term of such staff service, shall each have the rank, pay, and emoluments of a colonel of cavalry. The difference between the rank, pay, and emoluments of a lieutenant of infantry and those of a colonel of cavalry is very great, and the difference in the general beatitude of the two positions of subaltern in a marching regiment and officer at general headquarters can hardly be less. The world knows very little of the vie intime of General Grant's military family; but it has long been evident that the General had a strong partiality for Colonel Badeau, or set a high estimate upon his capacity. The publication of this history furnishes another proof of the General's sagacity in the choice of men. He proved long ago that he knew how to select soldiers able to win whatever game of strategy or perform whatever feat of arms the occasion might require. It now appears that he is equally fortunate in his selection of a person to render him service with the pen.

Colonel Badeau's book is very much such a one as General Grant, from the little we know of him, may be supposed to be best pleased to have written about him. A good deal has long been known about him as a soldier, and this book tells more than was known before; but, as a man, he is seen hardly more distinctly than a mist-wrapped god on the plains before windy Troy. Who shall say whether he wishes to be President, whether he is ambitious, whether he is elated by his successes, whether he traces them altogether to his own merit or thinks that he has owed much to fortune? Who has been able to say with confidence more than that, with Grant for our leader, we saw a great and terrible struggle brought to a triumphant close? The interest of the book before us is to be found mainly in the light which it throws on the unsettled question of Grant's soldierly ability, the question how far his brilliant successes were traceable directly to his personal influence, the qualities of his mind and character. It is not an interesting book, in the popular sense of the term. It is written in good, plain English, but not with the finish of the practised writer, or any positive charm of style. It is a plain, unvarnished tale, and one who reads for amusement mainly will do far better to turn to the storied page of Swinton. It depends for its interest and its value upon its supply of authentic information, and the supply is so abundant, and so much of the information is original, that it has a great deal of both. The author has had access to the telegraphic and written correspondence of the armies, and to all papers under the control of the War Department, including the original reports made by the rebel generals of every battle but two which he describes, and the original rebel field returns. He has also had the advantage of examining Grant's correspondence, both private and official, and of daily conversation, for three years and more, with the General and the officers who accompanied him in his earlier campaigns. From such material he has made up this volume, which brings the narrative down to the 9th of March, 1864, when Grant was made Lieutenant-General, and assumed command of all the armies of the United States. He says in his preface: "I have not meant to state one fact unless it came under my own personal observation, or has been told me by the General of the army, or one of his important officers, or unless I know it from official papers."

With excellent good taste, the author passes rapidly over so much of Grant's life as preceded the fall of Fort Sumter and his entry into the military service of the United States, finding a couple of pages sufficient for telling the whole. The five hundred and fifty or more pages which follow, and make up the main portion of the book, contain the story of the battle of Belmont, the fall of Fort Henry, the capture of Fort Donelson, the battle of Shiloh, the campaign and siege of Vicksburg, including the various attempts to approach the city by means of canals and bayous, the running of the batteries, the battles of Port Gibson, Raymond, Jackson, Champion Hills, and Black River Bridge, the final opening of the Mississippi River, and a full account of the manner in which the siege of Chattanooga was raised, and the brilliant victory gained over the army of Bragg. The last hundred pages of the book are made up of letters, despatches, orders, and reports, and are of great interest and value.

As a military history of the first three years of the war, so far as Grant was connected with it, this book is very satisfactory. It follows the chronological order of events, and it is a good, plain, intelligible, straightforward account. Its effect, as a whole, upon thinking men can hardly be other than to raise their estimate of Grant's ability as a soldier. His energy and pertinacity are universally acknowledged already, but this book shows him a thoughtful, painstaking, provident commander, making his preparations with the utmost care, and reducing the influence of chance to the lowest possible point. It also shows—particularly in the account of the siege of Fort Donelson and the battle of Shiloh—that he possesses higher qualities as a fighter of battles than those who know him mainly from the campaign of 1866 have been disposed to accord to him. It seems to prove that he was among the first to grasp the true idea of the war of the rebellion—that the Southern armies were the real objective points. It claims for Grant that he was the original projector of Sherman's great movements in the last year of the war; but there is much to be said in opposition to this claim, and it should be admitted, if at all, only after a careful scrutiny of the evidence on each side of the question.

The attention of the reader is not kept alive to any great extent by picturesque description, but some interesting anecdotes are introduced, and not only is the book far from dull, but it is creditably free from bathos and extravagance. It is true, however, that the author permits himself to declare (p. 551) that, at Knoxville, "many of the troops stood in line with only a blanket to cover their nakedness;" and once, in the space of three lines, the Southern armies appear as "the rebel lion," and "the snake, if scotched, not killed." But the newspaper-correspondent asserts himself most singularly in the statement, impossible to prove, but equally impossible to disprove, that at Missionary Ridge, "fierce jets of flame, like those once seen on Sinai, seemed to issue from the mountain side." It is difficult also to conjecture for what class of readers the information contained in the following note was considered necessary. The text is, "At the outbreak of the rebellion Grant was not an abolitionist." The note is, "Those in favor of the abolition of slavery had long been known as abolitionists." But though such opportunities for criticism occasionally present themselves, the defects of the author's style are not numerous or serious.

* "Military History of Ulysses S. Grant, from April, 1861, to April, 1865. By Adam Badeau, Colonel and Aide-de-Camp to the General-in-Chief, Brevet Brigadier-General U. S. Army. Vol. I." New York: D. Appleton & Co. 1868.

The close personal relations which Colonel Badeau has long sustained to General Grant give a peculiar significance to the judgments which he pronounces upon the character and capacity of the prominent soldiers of the late war. It is true that he says in his preface that his opinions have not been submitted to General Grant, and that for them he alone is responsible. Whether he here refers to his opinions upon both events and on men, or on events alone, is not clear; but, supposing the statement to apply as much to the one as to the other, it is difficult to believe that the opinions of the favored aid of the General of the Armies of the United States about other general officers can be far different from those entertained by the General himself. Such difference as there might be would probably be in the direction of exaggeration, for the inferior is not likely to have the complete knowledge of the superior, nor the magnanimity which, in Grant's case, seems to attend his profound skill in judging of men, and the enthusiasm of the follower for his great chief may lead him too far. For this tendency allowance should be made in deciding how far to take the judgments of men which Colonel Badeau expresses for those which the General holds.

The subject of the present volume does not lead to the frequent mention of the campaigns and commanders of the Army of the Potomac, but the author seems to know but little of the former and to think but little of the latter, of all of whom his mention is either slight or slighting. He speaks of Antietam as a positive victory with only negative results, a description which is as nearly as possible exactly wrong. Regarded by itself, it came very close to being a drawn battle. Its military importance lay mainly in the facts that it gave a complete check to a series of brilliant offensive movements made by Lee, and that any result to an engagement short of victory is tantamount to a defeat to an invading army. Strange as the statement may appear, the author speaks of Fredericksburg and Chancellorsville as if he thought they were victories for the Union armies. In his brief mention of the battle of Gettysburg, he loses sight at once of the facts and of the great principle of the war that he has before praised Grant for discerning and adopting, namely, that only when the rebel armies were either subdued or annihilated would the rebellion end. He says that in the January succeeding Gettysburg "the rebel chief, with undiminished legions and audacity, still lay closer to the national capital than to Richmond." We believe, on the other hand, that the magnificent army which Lee commanded from the moment when Johnston was struck down under the persimmon tree near Seven Pines till the surrender of Appomattox Court House was never the same after he pitched his tents on Seminary Ridge. In those "three long summer days" near Gettysburg Lee lost near thirty thousand men, a number said to exceed the aggregate of the losses of his army in the whole series of battles which Grant delivered from the Rapidan to the James River, and, considering the quality of the "matchless infantry," who did and suffered the most on the Southern side, the loss was irreparable. It was Grant's good fortune to capture Vicksburg and Richmond, to cause vast bodies of troops to lay down their arms, to open the Mississippi River, and to end the war, but he never inflicted a defeat upon the enemy in the field which even approached in severity the heaviness of the blow dealt by the Army of the Potomac and General Meade to the Army of Northern Virginia and General Lee at Gettysburg.

The incapacity of General Halleck, whether as a general commanding an army in the field or directing operation from headquarters is now generally admitted, but the doubters and the curious will find in this book much to enable them to make up their minds and to satisfy their curiosity. The most extraordinary piece of new information which we notice is the statement that when Halleck was made General-in-Chief, in July, 1862, he offered the command of the Army of the Tennessee not to Grant, his second in command, who had already taken Fort Donelson and fought the battle of Shiloh, but to a quartermaster named Allen. Colonel Badeau admits, however, with entire frankness, that the unpleasantnesses, interferences, and reprimands which characterized Halleck's treatment of Grant to a very considerable extent in the first two years of the war entirely disappeared afterwards, and that Halleck proved himself a zealous co-operator with the rising soldier, and a candid admirer of his successes.

The story of the rise and fall of the military fortunes of McClernand is fully told in this volume, and it furnishes an interesting and instructive exposition of some of the peculiar difficulties which attend the carrying on of war in republican countries, where the politician becomes a general because he is a politician and without ceasing to be a politician. No candid man, who reads this book, will be likely to pay much attention to any political opposition which McClernand may hereafter make to Grant.

The author finds no kind word to say of Buell, and he seldom mentions Rosecrans except to blame him, or to call him inactive, obstinate, or insubordinate. In fact, the author's indisposition to make cordial mention of officers outside what may be called the family party, composed of Grant, Sherman, McPherson, and Sheridan, is an unsatisfactory feature of the book. His favorable attention is concentrated upon Grant and his especial lieutenants, and all others, especially those who may be regarded as in the very slightest degree candidates for popular favor independently of their connection with him, are pretty sure to be mentioned disparagingly or not at all.

The maps procured by Colonel Badeau are sufficiently numerous, they are very good, and they are of very convenient size and conveniently placed. The general execution of the author's task thus far is good enough to make us look forward with impatience to the appearance of the second volume, which will treat of matters as to which there is much greater difference of opinion than there is as to the subjects of the present volume.

AGASSIZ IN BRAZIL.*

THE novelty of this work consists almost wholly in its scientific details. The reader must not look in it for exciting adventures, wild explorations, unusual hardships, or—speaking only of the narrative—other than twice-told tales of travellers. The romance of an expedition munificently sustained by a private citizen of Boston, and surrounded with Imperial favor throughout its progress in Brazil, is lost in the very ease with which it was conducted at every stage. Hundreds, perhaps thousands, of persons will read of Brazil for the first time in these pages, and to such it is enough to say that Mrs. Agassiz has reported very faithfully the general aspect of the country. It was not practicable for her to excite an interest apart from the main object of the journey; but there is much in her diary, when she is not the mouthpiece of the professor, to instruct and gratify those who are indifferent to the glacial theory and the Darwinian controversy. Chapter thirteen, on the physical history of the Amazons, is from Mr. Agassiz's own pen, and has already appeared in the Atlantic Monthly, so that the public are pretty familiar with his theories as to the ice era and area in South America. They may be briefly summed up as follows: That there was a time when the glaciers from the Andes and the mountains of Guiana covered all the great plain between these limits and the Atlantic to the east and south, depositing a vast moraine which effectually walled out the sea, and formed a purely fresh-water basin, in which no marine shells or fossils have been found, and in which, through long epochs, the present alternate sandstone and clay strata were laid, surmounted by the customary glacial drift interspersed with erratic boulders, which may be traced from Rio to the borders of Peru, both by way of the coast and across the country; that, in time, from some cause, internal or external, the terminal barrier was destroyed, and that in the prodigious flow of waters which ensued an unparalleled erosion of the soil occurred, of which the hills of Almeyrim—as the highest remains of the original bottom—are a gauge; that the mouth of the Amazons was then many hundreds of miles to the east of its present one, and the great river counted among its tributaries the Paranahyba and all the streams west of it to the Tocantins. These surmises are abundantly established by the character of the strata and of the boulders, the uniformity and extent of the drift, and its distinguishableness from decomposed rock in situ—marked in the coffee districts by the more prosperous plantations, and in practice among the farmers, when selecting coffee land, by the boulders scattered through it; by the proved encroachment of the sea upon the Amazons and the northern shore of the continent, which is still going on at a calculable rate; and finally by remains of the lateral moraine among the serras of Ceará, where Mr. Agassiz, with scientific prescience, had announced it would be found. The only objection to this sufficient and

* "A Journey in Brazil. By Professor and Mrs. Louis Agassiz." Second Edition. Boston: Ticknor & Fields. 1868. Pp. 540.

otherwise conclusive theory is, that the usual glacial scratches are wholly wanting even in the mountainous environs of Rio; but "there is not," as the professor explains, "a natural surface of rock, unless recently broken, to be found anywhere."

Whether Mr. Agassiz has been as triumphantly successful in refuting Mr. Darwin as in flooding the tropics with ice, we shall not presume to decide. In this branch of his researches he works perhaps rather more as a partisan than as a philosopher, but we know that his pupils are not trained to be doctrinaires (witness his admirable instructions on board the Colorado), and that his associates in the expedition corroborate beyond question the fact upon which he mainly relies to show "that the transmutation theory is wholly without foundation"—viz., the distribution of species in the Amazons and its tributaries (both actual and ancient). No one can feel at liberty to doubt that these rivers are divided into numerous well-defined habitats of fishes and groups of fishes that do not roam at large; and if this proves that "any given fauna is distinct and has originated where it now exists," and that the gradation uniting all animals is intellectual and not material, then, we suppose, we must abandon the claim of having monkeys for our forefathers, which Mr. Agassiz persists in thinking impious as well as unphilosophical. It would be unfair, however, to pass over his investigation of the human species also, for further arguments against Mr. Darwin. Such a mixture of races as is to be met with in Portuguese America exists in no other part of the world, and it is sincerely to be desired that Mr. Agassiz, who made there a complete series of photographs—front, profile, and back—of Indians, negroes, half-breeds, and the thousand and one shades of indiscriminate amalgamation, may speedily publish them, and deduce from them, if he can, the stability of types and the limited range and instability of varieties. We are bound to observe that in his present reasoning on this head he is guilty of some omissions which seriously impair the strength of his position. Undoubtedly it would greatly discomfit Mr. Darwin to prove that the mixture of bloods produces only deterioration and "a mongrel nondescript type, deficient in physical and mental energy;" but it is well to remember the circumstances under which this mixture has taken place—the contact of a superior with an inferior civilization in a state of slavery, the most effective instrument of amalgamation—as well as to allow for human development some of those periods which the naturalist allows to geology, and even the stock-raiser to the animal which he wishes to acclimate in a strange country. Had he done this, Mr. Agassiz would hardly have ventured, travelling somewhat beyond his record, to advise in the reconstruction of Southern society as confidently as in the reconstruction of a fossil or an extinct species from a single bone. He is no friend of slavery, and yet he considers that to yield the negro the crown of independence and self-protection is to break down, "from a mistaken philanthropy," all barriers between blacks and whites, and ensure the debasement of both. He adds:

"At a time when the new social status of the negro is a subject of vital importance in our statesmanship, we should profit by the experience of a country where, though slavery exists, there is far more liberality towards the free negro than he has ever enjoyed in the United States. Let us learn the double lesson: open all the advantages of education to the negro, and give him every chance of success which culture gives to the man who knows how to use it; but respect the laws of nature, and let all our dealings with the black man tend to preserve, as far as possible, the distinctness of his national characteristics, and the integrity of our own."

In chapter sixteen Mr. Agassiz gives his general impressions of Brazil. Compared with those of other travellers, they show that he was neither blind nor disposed to extenuate, as a guest of both Emperor and people, the well-known national defects. He found the Brazilians indolent and licentious; fond of fireworks and of superstitious observances; ignorant of the interior of their country, and taking no steps to connect it with the capital and the coast by interfluvial highways; importing vegetables and fruit that could be raised by themselves almost without effort; keeping cows, but using little milk and importing their cheese; on the Amazons, with its 2,000 species of fish, importing salt cod, and suffering periodically from a dearth of food amid the most luxuriant vegetation in the world. He found them, on the other hand, amiable and courteous; wherever he went, assisting him in making his collections, and imitating the example of the Emperor evidently out of their obliging disposition rather than in obedience to orders. He praises the tenacity with which, in the face of all discouragements, they have pursued the cultivation of coffee and cotton, and is full of hope of their steady progress in material prosperity. They have opened the Amazons to the free commerce of all nations, and it only remains for the Government to withdraw the patronage which it now extends to certain companies to the general disadvantage. Of the Brazilian women both Mr. and Mrs. Agassiz speak deploringly, especially of those of the North. Like the ladies of Quito—

"Many a Brazilian lady passes day after day without stirring beyond her four walls, scarcely ever showing herself at the door or window, for she is always in a slovenly dishabille unless she expects company. It is sad to see these stifled existences; without any contact with the world outside, without any charm of domestic life, without books or culture of any kind, the Brazilian Senhora in this part of the country either sinks contentedly into a vapid, empty, aimless life, or frets against her chains, and is as discontented as she is useless."

"Among my own sex," continues Mrs. Agassiz, p. 481, "I have never seen such sad lives as became known to me there,—lives deprived of healthy, invigorating happiness, and intolerably monotonous—a negative suffering, having its source, it is true, in the absence of enjoyment rather than in the presence of positive evils, but all the more to be deplored because so stagnant and inactive."

And Mr. Agassiz, speaking to the same point, says, p. 502:

"I cannot close what I have to say of instruction in Brazil without adding that, in a country where only half the nation is educated, there can be no complete intellectual progress. Where the difference of education makes an intelligent sympathy between men and women almost impossible, so that their relation is necessarily limited to that of the domestic affections, never raised, except in some very exceptional cases, to that of cultivated companionship, the development of the people as a whole must remain imperfect and partial."

We quote the remark because it seems to us to have a wider application than to Brazil alone. Mr. Agassiz's anticipations of a "rapid reform" in this direction seem justified by the innovation which even his short stay in Rio introduced—that of public lectures, attended by both sexes.

In keeping with the beautiful typography of this volume are the illustrations, mostly from photographs, drawn upon wood by Mr. Fenn with a fidelity that leaves little to be desired. It is rare that the tropical vegetation in particular is so conscientiously represented. We think the professor would have done well to prepare a sketch map for the reader who wants to know where he went and for the reader who wants to know what he discovered.

Recent Republications.—Mr. T. W. Higginson, we believe, prepared this work* for the juvenile public. He gives us, in Dickens's language, views of "Little Nell," "The Marchioness," "Paul and Florence," "The Fat Boy," "Tiny Tim," "Smike," and "Oliver Twist." These all, good and bad, are "child-pictures" which seem to us meant for the eyes of adults. Its author says, in his half-deprecatory prefatory note, that the chapters contained in the book are "especially associated with children." They talk about children. But for juvenile readers they are as little adapted as almost any chapters that could have been selected from all of Mr. Dickens's works. Where they are absolutely good they are humorous delineations of grown people or children, and, unless we are entirely mistaken, humor is almost entirely thrown away on people under fourteen years of age. When they are not humorous delineations of old folks and young they are pretty badly sentimentally pathetic, and therefore not very good mental pabulum for children any more than for other people. "This Marchioness," said Mr. Swiveller, folding his arms, "is a very extraordinary person, surrounded by mysteries, ignorant of the taste of beer," and so on—all of which is wasted on small boys and girls. Mr. Swiveller is meat for men. A chapter on Barnaby Rudge and his raven would have been absolutely nothing like so good, and relatively a thousand times better. Mr. Wardle's fat boy, too, whenever he is not a mere farcical lay figure, is a person that children do not appreciate. They laugh when he goes asleep, to be sure, and they would laugh a great deal more if he would go asleep a great deal quicker in much odder positions and places, and breathe a great deal more stertorously when he does drop off. But when he is really good or nearly good, he is out of sight of the children. The chapter entitled "Oliver Twist" seems to us much the best chosen. It has more straightforward story-telling than the others, and has not much else. At any rate, the story-telling is more unalloyed by other things too good and too bad for the audience whom the compiler addresses. Still, the book will do something towards leading young readers into Dickens. It will not perform that work so well as if the compiler had not, apparently, been misled by the notion that a book for children ought to be a book about children, but it will to some extent perform it. Of Mr. Eytinge's new illustrations of Dickens we have more than once spoken. There are none worse. Wherever Mr. Dickens's sentimentality is most disagreeably weakly we find in Mr. Eytinge a sympathetic illustrator; wherever Mr. Dickens is really strong Mr. Eytinge is as far as possible from understanding him.

Every one who has read the book will be glad that Mrs. Dall's latest and best contribution to social reform has reached a second edition, though we hope no one will infer that the author is "making a good thing" by the sale.* The mechanical portion of a work so elegantly printed as this is scarcely paid for by the disposal of a thousand copies, more or less; and ten thousand sold would do far more to prosper the cause of woman than to enrich Mrs. Dall or the publishers. This new edition has rendered additional outlay necessary for an index, for corrections of sundry errors in the plates, and for the supplementary preface, in which Mrs. Dall neatly controverts Dr. Todd—or what was left of him after the application of a "counter-irritant"—on the question of inventive genius in woman. So the book is worthier than ever to go where Mrs. Stanton and Miss Anthony will never get a hearing; and where Gail Hamilton has entered as a "skirmisher," Mrs. Dall ought to follow as a hoplite to hold the field.

* "Child-Pictures from Dickens." With illustrations by S. Eytinge, Jr. Boston: Ticknor & Fields. 1868.

Except in being cheaper and a little squarer in shape, the new "Father Tom"† is like the edition which we noticed a few weeks ago, and which sold very readily. The text of each, in fact, has several inaccuracies which are pointed out in the present edition, and we think we have noticed several that still stand uncorrected in the table of errata as well as in the text. One of the corrections must be a mistake. Why, when the Pope is speaking good Latin, should "excommunicabo" be changed to "excommunicæbo"?

The plates of this edition of Cary's "Dante"‡ are not new, but the print is legible, and the book is prettily and conveniently bound in the "Globe" style. A life of Dante and chronological view of the age in which he lived precede the poem; and an index of proper names is added.

Dr. Smith's school histories of Rome, Greece, and England§ are very well known, and are known favorably as being in the main candid in tone, accurate in matters of fact, well up to the most approved recent opinion, and reasonably good in point of style. His "History of England" may be said to be a "middle-class" book. It presents the same view of those periods in English history which have divided English opinion as that taken by Protestants as distinguished from Catholics, and by rather advanced Liberals as distinguished from Tories and from English republicans. Milton would have been far better pleased with it than Laud, and Macaulay would have liked it better than either. Americans will smile when they read that "they are now (1862) suffering severely from the disruption of the Union just eighty years after its recognition;" but, on the whole, they have no reason to find fault with the tone of the book or, as patriotic persons, to be otherwise than quite willing to use Dr. Smith's volume as a manual of history so far as regards England's connection with America, or as regards the strife on English soil between the principles in which Americans believe and those whose defeat we hope for and await. The book is very far from our ideal of what a school history should be; but it is as good a one on the subject of which it treats as any that we know, and better than most. It undertakes to do too much. So it does too much in one way and too little in another. Ingenuous youths will learn from it that Mr. Vansittart was afterwards Lord Bexley, and will learn several hundred, perhaps several thousand, facts of equal importance; but the space at command of a school historian being limited, they will learn less than one would like them to learn of better things. It seems a thing almost unnecessary to be said, that it is of less consequence to teach boys, English or American, that So-and-so was a member of the Rockingham administration than to teach him, for example, how England became a constitutional monarchy while its freer neighbors submitted to a sort of absolutism. Yet readers familiar with school histories know that it is a thing very necessary to be said to almost every writer of school histories. There are books worse than Dr. Smith's as regards this defect, which is the worst defect of Dr. Smith's history. A good school history of England has yet to be written, and the same remark is to be made of other countries so far as we know school histories of other countries. In almost all school-houses of which we have knowledge history is "an old almanac." We praise the book before us as relatively good, not as absolutely better than bad. In this edition the work is a cheap one, the binding and paper are quite good enough for school-boys' handling, the type will not try young eyes, and the wood-cuts are a help to the text, and better executed by much than those of the last volume of this series which passed under our hands—the author's abridgment, reprinted, of Strickland's "Queens of England."

We have spoken of the work as Dr. Smith's. It was drawn up by Mr. Philip Smith, under Dr. Smith's superintendence and direction, and Dr. Smith is responsible for it. Its table of contents is well prepared, and will serve teachers of a certain sort as a set of questions to be used in recitation. At the end are tables showing the genealogies of the royal houses who have ruled England.

The Voice in Singing. Translated from the German of Emma Seiler, by a member of the American Philosophical Society. (Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. 1868.)—We extend to this little work a hearty welcome. It is a scientific yet clear and practical discussion of a subject which certainly stands in need of far more intelligent consideration than it has been accustomed to receive.

The necessity for further light upon the proper treatment of the voice is sufficiently shown by the fact that there are nearly as many theories concerning it as there are teachers of singing. The author of this work does not overstate the truth in the following description:

"No one who has not made the art of singing a special study can form any idea of the obscure and conflicting views in regard to the transitions of the registers which prevail among singing teachers and artists. Almost every teacher has a peculiar theory of his own in regard to the formation of the voice, every one has his own views, sometimes extremely fanciful, of the formation of tones, and of the registers—views to which he tenaciously adheres, summarily rejecting all others."

Such being the case, it is of much interest to know whether this new guide is all that it professes to be. We think it is. Its author is a German lady who has spent years in a most thorough and patient examination of the actual operations of the vocal organs in the process of producing tones. By the aid of the laryngoscope (an ingenious instrument of English invention which enables a person to examine his own or another's throat almost as minutely as he can examine his hand) she has for several years carried on a series of experiments with all kinds and qualities of voices, till the manner in which tones are produced in all the different registers and the method of transition from one register to another have become entirely clear to her mind. The spirit in which these investigations have been conducted of course counts for much. Mme. Seiler seems to have been entirely free from such pre-established notions as would have tended to disturb the soundness of her conclusions. In fact, one valuable feature of her discussions is that she does not seem too eager to thrust her own views forward, but in describing her experiments is usually content to state the facts themselves, leaving it for others to draw inferences and build up theories.

There is a vein of practical common sense running through the book which argues well for its usefulness. For example, while reading the chapters which describe so minutely the action of the ligaments and cartilages which determine the human voice, the fear suggested itself to our mind more than once that some undiscerning teachers might be led to regard a philosophical treatise as a method of instruction, and endeavor to teach singing by similar anatomical descriptions; which would be about as sensible as for a dancing-master to undertake to give instructions in his art by a series of lectures on the muscles of the leg. But our apprehensions were soon relieved by finding the reader particularly cautioned against this fallacy. While insisting that the teacher should thoroughly understand the physiological laws and occult operations of the vocal apparatus, the author shows clearly that right instruction in singing is almost wholly a matter of example and imitation. Scientific knowledge of the subject may be desirable for the pupil just as any other knowledge is desirable, but in acquiring the right method of using the voice, familiarity with physiological law will be of very little service to him.

Madame Seiler presents with great force the decadence of the art of singing under the present system—or systems—of instruction, and points, with a regret that every musical reader will share, to the old Italian schools such as the one under Porpora, where poor voices learned to become sweet, and where fine voices grew to be world-wonders. Then the children learned to sing, and began softly, sweetly, naturally. Now girls must wait till they are young ladies, for in less than a half-dozen lessons they will be expected to "swell" their poor throats to their utmost power, and stretch them until the highest and lowest possible compass is reached. Then there was ease and purity and freshness of tone. Now there is huskiness and straining and white-of-egg and pickles and honey, until a transient smoothness is attained, only to relapse into worse huskiness when the excitement is over. We have even heard the monstrous proposition that a coarse, rough voice in talking was a sign of a good voice for singing. Then durability was an object; the good voice was preserved from childhood almost to old age. Now the young ladies—and young gentlemen too—scream their voices quite away before they reach the prime of life.

* "The College, the Market, and the Court; or, Woman's Relation to Education, Labor, and Law. By Caroline H. Dall." Second edition. Boston: Lee & Shepard. 1868.

† "Father Tom and the Pope; or, A Night in the Vatican." New York: Moorhead, Simpson & Bond. 1868.

‡ "The Vision; or, Hell, Purgatory, and Paradise of Dante Alighieri. Translated by Rev. H. F. Cary, A.M." Flaxman's illustrations. New York: D. Appleton & Co. 1868.

§ "A Smaller History of England, from the Earliest Times to the Year 1862. Edited by Wm. Smith, LL.D." New York: Harper & Brothers. 1868.

Other topics are discussed in this work—as, for instance, "The Æsthetic View of the Art of Singing;" but we have preferred to dwell upon what we regard as by far the most important points. The translator has done his work carefully and well. He can rest assured that he has rendered the musical world a service by bringing this treatise within the reach of English readers.

History of the Microscope, etc. By Jabez Hogg. Sixth edition. (New York: Geo. Routledge & Sons.)—One of the best of the numerous English works on popular science is this of Mr. Hogg's, of which the present edition purports to have been partly rewritten, and is profusely illustrated. As a treatise on microscopical science and art the book cannot vie with Frey, Carpenter, or Quickett, but it has, nevertheless, fulfilled the author's object, which seems to have been to excite, outside of scientific circles, a widespread desire to investigate the wonderful microcosm which the compound achromatic microscope has revealed. The chapter on the history of the instrument is written in a rather British spirit—nothing being said of Spencer and Tolles, Americans, who first made high powers with great angles of aperture. Almost nothing is said of the development of the principle of immersion as applied to objectives by Amici. The chapters on botany and zoölogy abound in information which will furnish the amateur microscopist with materials wherewith most agreeably to entertain his friends on a spare evening, and which may be made to serve as a basis for more detailed and systematic study. The section on human histology is particularly imperfect, many utterly wrong statements being made, and the wood engravings being copied from books by no means the most recent or reliable. The colored plates added to this edition are very handsome, and generally correct. On the whole, the book is one to be recommended to persons of both sexes who can afford to purchase an instrument, and who desire a recreation healthful to mind and body, and a source of unending pleasure and surprise. A tendency to the cultivation of this amateur science seems to be showing itself in various parts of the country, and would be fostered by the issue of cheap editions of such works as this of Mr. Hogg, and by the manufacture of solid, working microscopes, at a price corresponding with that of the "educational" instrument in England.

The Poetry of Compliment and Courtship. Selected and arranged by John Williamson Palmer. (Boston: Ticknor & Fields. 1868.)—This is a very satisfactory collection of the poetry described in the title-page. The "courtship" is happy, to be sure; the darker side of love affairs is not presented; there is no sighing that is much more than chin deep, and no shed of blood or unmelodious tears. Still, the collection is to be called satisfactorily complete. For it is only one of five parts which are to be prepared and published by Dr. Palmer, and which together will constitute a great body of poetry which may be called the Poetry of the Family. Its companions will complete it. There is, for the first part, this volume before us—219 beautifully printed duodecimo pages. It begins, as the compiler points out, with a gay, amorous, gallant little extravagance—Burns's "Green Grow the Rashes O!"—and it ends with a marriage. Next is to come the "Poetry of Marriage and Offspring;" how beginning and how ending we are not informed. Third in the series is the "Poetry of Home and Friends;" fourth, the "Poetry of Meeting, Parting, and Separation;" and, finally, the "Poetry of Bereavement, Condolement, and Consolation." The poetry of the family will, then, begin with the birth of the great passion in a youthful heart, and will end, in the fifth part, with the death of the beloved. Every part will fit into every other, and the whole will be symmetrical. The life of the family, to quote the compiler again, will be traced from its founding to its breaking up, through all its fortunes, happy or sad; all its ties of kindred or friendship, in selections of appropriate verse. The "Poetry of Compliment and Courtship" takes us only to the threshold of the family; we fancy that many poems of the volumes forthcoming will take us over the threshold again into the world at large. No scheme, even one so happily thought of as this of Dr. Palmer's, is perfectly carried out; but it is certain that if the other four volumes of the whole work—each volume, by the way, is complete in itself and independent of the others—are prepared with as much taste and knowledge as Dr. Palmer has displayed in this volume, we shall have from him the best general collection of the best poems that has ever at any time been made in this country or Great Britain, and, doubtless, we shall have mingled with the good ones a few bad ones. That is hardly to be helped; still, in the case of compilers of such books, a little easiness of taste—an easiness that admits something not truly excellent—may readily be forgiven; it ought not to be more than a little easiness; but it is fortunate if, instead of merely a too great facility of being pleased, we do not find in selecters of poems that utter failure in delicacy of perception which makes them stupidly reject the good. This Dr. Palmer has not done. He has printed some poems that we certainly would not have printed. But we believe he has left out none that we should have chosen, and we, as he seems to promise us, expect to see in some of the future volumes those pieces that we miss in this one. The whole work may, perhaps, have an index of authors; the part before us is deficient in that respect.

Time and Tide, by Weare and Tyne. Letters on the Laws of Work. By John Ruskin, LL.D. (New York: John Wiley & Son.)—The distinguished author announces that this book, with one other which is to follow and complete it, is his last political testament. It ought to be. It has about as obvious a relation to the world we live in as its title has to its contents. It is the fantasy of a pessimist who, if he does not ignore the irresistible tendency of modern society, sees in it only ruin and darkness—increasing prevalence of "mob violence," increased chances of "insane wars founded on popular passion." Mr. Ruskin detests liberty (we use his own words), and denies the possibility of equality, and he accordingly builds up a system of artificial restraints in which anything may be done to the recalcitrant except to sell them, and a class system in which place is found, among other things, for an ornamental aristocracy supported at the expense of the state. We are bound to acknowledge that he advocates compulsory education for every citizen, and that he believes in education as the only preventive of crime. It is also, we may remark, the only preventive of narrowness and prejudice like his when he says, "If I had to choose, I would tenfold rather see the tyranny of old Austria triumphant in the Old and New Worlds, and trust to the chance (or rather the distant certainty) of some day seeing a true emperor born to its throne, than, with every privilege of thought and act, run the most distant risk of seeing the thoughts of the people of Germany and England become like the thoughts of the people of America." And the highest education, which brings with it, as he himself points out, an humble perception of "the smallness of one's own powers and knowledge, as compared with the attainments of others," would have prevented Mr. Ruskin from including under the term "mob" "all our [English] popular economists and educators," for whom he cannot express the "contempt" he feels; from describing Mr. J. S. Mill as "foaming at the mouth" over the Jamaica atrocities; and from brutally charging him with a wilful suppressio veri in one of his politico-economical discussions, "for fear of fostering political agitation." Education ought also to have rendered difficult such a perversion of moral judgment as Mr. Ruskin showed (he reports the facts himself and in connection) when he gave twenty pounds to the widow and family of a deceased artist—whom he chides for having more children than he could support—and with the other hand bestowed a hundred in defence of Governor Eyre, who made widows by murdering the innocent.

It is, however—we may even say, happily—too clear that Mr. Ruskin is in a morbid state of mind which equally forbids either argument or censure. After asserting "the inevitable power and infectiousness of all evil, and the easy and utter extinguishableness of good," he says: "While, in summing up the observation of past life, not unwatchfully spent, I can truly say that I have a thousand times seen patience disappointed of her hope, and wisdom of her aim, I have never yet seen folly fruitless of mischief, nor vice conclude but in calamity." The failure to see that this is no real but a false antithesis; that patience would not be patience if it were always rewarded, nor vice vice if it ever concluded in aught but disaster; that if wisdom were infallible it would be incapable of growth, and there would be no room for humility, which now accompanies the highest human wisdom, while we should all be fools unless folly fruited in mischief;—the same failure, in short, to comprehend the development of the moral as of the political world, is evidence not only of a defective philosophy but of a mind almost diseased. He, too, had been observant who said, in the Scriptures, "I have been young and now am old; yet never have I seen the righteous forsaken nor his seed begging bread."

These letters to a cork-cutter have the merit of not being rigidly devoted to the subject which occasioned them. Mr. Ruskin is easily led aside by paragraphs in the newspapers—which he reads with commendable assiduity, even if he turns them to the account of his pessimism—and in the consequent episodes he says a great deal which is worth pondering, and most of which is undeniably just. Such are his remarks on the theatre, on Doré as an illustrator of the Bible fresh from the "Contes Drolatiques," on Mozart's prostitution of his art and genius in Don Giovanni and the Magic Flute; the passages on honesty, p. 38, and on time, p. 93, etc., etc. One even feels the ground firmer under his feet after experience of Mr. Ruski's vagaries, and we would warn nobody against reading him "unto this last."

Gemma: A Novel. By T. A. Trollope. (Philadelphia: T. B. Peterson & Brothers.)—The chief fault of Mr. Trollope's new novel is its length. It is a story of Italian life, of a period dating some thirty years back, which, though it gives us a glimpse of convent life as led by the pupils in those establishments, and contains, besides its apparently accurate descriptions of Italian scenery and manners, a suicide and an attempted murder, might very well have been condensed into a magazine story of fifty or sixty pages. But when a man is cursed—or blessed, according as one looks at the matter from the reader's or the writer's point of view—with such a fatal facility for making "copy," it is probably difficult for him to stay his hand. As the now almost-forgotten "Country Parson" said once, after filling two pages of the Atlantic with a succession of mild platitudes which would perhaps have possessed some slight force had they been stated in three or four sentences—"the experienced critic will see that I have here comprised in two pages what might with ease have been spread over ten or fifteen"—and he seemed to feel a certain pity for both himself and his readers that the inexorable limits of the space assigned him condemned him to such painful brevity. As novels go, Mr. Trollope's is a very fair novel; but it would have been better—might even have been good—had it been only half as long.

Even in that supposititious case, however, its merits would not have been of a very lofty order. It is one of those books whose interest depends mainly upon their story—and in this case the story, although Mr. Trollope assures us of its literal truth, and its incidents are of the most orthodox sensational nature, fails to excite a very lively interest. The fault is Mr. Trollope's, who attempts to combine sensational matter with a cool, business-like, unimpassioned manner, and produces rather an odd mixture. He deals with sufficiently interesting passions—with love, hopeless and successful, leading in the one case to the most desirable of marriages, and in the other to despair and jealousy, suicide and murder. His heroines, for he has two—the book deriving its title from the more unimportant of the two—are young Italian girls, bred together in a convent, who both love the same man. Between Count Gino Donati and Dianora Orsini a sort of tacit engagement has existed from their infancy; but as the time for their marriage draws near, he happens to see Gemma Venturi, falls hopelessly in love with her, and has the good luck to inspire her with a like passion. Dianora, becoming aware of his defection through the instrumentality of Dr. Carlo Parenti, a lodger in the house of Gemma's father, conceives the project of murdering her rival by some means which will slowly destroy her beauty, and, before her death, render her loathsome to her lover. She applies for assistance to the most convenient of witches, who cherishes at once an hereditary attachment to the house of Orsini and a long hatred to that of Venturi. The requisite poison—antimony in small doses—being obtained, Dianora finds an instrument for its administration at her hand, in the person of Dr. Parenti, whose love for her is the motive which induces him to assist her. The plot is, of course, arrested in due season. Dianora dies by her own hand, and her accomplice leaves the country; while Gemma recovers her health and her beauty, and is in due course married.

The interest of the story increases as it approaches its termination, and Mr. Trollope manages his incidents skilfully, and writes with a trained and practised hand. Nevertheless, we do not recommend his novel as very exhilarating reading.

UNITED STATES BANKRUPT LAW.

LITTLE, BROWN & CO.,

110 Washington Street, Boston,

Have just Published

THE BANKRUPT ACT OF 1867,

Compared with the Act of 1841, the English Bankrupt Law, and the Insolvent Law of Massachusetts. With a Digest of Decisions of the Courts of the United States, the several States, and of England; and with Forms of Proceeding. By Edward Avery and George M. Hobbs. 8vo, law sheep, $4 50.

"In preparing this edition of the Bankrupt Law the Editors have not intended to present a treatise on Bankruptcy, but simply to take the statute as it stood, and so arrange the notes and references as to present the leading cases under their appropriate heads.

"By sub-dividing the sections, and placing notes under each sub-division, it was believed that those consulting the law would find the authorities much more readily than by any other arrangement.

"Wherever the law has presented particular terms, or the authorities have seemed conflicting, such suggestions have been made as would lead to fuller and more critical examination than the scope of this work required.

"Much of the matter was prepared for their own practice, and the arrangement is that which they have found most convenient; and it is believed the work will be of service not only to the profession, but will aid the business community in obtaining a better understanding of the scope, purpose, and principles of the law."—Preface.

"The arrangement we consider to be simple and convenient. The notes contain a reference to all the cases bearing upon the preceding section, and the points decided in these cases are very clearly and concisely stated. The improvements often made on the original head-notes show how thoroughly the editors have done their work. As a manual, we cordially recommend this book to the profession, and do not hesitate to affirm that it is the best work on the Bankrupt Law of 1867 which has appeared."—American Law Review.

"The profession, especially those who may be engaged in cases of bankruptcy, will gladly avail themselves of this very essential aid to practice. It is prepared with great care, and the volume contains all that is needful to a thorough comprehension of the Bankrupt Law."—New Bedford Mercury.

"The simple arrangement of this volume, by which immediate reference can be made to any point, ought to recommend it to the profession."—Philadelphia Press.

CRITICAL AND SOCIAL ESSAYS.—Reprinted from The Nation. Leypoldt & Holt, Publishers.—"They are all scholarly and elegant to a degree rare in our newspaper literature, and worthy of preservation in this form."—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette. Price $1 50.

A BRILLIANT ARRAY OF TALENT.

THE NEW ECLECTIC,

FOR MARCH,

CONTAINS VALUABLE PAPERS

BY

The Right Honorable W. E. Gladstone, Mr. Matthew Arnold, Frances Power Cobbe, and others.

TWO NEW POEMS by Alfred Tennyson.

A NEW NOVEL by the author of "John Halifax, Gentleman."

The continuation of PHINEAS FINN, by Anthony Trollope.

A variety of interesting miscellaneous matter.

REVIEWS OF NEW BOOKS, etc.

THE NEW ECLECTIC IS PUBLISHED MONTHLY,

AT $4 PER ANNUM, BY

TURNBULL & MURDOCH,

49 Lexington Street, Baltimore.

Specimen copy, prepaid to any address, 25 cents.

THE DIVINE PROVIDENCE.

By EMANUEL SWEDENBORG.

1 vol. 12mo, extra cloth, bevelled boards, gilt top, $1 25.

The object of this work is to unfold the laws of order according to which the Lord's moral government is regulated. It shows that the Divine Providence works according to certain invariable laws; that it is universal, extending to the least things as well as to the greatest; that it has respect to what is eternal with man, and to things temporary only for the sake of what is eternal.

All the writings of Swedenborg and collateral works constantly on hand.

Publishing House of the New Jerusalem Church, 20 Cooper Union, New York.

JOS. R. PUTNAM, Manager.

 SEND FOR A CATALOGUE.

L. W. SCHMIDT,

GERMAN BOOKSELLER,

24 Barclay Street, New York,

Imports regularly all the leading Foreign Publications, including Periodicals.

Foreign works noticed in The Nation kept constantly on hand or procured to order.

FROM THE PRESS OF

J. B. Lippincott & Co.

I.

ANNALS OF THE UNITED STATES CHRISTIAN COMMISSION. By Rev. Lemuel Moss, Home Secretary to the Commission. In 1 vol. 8vo, of 752 pages. Illustrated. Toned paper, cloth extra, price $4 50.

II.

THE AMERICAN BEAVER AND HIS WORKS. By Lewis H. Morgan. Handsomely illustrated with twenty-three full-page lithographs and numerous wood-cuts. 1 vol. 8vo, tinted paper, fine cloth, price $5.

III.

THE GLOBE BULWER.

ZANONI: A Romance. By Sir E. Bulwer Lytton. 1 vol., tinted paper, frontispiece, cloth, $1 50.

IV.

THE LIFE OF LAS CASAS, "The Apostle of the Indies." By Arthur Helps. 12mo, tinted paper, fine cloth, $2 75.

V.

THE HISTORY OF THE KINGS OF ROME. By Thomas H. Dyer, LL.D. 8vo, cloth, $5.

VI.

SPIRITUAL WIVES. By W. Hepworth Dixon, author of "New America," "The Holy Land," etc. In 1 vol. crown 8vo, tinted paper, cloth, $2 75.

For sale by Booksellers generally, or will be sent by mail, postage free, on receipt of price by Publishers.

J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO.,

PUBLISHERS, BOOKSELLERS, AND IMPORTERS,

715 and 717 Market Street, Philadelphia.

CRITICAL AND SOCIAL ESSAYS.—Reprinted from The Nation. Leypoldt & Holt, Publishers.—"Of the whole twenty-five, there is, perhaps, none which does not contribute something to the reader's information, give him a new idea, or wake up an old one."—Boston Commonwealth. Price $1 50.

THE NATION.—"I appreciate The Nation far above any of the issues of the day."—Edw. McPherson, Esq., Clerk U. S. House of Representatives.

HARPER & BROTHERS,

NEW YORK,

HAVE JUST READY,

THE COMPLETION OF MOTLEY'S HISTORY OF THE NETHERLANDS. A History of the United Netherlands. From the Death of William the Silent to the Twelve Years' Truce—1609. By J. LOTHROP MOTLEY, D.C.L., author of "The Rise of the Dutch Republic." In four volumes. With portraits. 8vo, cloth, $14.

The Volumes sold separately at $3 50 each.

DR. SMITH'S SMALLER HISTORY OF ENGLAND. A Smaller History of England, from the Earliest Times to the Year 1862. Edited by WILLIAM SMITH, LL.D. Illustrated by Engravings on Wood. 16mo, cloth, $3.

Uniform with Dr. Smith's Smaller Histories of Greece and Rome.

QUEEN VICTORIA'S JOURNAL. Leaves from the Journal of our Life in the Highlands, from 1848 to 1861. To which are prefixed and added Extracts from the same Journal giving an Account of Earlier Visits to Scotland, and Tours in England and Ireland, and Yachting Excursions. Edited by ARTHUR HELPS. 12mo, morocco cloth, bevelled edges, $1 75.

QUEEN VICTORIA'S MEMOIR OF THE PRINCE CONSORT. The Early Years of his Royal Highness the Prince Consort. Compiled under the Direction of her Majesty the Queen, by Lieutenant-General the Hon. C. GREY. Portraits. New Edition. 12mo, morocco cloth, bevelled edges, $2.

SMILES'S HISTORY OF THE HUGUENOTS. The Huguenots: their Settlements, Churches, and Industries in England and Ireland. By SAMUEL SMILES, author of "Self-Help," etc. Crown 8vo, cloth, bevelled edges, $1 75.

DU CHAILLU'S GORILLA COUNTRY. Stories of the Gorilla Country. Narrated for Young People. By PAUL B. DU CHAILLU, author of "Discoveries in Equatorial Africa." Profusely Illustrated. 12mo, cloth, $1 75.

MRS. COMFORT'S FAIRY STORIES. Folks and Fairies: Stories for Little Children. By LUCY RANDALL COMFORT. With Engravings. Square 4to, cloth, $1.

BARNES'S EVIDENCES OF CHRISTIANITY. Lectures on the Evidences of Christianity in the Nineteenth Century. Delivered in the Mercer Street Church, New York, January 21 to February 21, 1867. On the "Ely Foundation," of the Union Theological Seminary. By ALBERT BARNES, author of "Notes on the New Testament," etc. 12mo, morocco cloth, bevelled edges, $1 75.

THE LOVER'S DICTIONARY: A Poetical Treasury of Lovers' Thoughts, Fancies, Addresses, and Dilemmas, Indexed with nearly Ten Thousand References as a Dictionary of Compliments and Guide to the Study of the Tender Science. Post 8vo, cloth, $3 50; gilt edges, $4 25.

THREE ENGLISH STATESMEN: Pym, Cromwell, and Pitt. A Course of Lectures on the Political History of England. By GOLDWIN SMITH, author of "Lectures on the Study of History," etc. 12mo, cloth, $1 50.

THE NEW NOVELS

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS,

New York:

A FRENCH COUNTRY FAMILY. By Mme. DE WITT, née GUIZOT. Translated by DINAH MULOCK CRAIK, author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," "A Noble Life," "Christian's Mistake," "Two Marriages," etc. Illustrations. 12mo, cloth, $1 50.

BROWNLOWS. By Mrs. OLIPHANT, author of "Agnes," "Madonna Mary," "The Laird of Norlaw," "The Days of my Life," "Carlingford," "Life of Edward Irving," etc. 8vo, paper, 38 cents.

MARGARET'S ENGAGEMENT. 8vo, paper, 50 cents.

PLAYING FOR HIGH STAKES. By ANNIE THOMAS, author of "On Guard," "Dennis Donne," "Theo Leigh," "Walter Goring," "Played Out," "Called to Account," etc. 8vo, paper, 25 cents.

GUILD COURT: A London Story. By GEORGE MACDONALD, author of "Annals of a Quiet Neighborhood," "Alec Forbes," etc. 8vo, paper, 50 cents.

THE BROTHERS' BET; or, Within Six Weeks. By EMILIE FLYGARE CARLEN. 8vo, paper, 25 cents.

THE HUGUENOT FAMILY. By SARAH TYTLER. 12mo, cloth, $1 50.

MABEL'S PROGRESS. By the author of "Aunt Margaret's Trouble." 8vo, paper, 50 cents.

THE WATERDALE NEIGHBORS. By the author of "Paul Massie." 8vo, paper, 50 cents.

CARLYON'S YEAR. By the author of "Lost Sir Massingberd." 8vo, paper, 25 cents.

STONE EDGE: A Tale. 8vo, paper, 25 cents.

 HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

25 CENTS A MONTH—$3 A YEAR.

THE BROADWAY,

NO. 7, FOR MARCH,

IS NOW READY, AND CONTAINS:

1. Brakespeare; or, the Fortunes of a Free Lance. By the author of "Guy Livingstone." With a full-page illustration. Chaps. XXIX. to XXXI.
2. London Newspapers. By HENRY SEDLEY, Editor of the Round Table.
3. Women's Novels.
4. The Story of 'Lorn Light: A Poem. By TOM HOOD. With a full-page illustration.
5. New York Theatres. By MOLYNEUX ST. JOHN. Part II.
6. Public Statues in London. By FRANCIS TURNER PALGRAVE. Part II.
7. Wall Street and American Finance. By ROBERT TOMES. With an illustration.
8. Second Thoughts. By F. C. BURNAND. Chaps. XVI. to XXI.
9. Change: A Poem. By DORA GREENWELL.

A SECOND SUPPLY OF

FROISSART'S CHRONICLES, with the Illuminations, in 2 vols. royal 8vo, handsomely half bound in morocco, gilt edges, has now been received.

ALSO FOR SALE, WITHOUT THE ILLUMINATIONS,

FROISSART'S CHRONICLES of England, France, Spain, and the adjoining countries. Illustrated with numerous wood engravings. 2 vols. royal 8vo, cloth, $12.

MONSTRELET'S CHRONICLES. Beginning at the year MCCCC, where that of Sir John Froiseart finishes, and ending at the year MCCCCLXVII, and continued by others to the year MDXVI. Illustrated with numerous wood engravings. 2 vols. royal 8vo, cloth, $9.

MEN OF THE TIME. A Dictionary of Contemporaries, containing Biographical Notices of Eminent Characters of both Sexes. Seventh edition thoroughly revised and brought down to the present time, 1868; thick 8vo, 880 pages, extra cloth, gilt top, $6.

Special pains have been bestowed upon the American names.

LAMB'S ESSAYS OF ELIA. Beautifully printed for 25 cents.

DE QUINCEY'S CONFESSIONS OF AN OPIUM EATER. Beautifully printed for 25 cents.

SCOTT'S NOVELS. Complete for 25 cents.

The volumes now ready are WAVERLEY, OLD MORTALITY, PEVERIL OF THE PEAK, QUENTIN DURWARD, FORTUNES OF NIGEL, IVANHOE, ROB ROY, THE MONASTERY, THE ANTIQUARY, GUY MANNERING, ST. RONAN'S WELL, HEART OF MIDLOTHIAN, BRIDE OF LAMMERMOOR, KENILWORTH, and THE PIRATE.

To be followed in rapid succession by the whole of Scott's Novels.

OUTWARD BOUND: A Merchant's Adventures. By the author of "Rattlin, the Reefer," etc., etc. 12mo, boards, $1.

ALL IN THE WRONG. By THEODORE HOOK, author of "Gilbert Garney," etc., etc. 12mo, boards, $1.

Just received, price 30 cents, a further supply of

GOOD CHEER,

Being the Christmas Number of GOOD WORDS, Containing Christmas Stories and Poems by

Norman Macleod, D.D.,	Mrs. Oliphant,
George Macdonald,	Tom Myddelton,
Jean Ingelow,	Wm. Gilbert,
Sarah Tytler,	M. B. Smedley,
Matthew Browne,	Isabella Fyvie,

The author of "John Halifax, Gentleman;" and upwards of 40 illustrations.

GEORGE ROUTLEDGE & SONS,

PUBLISHERS,

416 Broome Street, New York.

The Christian, 60 Cents!

A large, live, eight-page monthly religious and family paper, containing facts, incidents, tales, sketches, music, poetry, true stories, pictures, reading for young, old, saints, sinners, one and all. No sectarianism, controversy, politics, puffs, pills, or patent medicines. 60 cents a year; 10 copies $5. For Sunday-schools, 10 copies, $4. Send 10 cents for three specimen copies before you forget it. Vol. III. begins January, 1868. 1,000 pages new, live tracts for $1. Address H. L. HASTINGS, Tract Repository, 19 Lindall Street, Boston, Mass.

THE WIDOW BEDOTT PAPERS.

BY FRANCES M. WHITCHER.

WITH AN INTRODUCTION BY ALICE B. NEAL.

A NEW EDITION.

With Eight spirited Illustrations.

1 vol. 12mo, 403 pages, price $1 75.

Sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of price.

OAKLEY & MASON, Publishers,

21 Murray Street.

NEW PUBLICATIONS NOW READY.

D. Appleton & Company,

443 AND 445 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,

Publish This Day:

I.

OLD FRITZ AND THE NEW ERA.

An Historical Novel.

By LOUISA MUHLBACH; illustrated by GASTON FAY.

1 vol. 8vo, paper covers, $1 50; cloth, $2.

This volume commences a series of four works recently written by Clara Mundt (Louisa Mühlbach), under the general title of "Germany in Storm and Stress." The first, "Old Fritz," gives us an interesting account of the last years of Frederick the Great's life. The next volume of the series will be entitled "Goethe and Schiller." The series now commenced is really the only contribution to literature which the distinguished authoress has made during the past year; the volumes already published in this country, and which have become popular, are the result of literary labor dating back 15 years, and which were demanded by the public through the extraordinary popularity of "Joseph the Second" and "Frederick the Great and his Court."

II.

GLOBE EDITION OF DANTE.

THE VISION OF HELL, PURGATORY, AND PARADISE,

OF DANTE ALIGHIERI.

Translated by the Rev. HENRY FRANCIS CARY, A.M. With the Life of Dante, Chronological View of his Age, Additional Notes, and Index.

Illustrated with Twelve Engravings, from designs by JOHN FLAXMAN, R.A.

One volume, printed on tinted paper, price $1 50.

TO BE FOLLOWED BY "GLOBE EDITIONS" OF

Tasso, Scott, Burns, Milton, Hudibras, Cowper, Campbell, and Pope.

Uniform in style and price.

III.

The Ninth Volume of Appleton's Popular Edition of CHARLES DICKENS'S Works, entitled

BARNABY RUDGE.

Price 30 cents.

To be completed in 17 volumes.

The following volumes now ready:

OLIVER TWIST	172	pages	25 cts.
AMERICAN NOTES	104	"	15 "
DOMBEY AND SON	348	"	35 "
MARTIN CHUZZLEWIT	380	"	35 "
CHRISTMAS STORIES	160	"	25 "
NICHOLAS NICKLEBY	340	"	35 "
PICKWICK PAPERS	326	"	35 "
BARNABY RUDGE	257	"	30 "
GREAT EXPECTATIONS	184	"	25 "

On receipt of $4 50 we will mail to any address, as published, post-paid, the entire works of Charles Dickens, and also a suitable for framing. The Portrait will be mailed at once.

STEEL-PLATE PORTRAIT OF DICKENS,

Either of the above sent free by mail on receipt of the price.

Appleton's Edition of the Waverley Novels,

Now publishing, from new stereotype plates, uniform with the new edition of DICKENS, containing all the Notes of the Author, and printed from the latest edition of the Authorized Text.

To be completed in twenty-five volumes. Price twenty-five cents each.

Printed on fine white paper, clear type, and convenient in size.

Pronounced "A MIRACLE OF CHEAPNESS."

WAVERLEY.

The first volume of the Series will be ready Wednesday, the 19th.

ORDER OF ISSUE:

1. Waverley.	14. Fortunes of Nigel.
2. Ivanhoe.	15. Peveril of the Peak.
3. Kenilworth.	16. Quentin Durward.
4. Guy Mannering.	17. St. Ronan's Well.
5. Antiquary.	18. Redgauntlet.
6. Rob Roy.	19. The Betrothed and Highland Widow.
7. Old Mortality.	20. The Talisman.
8. The Black Dwarf, and A Legend of Montrose.	21. Woodstock.
9. Bride of Lammermoor.	22. Fair Maid of Perth.
10. Heart of Midlothian.	23. Anne of Geierstein.
11. The Monastery.	24. Count Robert of Paris.
12. The Abbot.	25. The Surgeon's Daughter.
13. The Pirate.

On receipt of SIX DOLLARS we will send the entire set of Waverley Novels, as published, post-paid, to any part of the United States.

Either of the above sent to any address on receipt of the price, 25 cents per volume.

On receipt of $10 a complete set of Dickens, in uniform style, 17 volumes, and Waverley, 25 volumes, will be sent post-paid. The cheapest $10 worth to be found in the whole range of literature. Forty-two volumes for $10.

The Nation.

VOL. VI.—NO. 139. THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 27, 1868. { FIVE DOLLARS PER ANNUM. TWELVE CENTS PER COPY.

CONTENTS.

THE WEEK..... 161

EDITORIAL ARTICLES:

The Crisis at Washington..... 164
The American Diplomatic Service.. 165
Literature of the Sanctum..... 166
Public Instruction in Italy..... 167

CORRESPONDENCE:

Copyright and Patent Right..... 168

NOTES:

Literary..... 169
Motley's Netherlands..... 170
The Dervishes..... 172
The Magazines for March..... 173
Light and Health..... 174
Recent Republications.—The American Beaver and his Works.—A Manual of Inorganic Chemistry.....175, 176

Five Dollars per annum, in advance; Six months, Three Dollars; Forty Dollars to Clubs of Ten; Clergymen, Four Dollars.

THE NATION is sent till positively ordered discontinued, and all arrears have been paid. Subscribers are particularly requested to note the expiration of their subscriptions, and to forward what is due for the ensuing year, with or without further reminder from this office.

GEORGE STREET, 30 CORNHILL, LONDON, E. C., AGENT FOR THE RECEIPT OF SUBSCRIPTIONS AND ADVERTISEMENTS.

E. L. GODKIN & CO., PUBLISHERS, Box 6732, NEW YORK CITY.

The Week.

THE most exciting week that Congress has seen since the beginning of the late rebellion opened quietly enough. On Wednesday, the 19th, Mr. Wilson, in the Senate, introduced a bill admitting Alabama, despite the defeated constitution, whenever the Legislature shall ratify the pending constitutional amendment. The House, on the same day, requested the President to send in his correspondence with Sherman relative to the brevet generalship and the new Department of the Atlantic. Correspondents declare that Mr. Johnson tells them that Sherman was some time since in the secret of the new arrangement, and that he, like Grant, has played fast and loose with the President. Mr. Thomas, by a vote of 28 to 21, was refused a seat as Senator from Maryland. On Thursday, Mr. Trumbull, in the Senate, defended the Senate, and particularly himself, against a newspaper charge of being responsible for that provision of the Reconstruction bill which demanded more than a majority of votes for the ratification of the constitution. On Friday the excitement commenced which is not yet allayed. An international copyright bill, prepared by Mr. Baldwin, was offered in the House, a letter was read from Postmaster Randall, who desires an investigation of his official conduct, and denies charges of fraud that have been more or less vaguely brought against him, and then the Speaker presented a communication from the Secretary of War enclosing the President's order of removal. Mr. Covode at once offered a resolution impeaching the President, which was referred to the Committee on Reconstruction. The Senate behaved very quietly, as if senators expected soon to sit as judges. On Saturday the House received and debated the Reconstruction Committee's report that the President should be impeached. The debate was in no respect strong; on Monday, however, it was better, the real point being then touched by several speakers. The vote on presenting articles of impeachment was a party one—the Republicans, except two, voting aye—and stood 126 to 42. Mr. Stevens and Mr. Bingham were made messengers to the Senate, and Mr. Boutwell was put at the head of the committee to prepare the charges. On Tuesday the Senate was duly notified.

The effect of the impeachment on business appears on the whole likely to be slight. The small amount of support Mr. Johnson seems to receive from any quarter, and the plainness of the case against him, deprive the situation of most of its financial horrors, although the sensationists are doing their best to increase the excitement by strong writing and the free use of epithets, and by examining Mr. Johnson's case politically, morally, physically, and psychologically. He has been, on the whole, perhaps the weakest man who ever attempted to resist a legislature; but, according to the newspapers, one must search the records of Asiatic tyranny and treachery to find a match for him. He has outdone all the despots and traitors of the Western world. His resemblance to Philip II. and the Duke of Alva we have not seen discussed, but it certainly opens up an interesting field of enquiry.

Mr. Johnson has sent in a message to the Senate defending himself against the charge of illegal conduct in appointing General Thomas to the Secretaryship of War. He shows in it a good deal of nervousness and anxiety—pleads that his only object in all he had done was to bring the question of the constitutionality of the law before the courts—and defends his removal of Mr. Stanton on grounds which, if not new, are, we think, at least new to the public. He says that the obvious meaning of the act is, that he may not without the advice and consent of the Senate remove any officer appointed by himself. Mr. Stanton, however, was not appointed by himself, therefore his removal of Mr. Stanton was not a breach of the law. This, perhaps, foreshadows his line of defence before the Senate.

The Washington Correspondent may safely be said to have just passed through the happiest week of his life. In the early part of the war, and, in fact, all through the war, his mind was distracted and his usefulness impaired by the fact that he had to collect rumors from all parts of the country. On the present occasion, all the interest and excitement and incidents are concentrated in Washington itself, and what all the world wants to hear about is passing in his immediate view and presence. Accordingly, he has outdone himself. Nothing in the whole field of newspaper literature can equal for minuteness, magniloquence, and acuteness his despatches about the impeachment proceeding and the attempt to oust Mr. Stanton. He has kept his eye on every man of note in the capital, and has recorded his doings, during the whole twenty-four hours—what corners he turned, with whom he turned them, where and how he passed the night, what he said, and what was said to him, on what occasions he smiled, and why. Such incidents as the bringing in of Mr. Stanton's breakfast to the War Office, and the feebly jocose remark of the deferential bystander, whom we think we see, "that this was an odd place to breakfast in," and Mr. Sumner's note to the Secretary requesting that gentleman "to stick," are all set down with a just appreciation of their historic importance. The debate on Saturday was somewhat declamatory and abusive, the impeachers apparently not being as yet aware of their strength. On Monday the truth had dawned upon them and somewhat sobered them, and on that day the speaking was, on the whole, strong and moderate. General Butler ran amuck like a Malay, and in a wild speech he placed Johnson far higher in the rank of tyrants and usurpers than George III. or James II. or Charles I. Mr. Boutwell and Mr. Stevens were the principal speakers, but Mr. Boutwell declaimed on the general subject of Mr. Johnson's iniquities, while Mr. Stevens—whose speech, we are sorry to see, had to be read by the clerk—addressed himself to the exact point on which the impeachment is to be based.

The Tribune's Washington correspondent is the only one who has risen to the full height of the occasion, and he is clearly too eloquent and allusive for any merely human periodical. According to him, in the debate on Monday, "Copperhead Phelps of Maryland" was so exceedingly absurd as "to fling himself into the impeachment torrent with a speech which hinged on a rotten sophism." How he got on in the torrent with this article on his shoulder the correspondent does not say, but we presume badly. "Kelley, the orator of patriotism and humanity," arraigned "Andrew Johnson with power and beauty"—which was also a novel feat; but it was outdone by the same orator, "running a historical parallel, with thrilling effect," between Louis Napoleon's coup d'état and Johnson's attempt to overthrow our Government, and between "the murderous energy of Marshal St. Armand" and the "pliancy and sympathy of Lorenzo Thomas." The attempt of Mr. Holman of Indiana to have Washington's Farewell Address read was "a pig-headed scuffle." On Sunday, in Washington, "a current of religious life ran mechanically under superior passions and engrossing interests," and the Copperheads "stayed in their holes," "bit, hissed, and writhed," and "inflamed each other with each other's venom." The Republicans, on the contrary, went to bed with their heads cleared about impeachment, and if they woke up in the night "thanked God for His abounding goodness in giving the Republic even one year of administration by Old Ben." "Ben. Butler," who spoke on Monday, is, it appears, "the Apostle John of the salvation by impeachment." If the Tribune allows this gentleman to describe the impeachment trial itself, we fear his eloquence will consume it off the face of the earth. Would it not pay for such a journal to send some one to do the work who knows how to write the English of ordinary life, and how to describe the events of this sublunary sphere in terms adapted to the feeble understanding of mortal men?

In the matter of the Alabama election the path of wisdom does not seem to become a whit clearer to anybody than it was before. The advice given Congress in certain quarters to seize this opportunity of backing out of its reconstruction policy altogether, and trying something totally new which it ought to have tried two years ago, is valuable for its simplicity, but for nothing else. Congress cannot go back. Parties can never retrace their steps without totally losing public confidence. They can no more afford to be modest or contrite than newspapers can, for the public will forgive them for anything sooner than for doubting their own infallibility. The probabilities are, we fear, that Alabama will be admitted just as she stands, without regard to the result of the election. We say "we fear," because this, if done, will certainly make the elections in the other States a mere farce. "Tails I win, heads you lose" is not an interesting or exciting game, and if Alabama is admitted in disregard of the law under which the election was held, of course the voters in other States will not feel that the result depends on them, even if the supplemental bill making a majority of votes cast, and not a majority of votes registered, sufficient to secure the adoption of the constitution is enacted. To be sure, the States would be brought back into the Union in this way; but then we fear the constitutions under which they would come back would not command the respect or confidence of the body of the people, and could not be said to emanate from them, and would probably be upset at the first convenient opportunity. We still cannot help thinking that the safest course will be to order a fresh vote in Alabama under the new bill, requiring simply a majority of the votes cast to secure the adoption of the constitution. It may be defeated under this rule, and if it is, the remedy is to wait till the majority are clothed in their right mind, which will be, we suspect, very soon after the November election.

Mr. Thomas's case was disposed of last week by his being denied admission to the Senate, the vote being a mixed one, Messrs. Trumbull and Fessenden and some other Republicans voting in his favor. It did not appear by the evidence that Mr. Thomas had ever expressed even sympathy with the rebellion; the worst thing brought out against him on this point was, that he had kept up amicable relations with old friends who turned out secessionists, and that he had given $100 to a son who persisted in going off to join the rebel army. In fact, this last act seemed to be the main charge against him. We believe, however, that for just the same reasons that we did not during the war hang all rebels taken in arms, we must now, if there is ever to be an end to the quarrel between North and South, overlook the political weaknesses of a great many men from the border States. Something must be forgiven even to Marylanders and Kentuckians, on the simple ground that they are men. We confess, too, that we do not consider the case of Aulus Fulvius, the Roman senator, who killed his son for joining Catiline, cited from Sallust by Mr. Sumner, to be at all conclusive either as to what Mr. Thomas ought to have done to his son or the Senate ought to do to Mr. Thomas. We say this without meaning the slightest disrespect either to Aulus Fulvius or Mr. Sumner.

We have nowhere seen a better argument against inflation, and that form of repudiation known as payment of the five-twenty bonds in greenbacks, than is to be found in the majority report of the Committee of Finance of the Chicago Common Council, presented to that body last week. The report was called forth by a resolution of Alderman Wicker in favor of inflation and repudiation, and he himself presented a minority report in which he laid it down that money was scarce, and the amount in circulation "inadequate to the wants of the nation;" that greenbacks having been declared by Congress to be "money," it was perfectly proper and just to pay off the public debt in them, and that the omission of the word "coin" in an act was a perfect answer to the claims of anybody who lent money under it, and who was deluded by the speeches and letters of Government officers into the belief that the omission was of no consequence. The majority report took substantially the same ground that we took two weeks ago with regard to the scarcity of money, that it was absurd to talk of its being scarce when it has for the last year been a drug in the market—nobody wanting it, or being able to use it, at any but the lowest rates of interest. The report pointed out, moreover, that every legal tender issued is pro tanto a forced loan—a measure which no nation should resort to except in the last extremity; that the arguments against payment of the bonds in coin are "miserable technicalities," and are an attempt to repudiate the "mutual understanding" on which, no matter what the act may say, the loan was raised, and on which the lenders gave not what the Government was screwed down into taking by a hard bargain, but all that the Government asked. It quotes as bearing on this point a passage from the speech of "a former chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means," "spoken publicly on the floor of the House at the time of contracting the debt." The orator is now in favor of payment in greenbacks. The report does not name him, and neither shall we, as both we and our readers have some shame left:

"A dollar in a miser's safe, unproductive, is a sore disturbance. Where could they invest it? In United States loans at six per cent., redeemable in gold in twenty years—the best and most valuable permanent investment that could be desired." "But widows and orphans are interested, and in tears lest their estates should be badly invested. I pity no one who has money invested in United States bonds, payable in gold in twenty years, with interest semi-annually."

We were all the better pleased to read the Chicago report because, besides being sensible and sound and high-minded, it may prove a valuable corrective of the folly of the Republican State Convention of Indiana, which seems to have committed the drawing up of its platform to a wag, and a very mischievous one. The following plank, if it were not likely to prove mischievous, would be very amusing. The italics are ours:

"Fourth—The public debt, made necessary by the rebellion, should be honestly paid, and all bonds issued therefor should be paid in legal tenders, commonly called greenbacks, except where by their express terms they provide otherwise, and paid in such quantities as will make the circulation commensurate with the commercial wants of the country, and so as to avoid too great an inflation of the currency, and an increase in the price of gold."

He seems to have been encouraged by the success of this joke to perpetrate another, and, on the whole, better—in which he condemns the late contraction of the currency on the ground, amongst others, that it had "the sanction of the Democratic party in both Houses of Congress." This reminds us of the reproach addressed by the drunken pugilist to his delicate wife, after he had smashed all their furniture—"Why did you let me do it, hang you?" There can be no question, and there is no question, that any party which advocates any policy which is likely to impair or destroy the borrowing power of the Government, is as distinctly disunionist as if it passed an "ordinance of secession," and anybody who votes for any candidate who supports such a policy, no matter how much he may try to deceive himself by maunderings about "the burden of taxation" and "the people's will," paves the way for a fresh rebellion. This is the fact of the matter, and there is no use any longer in mincing one's words about it.

The Sun last week called attention, in much milder terms than the occasion merited, to the fact that, while the New York Constitutional Convention is giving the finishing touches to the constitution which it has drafted, Mr. Horace Greeley, one of the delegates at large, and a very prominent and a very useful member of the body, is delighting large audiences in the West with lectures on divers subjects. What makes the matter worthy of remark is, that Mr. Greeley acquired honorable distinction, during the first six months, by his denunciations in the Tribune of his brother members for their lax attendance, and thereby did much to bring the body into contempt and endanger the adoption of the constitution.

A striking illustration of the extent to which pure, unadulterated good nature "rules the court, the camp, the grove" amongst us has just been afforded in California. Congress conveyed the Yo Semite Valley—a piece of land fifteen miles long, half a mile wide, lying between the most tremendous precipices in the world, and presenting a series of views of unrivalled grandeur, beauty, and singularity—to the State, on the sole condition that it should be reserved for a public pleasure-ground. The gift was a splendid one, the object noble, and a proper appreciation of it on the part of the Californians, and a very small outlay of money, would have converted the valley into such a public park as no community ever possessed, and such as Frenchmen, Swiss, or Germans would be almost willing to encounter a bloody war for. But there were two squatters in it, with a tavern each, and a piece of ground in possession, but without a shadow of right. They ought to have been bought out and sent elsewhere, but they petitioned the State legislature for three hundred acres of the valley, and the legislature, thinking of their bygone bears and cold nights and long journeys, have given them twice as much land as they asked for, and done nothing about the park. If Congress should sanction the grant, the valley will be spoiled. It will be gradually cut up amongst tavern-keepers, and be devoted to "mixed drinks," billiards, nine-pins, and other modern improvements. There must surely be enough taste and enough regard for posterity in California to prevent this desecration.

The Irish question continues to be vigorously agitated in England, and the tide of opinion continues to set against the Irish Church more strongly than ever. Nearly all the more influential portion of the English press, daily, weekly, and monthly, has gone over to the enemy, and the Church party in Ireland seem to be at last seriously alarmed and have begun to hold meetings and issue "pastorals." A great Protestant gathering has been held in Dublin, in which the old doctrines of "Protestant ascendancy" were asserted in a tolerably rank form, and the revenues of the Church defended on the antiquated ground that they were "property." One of the Irish bishops defends the Establishment on the ground that it is the Church first established by the apostles in Ireland, and that the Catholics are interlopers and are entitled to nothing more than toleration. The Catholic clergy, on the other hand, are not idle, and call for a repeal of the union, or, if they cannot have that, at least a separate educational endowment. Between the two, the few Irish reformers who are worth listening to have not much chance for a hearing. Lord Oranmore, at the Protestant meeting, pointed out very sensibly that the Catholic clergy claimed in Ireland more than any Catholic government at the present moment accords them anywhere, and other defenders of the landlord class argue, with much plausibility, that if the landed aristocracy and the Protestant Church were got out of the way, the result would be that politics would pass entirely into the hands of the priests. The fear, however, judging from what we see of Fenianism, would seem to be groundless. The great difficulty in the way of Irish reform really appears to be now that Irishmen themselves are not agreed upon anything in sufficient force to make a respectable impression on English opinion. Mr. Bright has been renewing with amplification and emendation his proposal to have the Government buy up the estates of the absentee landlords and sell them at a fair valuation to the tenants, the price to be paid in instalments. The idea seems to gain ground.

All England is occupied with the question of education, or at least is giving it all the attention it can spare from Fenianism. One most interesting fact has come to light with regard to the results of the efforts which have been made to promote the higher education of women, by the establishment at Cambridge University of examinations for girls, certificates being awarded to all who pass satisfactorily. The plan has now been long enough in operation to furnish some aid in estimating the ability of women to master the studies hitherto usually reserved to boys. The examinations are conducted in London by married fellows of the University; and besides furnishing girls with an excellent means of testing their own capacity, they are gradually creating a standard to which women seeking employment as governesses or teachers will have to come up, as the candidates furnished with certificates naturally secure a preference. But now for the fact which gives the movement its strongest claim to attention. The examiners report that they discover little difference in capacity between sisters and brothers examined on the same papers—the advantage, if any, being on the side of the sisters. Moreover—and the effect of this is really stunning—the girls decidedly beat the boys in mathematics, seldom making blunders "in the essentials of a demonstration," while the boys make them in all parts of the process with equal facility. A more portentous fact than this for the noble army of male blockheads has never, we venture to say, been brought to light.

It will gratify all friends of national progress to know that the experiment commenced in England three years ago by the Messrs. Briggs, the owners of one of the largest collieries, of converting their concern into a joint-stock establishment, giving shares to the workmen, and dividing amongst them all profits over ten per cent., has proved a splendid success, the aggregate profits last year having been 12 per cent., and that order, industry, and content have succeeded strikes, bitterness, and contention. A similar result has attended a similar experiment made by the Messrs. Crossley in a large woollen manufactory, beginning about the same time as the Briggs colliery, and now paying dividends of 20 per cent. Such facts as these are very awkward for those political economists who insist upon it that the plan of paying for labor in fixed weekly wages is part of the order of the universe.

The new French press bill, which releases journalists from arbitrary punishment at the hands of the minister, and from the necessity of procuring permission to establish papers, but subjects them for all violations of the law to the jurisdiction of the "correctional police"—that is, of the lowest and least respectable branches of the French judiciary—without the intervention of a jury, is a great advance on the old régime, and is the fulfilment of the promise so unexpectedly made by the Emperor a year ago. It meets, however, with violent opposition from the inner circle of his following, the original Imperialist adventurers, to whom change and progress are for obvious reasons terrible, and there are rumors in Paris of agitating "scenes" at the Tuileries, in which these gentlemen tried to save their master from himself and were generally more devoted than was agreeable. Foremost among the opponents of the bill is Granier de Cassagnac—the editor of the Pays—who, by dint of sticking at nothing, and using his journal as a soldier of fortune uses his sword, has got into the Senate and is a great man.

In spite of the extreme depression of Russia on the subject of the condition of the Turkish Christians, and the mysterious running to and fro of General Ignatieff, the Russian ambassador at Constantinople, and the preparation of breech-loaders for the army, all fear as well as all danger of war in the East seems to be passing away. The fact is, that Russia is suffering from serious financial embarrassment and cannot conceal it. She has been working hard amongst the Austrian and Turkish Slaves, and with considerable success, but seems unable to follow it up. The expenses of the Crimean war still hang about her in the shape of an ugly floating debt, and her paper goes on depreciating every day.

Articles on any of the subjects usually discussed in this journal will be received from any quarter. If used, they will be liberally paid for; if rejected, they will be returned to the writers on the receipt of the requisite amount of postage stamps.

All Communications which pertain to the literary management of THE NATION should be addressed to the Editor.

THE CRISIS AT WASHINGTON.

MR. JOHNSON, after a series of blunders, to use a very mild word, such as few if any statesmen have had to show, has at last committed the crowning one. After having promised and failed to play the part of Moses for the colored people, he has played it for the impeachers. They have been trying for more than a year to get up a case against him, and, partly through their own natural deficiencies, partly through the oddity of his conduct, which made it almost impossible to patch up his follies into a decent resemblance to a "high crime or misdemeanor," but most of all owing to the popular unwillingness to have the country disturbed and the public attention diverted from reconstruction and the finances, they were never able to accomplish anything. Mr. Johnson, however, seems to have determined that they should not be foiled, and has at last, with truly wonderful fatuity, furnished them with a good case against him, and a case which can probably be tried in a few days. He has the satisfaction of knowing that he has now nobody to say a word for him, and that there is not a man left in the country who does not think him either a fool or a knave. Those who have never admitted his wickedness are at present willing to have him impeached and deposed as an incorrigible dunce. The scene that one witnesses at Washington would be wholly tragic if it were not for his appearance in it, but the satisfaction with which he looks on his work takes a great deal of the seriousness out of it. So, also, does the exceeding solemnity of the language in which some of the more uproarious of his enemies are denouncing him. When one sees "the usurper in the White House" revealing his mighty plans and expectations, his deep-laid schemes and hellish plots, to the correspondent of the New York Herald with all the artless candor of a Kentucky belle, one cannot help feeling that the task of "hurling him from the chair he has disgraced" is not such awful work after all.

The precise reason for now bringing the "tyrant" to justice is, that he has for the first time committed a distinct and palpable breach of the law, though we confess we do not think his last offence by any means the worst in a moral point of view. It has, however, the great legal beauty of being capable of proof in five minutes, and of needing no "construction" or piecework. It is full and complete and simple. The question of the constitutionality or expediency of the Tenure-of-office Act need not come up in the trial of it at all. Many good Republicans deny both one and the other; but Mr. Johnson has so managed matters that no differences of opinion on these points in the ranks of the party will be of any use to him. Whether the law be constitutional or not, or wise or not, there is a legal presumption of which every man is bound to take notice, that it is constitutional till the courts have decided otherwise. The necessity and value of this presumption were fully discussed and affirmed by the Court of Appeals in this State in the police cases in 1857. Without it a written constitution would breed anarchy, because if everybody—and, above all, every officer of the Government—could take upon himself to decide, as soon as a law was passed, whether it accorded with the Constitution or not, no law would ever be executed for months or years after its passage. If he resists it, he must do so at his peril; and the doctrine which the New York Times seems to hold, that its being afterwards declared unconstitutional may have the effect of retroactive justification, has no foundation either in precedent or reason. If every court in the country next month pronounced the Tenure-of-office Act unconstitutional, it would not in the least improve Mr. Johnson's position. What he is about to be tried for is not only his disobedience to the law, for of this a decision that the law was unconstitutional—that is, null and void—might absolve him, but his taking upon himself the functions of the judiciary, and deciding for himself that it was unconstitutional, and acting in his official capacity under his own ruling. If he may do this, all the other officials, civil and military, may do it, and the legislature might as well be dissolved, for its acts would be all nullities. Nobody would ever obey one which he had the least motive for disobeying; in other words, all that portion of the community which an act of Congress was intended to direct or restrain would be exempted from its operation for an indefinite period after its passage. If this were the effect of a written constitution, no nation would live under one for six months; and, to provide against this, the presumption has been firmly established as binding on everybody, that all acts are constitutional till a court of competent jurisdiction has, in a bonâ fide case, pronounced them otherwise. It may be said that this presumption bears hard on officers, because the Constitution furnishes them with no protection against the legal consequences of the execution of an unconstitutional act. This is no doubt true. The Constitution ought to provide that those who act on the presumption shall be held harmless. But officers, even as matters stand, have their remedy. The risk they run is a well-known risk of their position; if they do not like it, they can resign.

It would have been a stupid thing for Mr. Johnson to have disobeyed the law when he suspended Mr. Stanton. But to have done so then would not, it seems, have been stupid enough for his taste, for he obeyed it by suspending him and giving his reasons for suspending him to the Senate—thus logically, though perhaps not legally, estopping himself from afterwards denying its constitutionality. This performance seems only to have been the ground-work of absurdity, which he lays broad and deep, for so many of his official acts. Finding that his acknowledgment of the validity of the law does not help him, he sets about having it tested by the courts, and does this by flatly disobeying it—by doing the very thing which the act forbade him to do, under heavy penalties. We hear in various quarters the question asked, In what other way could he bring it before the courts? He himself evidently looks on the despatch of General Thomas to the War Office and that discreet officer's arrest as a most ingenious device, which nobody who had not "filled every office in the gift of the people" would have thought of, for bringing the dispute between him and Congress to the test of a legal decision.

There is, and has been time out of memory, a very simple process for trying titles to offices. It has been a process of the common law from the earliest ages; it is in use every year in every State in the Union, and is as familiar to all lawyers as their alphabet; and is, in fact, the only direct mode of testing the validity of any official's claim to his place. We mean, of course, the writ of quo warranto. The proper person to sue it out is the Attorney-General; and had Mr. Stanbery obtained it from a United States court under Mr. Johnson's direction it would have brought Mr. Stanton into court to show by what authority he held his place, and this would, of course, have at once raised the question of the constitutionality of the Tenure-of-office Act, and have secured a judicial decision upon it. It could not have been pleaded that this was a political question, on which the courts were not competent to pass, or, at all events, could not have been pleaded without an absurdity which neither Mr. Stanton nor the majority in Congress would have ventured to face. Had the court decided against him, he would have gained rather than lost in public estimation by his appeal to them. Had they decided in his favor, he would have had some solid support in his subsequent resistance to Congress, if he determined to resist.

It must be admitted, however, that the terms of the law are such that the unfortunate man was unable to test its constitutionality before the courts without exposing himself to impeachment. He could not get a quo warranto without removing Mr. Stanton, and he could not remove Mr. Stanton even formally without being impeached, so that, practically, he was deprived of the power of testing its constitutionality at all except before the very body which passed it, and with the penalty of political ruin hanging over him in case of failure. This would certainly be a very embarrassing position for a moderate and conscientious man. But then, if Mr. Johnson had been moderate, and there was any general belief that he was honest, he would not be in this position. If he were anybody else, we have very little doubt he might have removed Stanton, and then, on the Senate's restoring him, have tried the title to the office on a quo warranto, without exposing himself to impeachment. The consequence—and it seems to us the just consequence —of the bad reputation he has acquired for himself is, that he will not be allowed to test the validity of any law which imposes a duty on him. He has by his course forfeited all claim to Congressional indulgence, and he has no popular support to take its place. What Congress says to him is, in effect, that his character is so bad that they will not allow him to question their acts even by legal process, and if his case be a hard one, we do not see that he has anybody but himself to blame.

His disappearance from the scene now will be a heartfelt relief to nearly everybody. He has been a sore trial to the nation for the last three years, and in nothing more than in creating a constant danger that the wilder members of the House would be tempted into creating a most dangerous precedent by prosecuting him for being foolish and foul-mouthed. Had he been impeached on the strength of the testimony collected by the committee last summer, it would have proved a most perilous precedent; his impeachment for flat disobedience to an act of Congress cannot but prove a useful one. It will delight the "sons of thunder" who for so long have been clamoring for his overthrow; but, as we have never taken any pleasure in these gentlemen's misery, and have all along, in opposing them, desired simply that they should have good and not bad reasons for being happy, this will not, as far as we are concerned, in any way mar the occasion.

One thing, however, we cannot help saying before we close. It is a delicate thing to say, but, if said at all, it must be said now. Mr. Johnson's troubles to himself and the nation have resulted mainly from the fact that he has owed all his political successes to his zeal and courage. In everything else he has been wanting. He is ignorant, hot-headed, impetuous, indiscreet, loose-tongued. He has no tact, no perception, is no judge of character. Had he been the reverse of all this, his differences with Congress on the matter of reconstruction would not have brought him to his present position. He might have secured a large amount of popular support, and certainly would have retained the popular respect, and would have quitted the office at the end of his term without the reputation of having degraded it. If the Senate now gives judgment against him, and deposes him, he will be succeeded by a gentleman who is, we admit, a better man in all sorts of ways, but whose mental constitution and political and social training are very like Mr. Johnson's, and who has been selected for the office mainly because he is plucky and impetuous. We confess the prospect does not fill us with enthusiasm. When we consider the delicacy of the duties which will devolve on the President during the coming year, how much there is before us for a rough and untaught hand to mar, and remember the enthusiasm with which four years ago the very men who are now looking forward with most delight to "glorious Ben Wade's" accession to the Presidency talked and wrote of "Andy Johnson, of Tennessee"—then,also, the man of the people, the foe of the slaveholding aristocrats, the friend of the Union—it is impossible to avoid expressing the hope that Mr. Wade will exhibit in his new office other qualities than those which, valuable though they may be, have thus far made his reputation.

THE AMERICAN DIPLOMATIC SERVICE.

The proposed substitution of General McClellan for Mr. Adams in the American embassy in London is another striking illustration of the necessity for such a reform in the civil service as will make training, experience, and ability of some value in it. We do not, of course, expect that it will strike Congress in this light, or that the Senate, if it rejects General McClellan, will reject him altogether on the ground of unfitness for this particular duty. The proximate cause of his rejection will be, and rightly enough, his political antecedents. As far as character goes, we think he is as unobjectionable a man, to say the least, as Mr. Johnson is at all likely to nominate for the place; but as regards experience and training he is singularly, in fact, fatally, unfit for it, considering the delicacy of the relations of this country with England, and the number and variety of the fresh complications which may any day arise. General McClellan, during his short public career, gave evidence of a great many good qualities, but judgment and acumen and tact and clear-headedness and a proper sense of the limits of his own powers were not amongst the number. The political opinions which he produced during his commandership-in-chief were unquestionably not of his own manufacture. Whether good or bad, they were probably supplied by the "Society for the Diffusion of Political Information," or rather by the gentlemen who afterwards organized that illustrious body, and it would probably be difficult to find in any public man's history a more striking proof of incapacity for diplomatic functions than the Harrison's Landing letter. Whatever may be thought of the political doctrines propounded in that letter, few will deny that the writing of it by a general, on the morrow of a bloody repulse, to the political chief of the government he served, proved a degree of obtuseness on the part of the author for which there are few if any parallels to be found in military history. The real value of the performance as an indication of character was concealed from the public by the excitement of the time, and by the noisy efforts which the Democrats were then making to use the general against the Government. But if we imagine Sir John Moore to have survived Corunna, and passed the evening of the battle while his troops were stealing on board ship in writing a long letter to the Prince Regent, giving him advice on the Catholic question and parliamentary reform, we shall have a clearer notion of the bearing which the letter has on General McClellan's claims to be entrusted with high diplomatic functions.

We know very well that there is a popular notion that the real use of an ambassador, and especially of an American ambassador, is to transmit messages from his own Government to that to which he is accredited; these messages containing not the secretly formed opinions of a man or a clique, but the expression of the national will formed by the press and the platform, and carrying its motives on its face, and needing nothing in the transmission but clear statement and prompt delivery. In this theory of ambassadorial functions character and mind of course count for very little, and the part played by the minister in society is treated as purely ornamental—of no service to anybody but rich people who want to see the best foreign circles, but who would be much better at home keeping a store or raising cranberries. This view has been long held by what we may call the "Old War-Horse" school of politicians, and it is a view which naturally recommends itself strongly to the popular mind, particularly in the West, where social life and social influences play a comparatively small part in the shaping of men's opinions or the regulation of their conduct. It is not surprising, therefore, that this school should be opposed to our having any diplomatic service at all, believing the post-office and the telegraph to furnish all the needful facilities for such communications as we need to make to the governments of foreign nations, or, if we must have one, should consider the various posts in it as simply a useful means of rewarding party services at home, to be bestowed without the least reference to the special fitness of the appointee for the place he was to fill. Of course, from this point of view McCracken would fill the Viennese mission as well as if not better than Motley, as he would have nothing to do but watch the machinations of the Austrian aristocracy against American liberty and carry Mr. Seward's despatches round to the Austrian foreign office. If you talk to an Old War-Horse of the personal influence of an ambassador, of what he may do by his personal demeanor, by his character, his culture, and his private conversation to make his country respected and to carry out the foreign policy of his Government, he thinks either that you are a fool or that you take him for one. The only means of exerting influence that he knows of are the "editorial" and the speech or lyceum lecture. And when you tell him that in Europe great wars are often avoided and great alliances cemented, and the sum of human happiness increased, by mere talking over a dinner or tea-table, by an ambassador's merely inspiring those with whom he comes in contact with confidence in his sincerity, his integrity, his learning, in his broad-mindedness and acuteness, he thinks you are a besotted votary of "fashion."

We have had, however, during the past few years, at least two signal illustrations of the erroneousness of the War-Horse view of diplomacy. The tremendous strain to which the Government was subjected at the outbreak of the war, and the pressing necessity which everybody saw for conciliating European powers, caused a better batch of diplomatists to be sent out than perhaps any administration had sent out since the arly days of the Republic. There was hardly one of the ministers to the great courts who could be said to owe his appointment to his political claims. They were all, or nearly all, representatives of what is best in American society, of that element in it which gives it its strong est claim to the gratitude and respect of the civilized world. Unfortunately, there is less distinction always to be gained by prevention than by cure; and the task which was imposed on our representatives abroad during the war being that of averting trouble and maintaining American respectability, their services, to a careless observer, do not seem brilliant. But they were brilliant. We doubt if any country was ever so well served as this country was by them. No diplomatic representatives ever had such difficulties to contend with, for we believe there never has been a case in history in which a nation or its representatives had to encounter abroad the same amount of social hostility—hostility amounting in England, at least, during the years 1862–3–4, to positive execration. To face what Mr. Adams had to face during those three years; to face it as he faced it, not with pluck only but with cheerful front, with perfect temper and perfect fortitude, and to uphold the dignity of his country when every man and woman he met was disposed to deny it even the ability to die decently, was an ordeal such as no other public servant, we venture to say, has ever passed through. But he not only passed through it with credit, but he kept the peace between the two countries; and kept it not by dint of despatches, but by tact and judgment and self-restraint. Nothing is more certain than that had we been at that time dependent on War-Horse diplomacy, and had the London mission been filled by an average politician, acting either as a mechanical medium for the transmission of Mr. Seward's despatches, or as a vent for the discharge of bunkum over the heads of the British public, we should have been at war with Great Britain long before the war with the Confederacy was over.

The appointment of Mr. Burlingame as Chinese ambassador, and the remarkable state of relations between this country and that great empire which we now witness, are due also to the personal qualities of the minister—qualities, we may add, of which Mr. Burlingame's previous career gave little indication. We do not think anybody at home is to be complimented on his perspicacity with regard to the appointment; but it has turned out well, and proved that all that Mr. Burlingame needed to distinguish himself was an opportunity. He has won from the Chinese Government an amount of confidence in himself such as it has never before accorded to a foreigner—and such, in fact, as no government has ever accorded to a foreigner—and has won with it its deep and cordial respect for his own country; and he has won it without giving the slightest umbrage to the representatives of other powers, and while retaining in the highest degree their confidence in his loyalty, integrity, and judgment. No despatches, no display of military or of naval power, no array of statistics, could have accomplished such a result as this. The opening of China to the outside world after thirty centuries of seclusion is an event of which the importance, no matter from what point of view we consider it, can hardly be overrated. It is in some respects equivalent to the discovery of a new continent; and that the empire should, on its entry into the family of civilized nations, adopt the United States as its friend and protector, is perhaps as high a compliment as any country has ever received. But whatever glory we have won by it, whatever profit we may gain from it, we owe to individual character, to the moral force that lies in the walk and conversation of a single public servant. The Chinese know nothing of Banks's speeches or "reports" or bills; they have seen no American fleets or armies; our hog returns and corn returns and population returns make little or no impression on them. In the contest of magnitudes, of numbers, and of bulk, we can produce nothing with which their eyes or imagination is not familiar. We have triumphed mainly because we were represented by an able and honest man.

The lesson is a very striking one, and we trust will not be forgotten. The value—we mean the commercial value—of good public servants was never better illustrated than in the two cases we have cited. We might make both of them stronger by going into greater detail, but greater detail is not necessary. The worse things go at home, the more the Secretary of State becomes a party leader, and the more carefully his despatches are prepared for home consumption, the more necessary will it be that our representatives abroad should have within themselves whatever resources are needful to save the national dignity and clothe the expression of the national will with grace and effect. The dream of the Old War-Horses, that some day or other we shall suspend intercourse with all but the barbarous races of the world, cease to place any value on civilized communion, and, shut up within our own territory, feed our minds with the newspapers and our bodies with the fat of the land, without caring about what other people are doing or thinking, is a dream which is every day further and further from being realized. Nothing can ever now prevent us from playing a great part in the future of modern society, in influencing both its manners and ideas; and the larger the part we play, the more important will our diplomacy become.

LITERATURE OF THE SANCTUM.

ADDISON tells us he had observed that people seldom peruse a book with pleasure till they have learned certain particulars about its author, as whether he is married or a bachelor, of a fair or dark complexion, of a mild or choleric disposition, and so on. It is therefore that Mr. Spectator introduces himself to the public by giving it a brief description of his personal appearance, some account of his education and habits and social position, and an estimate of his character. Evidently he is laughing—if one can say that Addison laughs—at this weakness in the gentle reader, although it is altogether probable that Miranda and Narcissa and Lydia and the other ladies of quality were innocent of the joke. And they were somewhat excusable; they would have been even if a sense of humor were not one of the distinctions of sex. For the desire to know not merely what is taught us by our teachers, but also all about our teachers themselves, is but doubtfully a weakness, and if it be one, is one which is shared by all mankind. It was our young ladies, to be sure, who, fifteen years ago, grew fonder of "Prue and I" after Mr. Putnam had published an engraving on steel of Mr. Curtis; but then again it was not our young ladies but Mr. Carlyle who declared that this too were, in its way, a satisfactory thing, a thing not to be disregarded by the wiser Students of the Infinite—to know what manner of stockings were worn by the man Diderot, philosophe, on the legs of him; and also how the said Denis—"most cyclopædic head that ever existed"—made shift to procure, for the not uncyclopædic stomach of him, dinners. Doubtless Mr. Carlyle, as pictorial writer and student of humanity, has better reasons for his curiosity than any the young ladies can muster; still, he also and such as he are influenced to some extent by the same feeling as that which dominates the boarding-school. But few of us, it has been said, are the rational animals we all ought to be; sympathy is what most of us crave rather than wisdom or knowledge; and men in general, hearing about their instructors and prophets and heroes, are eager to hear not only their instruction and prophecy and the story of their great actions, but those things which show them to be members of the human family. So, whether or not he perceived the causes of the feeling which he gratified, Mr. Spectator was no doubt wise in telling his readers about his bashfulness, the shortness of his face, the gravity of his demeanor, and his other bodily and mental traits, and, while he laughed at it, enlisting in his favor the universal desire to know personally, if possible, those who advise and teach us.

Ever since his time his example has been closely followed; in his own country, to some extent, in ours to an extent perhaps as great. There was none of the "Guardians" and "Idlers" and "Connoisseurs" and "Ramblers" which did not take some steps in the path first marked out—first on English ground, at any rate—by Mr. Spectator and his friends Sir Roger, Sir Andrew, Will Honeycomb, and the rest of them. And a century later the example had not lost its force, for then occurred the most shining and successful instance of this imitation—Wilson invented the "Noctes Ambrosianæ," with Christopher North, at the head of the dining-table, ruling over long Mr. Tickler, O'Doherty Signifer, the semi-apocryphal Shepherd, Buller of Brazenose, the Opium Eater, and many more—a company not much surpassed, as we think, by the very best that periodical literature has created; indeed equal, rather than inferior, to Mr. Spectator's own club.

But, so far as we remember, there has been since Wilson's time almost nothing of the same sort in really respectable English periodical literature. We are never nowadays invited by English magazines of a good class to make the acquaintance of Tom So-and-so, who is a sad wag; or to chat awhile with the editor's old-time friend, the eccentric, frosty but kindly, humorist, Slowboye; or to drop in during the fortunate call of the fair correspondent—"whose name, reader, we are not going to reveal"—who is very apt to remind the editor—"beighho, we too were young"—of other blue eyes—"or were they gray? this editor, 'pon honor, could never tell"—once bright and dancing, now, alas! etc.; or, to make one at those so enchanting assemblies when all the correspondents—fair, cynical, poetical, and waggish—old Slowboye and Pennyroyal and Dreigh Saulter and Alcie Biades and the rest—meet together in the editor's apartments, while the snow falls thick without, and lounge about in every attitude of ease, lightly tossing the joke from one to another, saying the most sparkling things, and basking in the ruddy glow of that remarkable coal-fire. "Do you remember," Alcie usually says on these occasions,—"do you remember what poor John Keats says about the small quivering flames plying through the thick-laid coal? And he died so young!" Slowboye does not know Keats. "Who's Keats?" he says. "Give me a good chestnut or hickory-wood fire." Then the editor says, "Pax, old grumbler. Shall the world stand still for thee? This 'solid core of heat,'" he says, for he knows the poets,—"this 'solid core of heat,' what is it, thou materialist, but thy hickory and thy chestnut glorified? Yes, my Slowboye, thy forests are buried, and is it not as anthracite that they reappear in resurrection? But thou art dull for divine poesy." Then probably Slowboye surreptitiously wipes away a tear and silently grasps the editor's hand, for he has sentimental soft spots in his heart, but outwardly he preserves his ordinary grumness of countenance, and says, "Hang me, though, if I do n't see more of 'the divine sparks' on my own hearth." Then they all laugh, and the editor goes on: "Yes, poor John Keats," etc. At the end he does n't mind whispering "into your ear, reader," that there were "cakes and ale," and that at the close of the evening they discovered they had been for half an hour smoking their havanas in dead silence, even Pennyroyal and Slowboye having been gazing pensively into the fire.

On this side of the water we once had great quantities of this anthracite literature. Much of it was directly in imitation of the "Noctes Ambrosianæ;" much of it was directly in imitation of the great founders of the school; much of it indirectly in imitation of them, and directly copied after the very mild humor of the New York gentlemen who, when the century was young, were modelling themselves upon Addison and Steele and Goldsmith. We still have some of it left. There is no doubt that we are seeing the last of it, but it does yet linger among us. Both of the new magazines, for example, have an ominous tinge of it, and it is to be found, not so often as once, in some of the older ones. Perhaps in the first number of Putnam's, in the correspondence between Mr. Curtis and "Harry Franco," it may be seen when at its best, and in the first number of Lippincott's a little taste of it when not at its best may be got. In the Northern Monthly one is sure to find it in profusion and with all its peculiarities in a state of high development, as, for example, this specimen, no older, we regret to say, than the present month:

"The apartment in ——— street, heretofore described. At the library-table is seated the Editor, rapidly examining the loose slips of a little heap of manuscripts piled up on his left. Alcie Biades and Rhadie Manthus are each leaning, quite at their ease, against the carved black-walnut mantelpiece, the fragrant whirls of smoke, from their fresh-lighted havanas, half clouding them from view. A. L. B. (who has been pacing the floor slowly, his eyes fastened on a newly-purchased painting adorning the remoter wall), suddenly pauses at the back of the editorial easy-chair.

"A. L. B. (To the Editor.) Do you notice the sunlight on that hill? Never did a warmer sun play on the hillside of a New England landscape.

"The Editor. Exquisite! a composition?"

After much following talk, of a kind that may be imagined, the sitting is thus closed:

"The Editor. (Opening the missive.) Albie has relief at last. Here is word up that there is no room for a line more copy.

"(Immense and immediate applause, followed by excited congratulations, and a general lighting of fresh cigars. The room presently disappears in a cloud of tobacco smoke.)"

Clubs were not flourishing in New York when the anthracite school arose and waxed, and for that reason alone, even if the set of contributors who met at Ambrose's had not been at the time more in harmony with popular taste and ideas than Captain Sentry and Will Honeycomb, and the other gentlemen of Sir Roger's club, the imitators of Wilson would easily have got the better of their opponents. At any rate, they did do so, and created for us that ideal sanctum with its "black-walnut mantelpiece," its "fragrant whirls of smoke," its "radiant grate," chandeliers, ottomans, easy-chairs, vases for manuscripts, and other signs and tokens of the more than Oriental magnificence amid which the editor's happy hours are charmed away amid melodious converse with his aids—being severally of light, airy dispositions, on whom life sits lightly, who carelessly and jauntily stroll through an admiring world. Their names usually typify this fortunate temper. It is Harry always with them, never Henry; Fanny Fern, Frank Forrester, and the like. It is by these deceivers that young people in the country are seduced into embarking on the stormy surges of literary life. They have so often leaned gracefully against the blackest of black-walnut mantelpieces, richly carved, and so continually lighted fresh havanas, and so regularly worn out-and-out dressing-gowns, and so habitually do they while the happy hours away in golden reverie before that bed of glowing coals, or in blithesome chat with the gifted poets and essayists of "Maga," that they have completely turned the heads of many young persons of both sexes. "Have," we said; it would be better to say "had." Railroads have pretty well killed this ideal editor, and he only drags out a semi-animate existence in some of the kinder magazines—or, we may say that he is wholly dead, and that it is only his ghost, soon to be laid, which still frequents its former favorite haunts. The railroads have carried him, in propria persona, to the lyceum platforms of every village and town in the country. Not many living editors, we may be sure, when young May Juniper or Jennie June lays eyes on them, as they clear their throats before the lecture, impress those ladies as persons who wear rich dressing-gowns and lead a dreamy existence on the hob of the grate. When next thereafter the young poetesses send in their verses to "Maga" it is with less awe than once they felt, and with a sad doubt if there is not a dash of fiction in the delightful account of the editorial existence. Once in a very great while an editor with flashing eye and hair tossed back from his brow may get up on the platform and make an "appeal" which, for a few moments, may make May Juniper doubt if after all there may not possibly be something in the dressing-gown and anthracite story; but it is only once in a very great while. The next course of lectures at the lyceum shows her more editors without flashing eyes and unredolent of any suggestions of the magnificent sanctum, and she perforce relapses into disbelief, and may well sigh at the increase of facilities for travel.

We do not grieve with her. So far as we now know our own mind, it is not a mild, benevolent pleasure that we take in this literature of the sanctum. To confess the truth, it seems a little flat to us, even in the pages of the "Spectator;" and we may as well confess to a belief that when met with elsewhere, it is a pleasure only to some persons, and gives encouragement to rather cynical mirth on the part of people extremely wise.

PUBLIC INSTRUCTION IN ITALY.

When in 1865 Signor Natoli, then Minister of Public Instruction, published the first volume of statistics of public and private instruction in Italy for the scholastic years of 1862–3, the world wondered and Italy hung her head in shame to learn that out of a population of 22 millions 17 millions were totally illiterate, did not know their alphabet! The press discussed the figures in all their bearings; orators in Parliament apostrophized the Government; private philanthropists set on foot private schools; the Minister of Finance proposed that three millions should be at once handed over to the Minister of Public Instruction. All too soon the efficacious panic subsided. It was found, with justice, that the figures were exaggerated, that a comparison between the analfabeti and the entire population was absurd, that in the 17 millions were included four millions of infants below the age of four, who are illiterate in all nations, so that the real number of analfabeti must be reduced to 13 millions. Putting this plaster on its pride, the public soon regained its equanimity—war against Austria for the liberation of Venice was, it must be allowed, a far more exciting affair than the setting up of elementary and secondary schools, the training of teachers, the discovery of a method for making or inducing parents whose children could turn a penny to send them to school on the chance of thus ensuring greater gains in the future. So the three millions, or the greater portion of them, went into the coffers of the Minister of War; army and people marched northwards to learn among many other bitter lessons that the triumph of the Prussian hosts was not exclusively due to needle guns nor to the strategical skill of generals, but also and above all to the superiority of her soldiers—that the Prussian "was intellectually superior to the Austrian, that hence he fought better, and better understood the necessary manœuvres." This lesson, as applicable to Italy as to Austria, has not been without its effects, and though at the present moment Italy still stands last in Europe on the educational map, below even Spain, progress is distinctly visible; we can say, with regard to public instruction, eppur si muove.

The second volume of statistics, published in 1866, during the time that Signor Berti was Minister of Public Instruction, shows an improvement on the preceding years. According to the law of 1859, elementary education is divided into two grades, inferior and superior, the former comprising religious teaching, reading, writing, arithmetic, and the Italian language; the latter, in addition to these branches, composition, book-keeping, elementary geography, elements of natural history and of the natural sciences—each course to occupy two years—no child under six to be inscribed as a regular pupil. Schools in which these courses can be gone through are, according to the law, to be established gratuitously in every commune. Even a village or fraction of a commune containing fifty children of either sex is bound to have at least an elementary school for the inferior course. Parents or guardians are bound to send their children to these schools or to prove that they are otherwise educated. If they fail, the commune scholastic commission is bound to reprove them, and if they continue impenitent "to affix their names on the parish registers, and cause them to be read aloud by the parish priest in the parish church on the first Sunday of every month." The law of March 2, 1865, confirms all these particulars, and renders it obligatory for the communes to provide the funds for the schools. Clearly, therefore, it is the intention of legislators that every child shall have a gratuitous elementary education. Let us see how their intentions are carried out. Taking all the existing schools—private and public, elementary of both classes—we have 31,804 (one private to four public, two female for three male). Taking the communes, 7,345 have all some sort of school, but 376 are still without any, male or female, public or private; 461 without public male schools; 1,884 without female, public or private. Taken as a whole, the number of the schools is not the most deficient part of the system. It is the attendance of the children at such schools as do exist that is so painfully disproportionate. Out of a population of 4,893,373 children but 1,307,217, or 27 per 100, attend the schools. To the advocates of wholesale administrative unification the following table may be dedicated. Taking the total number of schools in proportion to the whole population and entire superficies, we have one school on every eight kilometres and for every 667 inhabitants; but if we would ascertain the respective culture or ignorance of the provinces we must read thus:

PROVINCE.	SCHOOL PER INHABITANTS.	ATTENDANCE.
Piedmont,	One per 384	78 per cent.
Lombardy,	" 426	70 "
Liguria,	" 476	45 "
Tuscany and Marches,	" 667	27 "
Emilia,	" 715	31 "
Umbria and Sardinia,	" 833	24 "
Abruzzi, Calabria, Molise,	" 1,000	20 "
Puglie,	" 1,100	19 "
Basilicata Sicilia,	" 1,660	12 "

Clearly, some different system must be pursued to force the communes to establish schools in Sicily, Sardinia, and the Puglie and Abruzzi, and to induce parents to send their children, than is needed in Piedmont, Lombardy, or even Liguria, where, if the facilities offered and accepted for instruction are not perfect, they are at least equal to most other countries.

The increase on '63 is: for city schools, 27 per cent.; for rural schools, 3 per cent.; the attendance on the latter in summer is zero, and even in city schools is much diminished. Of infant schools we have 2,720, attended by 107,512 out of 1,665,136 infants between two and five years old; but they are chiefly sent to be "got out of the way," and instruction is never expected and rarely given. Besides these there are 4,556 schools for adults, open either on Sundays or of an evening, attended by 164,570 adult pupils, and here the instruction is given and received con amore. Visiting some of the schools instituted by the Working-men's Association, I have been surprised at the eagerness of the pupils, the patient intelligence of the teachers, many of them professors and men of talent, who give their services to their illiterate townsmen gratuitously. But anything dreadier than the routine of the elementary schools can hardly be imagined—certainly could not be tolerated an hour in America, whence I brought away a vivid impression of the "black-board system," the "object system," the singing classes, gymnastic exercises, the honest emulation between child and child, and the cordial feelings between pupil and teacher, which seemed to make both their lives a pleasure. Here, instead, all that the girls seem to get out of school is a knowledge of the catechism and needle-work. The boys seem to learn nothing but mischief; they have books out of which they learn by rote, and understand nothing; "caligraphy" seems the master's forte—certainly not orthography, as I have seen letters from boys who have passed their examination in the second class of the superior course with almost a mistake in each word. The worst of it is, that one and all hate the schools; the poor children play truant as much as possible; the children of the richer classes, who must get an examination certificate in order to pass on to the lyceums and gymnasiums, generally get tutors at home to cram them at the last hour—a system bad enough in colleges and universities, far worse when adopted for the rudiments. But even here efforts are being made. The much-lamented Natoli, who lost his life in tending his countrymen attacked by cholera, rendered great services in promoting normal schools, of which there are 135, attended by 7,083 pupils, of which we are glad to see that 4,365 are females, as they make, by universal consent, the best teachers. Other ministers have proposed, and Parliament has voted, medals and prizes for such teachers as distinguish themselves in bringing forward their pupils and in increasing their numbers. Good-will exists, but system is wanting.

The minister of public instruction, a Mancini, a Matteucci, a Natoli, toils for a couple of years, let us say, to rescue the children from the hands of the priests, shut up the seminaries, and restrict their office to the instruction of children destined for the priesthood; then succeeds a Berti, who reopens the seminaries and allows the teachers of those that remain closed to populate the lay schools. Or Matteucci proposes the system of inspectors—an admirable system when their independence can be ensured—and succeeds partially in introducing it. His successor abolishes it, and so on to the end of the chapter. The abolition of a minister of public instruction in Italy has been already mooted. As soon as the Parliament can condescend to ordinary work, a new law on public instruction is to be proposed and this question raised. On the issue will depend much of the educational future of the Italians.

Of the secondary instruction of lyceums, colleges, and universities we may speak in another article. Senator Matteucci has just published in two volumes all his articles on the subject. When we are told that many of the pupils admitted to the university examinations with diplomas from the lyceums as often as not "speak bad grammar," one can but feel that the elementary and secondary instruction is, after all, the most important subject for present consideration in Italy.

W. M.

Correspondence.

COPYRIGHT AND PATENT RIGHT.

To the Editor of the Nation:

The article "Authors versus Readers," in the Nation of Feb. 20, seems to confuse two very different things—viz., patent and copyright. Mr. Carey considered both from the point of view appropriate only to the patent; his critic places both on the basis of the copyright.

The considerations which justify patent laws are as follows: An idea may be patented, but there can be no copyright in it. It ceases to be the peculiar property of its author the moment it is communicated to others, and the conferring of a patent is virtually the purchase of an idea by society. For example, suppose a community in the habit of collecting fruit by climbing the trees or by shaking them; the former is troublesome, the latter injures the fruit. Brown invents a combination of bag and scissors on the end of a pole, by which the fruit can be readily plucked without bruising it. He makes a machine, others see it, the idea is communicated to them, it is no longer his alone, and they have a right to use it. But suppose that, instead of showing his machine, he tells his neighbors what it will accomplish, and offers to show it for five dollars. They may pay the money, and so purchase the invention, or they may say: "We do n't know what your invention is worth, but we will pay you in such a way that the utility of the idea will regulate the price. For fifteen years we will give you twenty-five cents for every such machine we use." The bargain is completed; Brown shows his model, and the idea ceases to be his at that moment; society pays him in instalments. There you have a patent.

Now for the copyright. When an author writes a book, he incorporates in it his labor in finding ideas and giving them form, and the product is as much his own as any other product is the property of the producer. If several men carry water from a pond to a city, they incorporate their labor into the water transported, and no one denies that that water is theirs. They may keep it during their lives and pass it down to their heirs, or they may sell it. The water may be pure and good to drink so that people will buy it, or it may be impure and worthless so that no service is rendered to society, and no one will buy the water; but, pure or impure, the water belongs to the carrier who brought it. The case of the author is parallel. The form of expression which represents his labor is his property; it is his by right for ever, unless he chooses to sell it. To take it from him is a theft. The book may be worthless to society, so that no one will read it; but, worthless or not, it is the author's own property. The only distinction between the two products is that the labor of the water-carrier is incorporated with the material, so that he must own the material if he owns anything. In the case of the author, however, the material may be separated from that which represents his labor. The form is the author's; the ideas are not. Euclid had a right to his book on geometry, but no more right than has Professor Loomis to his geometry, though the former invented new ideas, and the latter did not.

Now, if any one says that a thinker should be paid for the truths he discovers, we need not dispute that. Euclid might have refused to communicate his ideas except for a compensation. So long as they were known only to him, they were his alone. Society might have paid him down a sum of money for them, or might have paid him a royalty for fifteen years on every book which made use of the ideas. There would be no injustice in a patent law which should pay for inventions in science as well as in the arts. The reason why we have no such patent law is that society, like any other purchaser, does not care to pay for what people are willing to give freely.

The distinction, then, between patent and copyright is this: A patent is the price paid by society for a service rendered. Copyright is the natural right of an author to the product of his labor. A copyright law should not be regarded as conferring compensation on an author for a service rendered to society, but as a penal law, prohibiting others from stealing what is the author's own property as much as his coat or his watch. The theft of a book should be esteemed and treated like any other theft.

It is needless to add that this right in a book never expires; that a law which allows others to copy the book after ten, forty, or any number of years, is unjust; and, finally, that the law should forbid the stealing of foreign books as well as those of native authors; for, if it fails to do this, it winks at piracy.

A. E. W.

[The distinction made by "A. E. W." is a just one, though whether it be universally so will depend on the nature of any given patent. The article "Authors versus Readers" was, however, intended to apply to copyright alone, and in so far as copyright was confounded with patent right the confusion was unintentional.—Ed. Nation.]

Notes.

LITERARY.

It is announced that Messrs. Lee & Shepard will receive subscriptions for a pamphlet, to be published if a sufficient number of subscriptions are received, containing seven articles by Mrs. C. H. Dall on "Bunsen's Egypt." They are the articles which have already been published in the Friend, the Radical, and other periodicals.——Roberts Brothers will issue a new book by Jean Ingelow, "A Sister's Bye-Hours."——Fitzpatrick & Hunter, of this city, announce "The Architect's and Builder's Guide," by John D. Kennion. It will describe a great number of buildings recently erected in New York and other cities.——The Historical Society of Pennsylvania will issue "The Correspondence of William Penn and Family with James Logan—1700–1750." The work will comprise two volumes, and will be edited by Edward Armstrong, Esquire.——The Catholic Publication Society announce "Problems of the Age," a series of papers which the Rev. Mr. A. F. Hewit wrote for the Catholic World.——J. B. Lippincott & Co., of Philadelphia, will publish a reprint of Arthur Helps's "Life of Las Casas" and Dyer's "History of the Kings of Rome," the latter being a book creditable to English scholarship. The same house will soon have ready Dixon's "Spiritual Wives."——G. W. Carleton & Co. intend issuing a new novel by John Esten Cooke.——H. Longstreth, of Philadelphia, finds it necessary to publish a new edition of Maria Webb's "Penns and Penningtons," and will also issue another edition of "The Fells of Swarthmoor Hall," a novel by the same author.——Messrs. Gould & Lincoln, of Boston, announce as ready Doctor Howard Malcolm's "Theological Index; or, Reference to the Principal Works in all Departments in Religious Literature." The work embraces nearly seventy thousand citations, alphabetically arranged under two thousand heads, and has occupied nearly all of its author's life. It is intended for the working clergy, and adds one to the number of books that a man must have on peril of having an incomplete library.

—Magazines printed in phonography are not uncommon in England and not unknown in the United States, the two countries where the newspaper press is most flourishing and enterprising. It is some years, however, we are informed, since any periodical of this class has been published in America. Presumably there is need of something of the sort, and Mr. James E. Munson, of this city, undertakes to supply the want with the Monthly Phonographic Magazine. The first number is before us, and is a little pamphlet of sixteen pages. The title, table of contents, advertisements, and so forth, on the covers, are printed in alphabetical characters in the ordinary way, but the body of the magazine will surprise the uninitiated reader who takes it up. Mr. Munson's promise that it will not be made "a medium for promulgating isms" strikes one as comical and easy to keep; it is wholly printed in phonographic signs, except the titles of the articles, which are in script. So far as concerns these latter we can answer for the editor's abstinence from peculiar theories in religion and morals. "David Copperfield learning Short-hand" is one of them; "Historical Sketch of Short-hand" is another, and the rest are, "The School the Hope of Phonography," "Phonographic Reading in England," "Dumb Men's Speech," and "Colton's Journal of Geography." They are all printed on stout white paper by the photo-lithographic process, and the page is a very pretty one. The magazine is, of course, meant for persons who have already made some advancement in phonography, and to such learners it must be an aid of very considerable value. It is like a collection of easy reading to one who is studying a foreign language, and the youths throughout the country whom Mr. Parton has filled with the inappeasable desire of becoming Horace Greeley and has driven to the study of the "Complete Phonographer," will no doubt be helped on their way by the new magazine.

—Mr. Baldwin, of Massachusetts, reports for the Library Committee of the House "a bill for securing to authors in certain cases the benefit of international copyright, advancing the development of American literature, and promoting the interests of publishers and book-buyers in the United States." A part of the committee's report consists of an argument in favor of the principle of international copyright. It is forcible, though no new facts are used and nothing of its force is derived from anything felicitous in the manner of its presentation. But next to nothing is to be said on the other side. Then comes the bill, the substance of which we lay before our readers, with the hope that it may evoke whatever discussion of its provisions is necessary. It is to be feared that there will be quite time enough before it passes the House and the Senate for a deal of argumentation for it and against it, and for the consideration of numerous amendments. It is provided—1st, That any foreigner who shall be author of any book, map, chart, dramatic work, or musical composition that may be published abroad after the act goes into operation, or who shall invent, design, engrave, make or cause to be made from his own design any print or engraving, and the executors, etc., of such foreigner, shall have the same rights as regards the multiplication and sale of his works as now are, or hereafter may be, granted to authors and artists who are citizens of the United States. Provided, of course, that the foreign country grants the same rights to authors and artists of this country. 2d, The privileges above granted are conditional on the fact that all the editions of the work republished in this country be manufactured here and issued by publishers who are American citizens. Section third relates to translations. If the work of the foreigner is first published abroad, and he reserves the right of translation, he may have the benefit of the act on these conditions: that he register his work in the clerk's office of some of our district courts, and deposit a copy in the Library of Congress within four months after the publication of the original; that he announce in the title-page of the original his reservation of the right of translation; that within six months after such registration he offer his book to some American publisher, and the whole or a part of it be published here; that every edition of it be wholly manufactured here and published by an American house. Some of these provisions as regards translations seem unnecessarily strict; especially the third one. Section four lays down regulations for the author of books published abroad and republished here without translation. He must deposit a copy in the Library of Congress, and it must be a copy of the best foreign edition of the work; he must register it here within three months after its publication abroad, and also within three months after arrangements have been made bonâ fide with some American publisher; if his book is issued in parts, the same formalities are necessary in the case of each part. The bill is somewhat loosely worded, and as it is highly probable that a good deal of litigation will take place under any international copyright law that we may have, and as the property that will be in question is of a nature that rather easily eludes the ordinary juryman's comprehension, it might be well if persons interested in the bill were to aid the committee with some sound advice.

—The official literature of the city of New York, from messages and speeches by the mayor down to the "Corporation Manual," is not as a rule triumphantly good, nor is that of the Metropolitan Police District, and the Annual Report of the Board for the year 1867 is no exception to the general law. It is ill-arranged and in every way inelegant; it is almost oblivious of the science of statistics, and may properly be criticised harshly as being unworthy of the city, and inferior to documents of the same class published elsewhere. Still it seems to be honestly prepared—Commissioner T. C.

Acton had the management of the matter—and it contains a deal of information interesting to New Yorkers, and much, of course, that is valuable to sociologists. We learn from it this among other things, that during the year ending on the 31st of October last the number of Americans, whites and colored persons, arrested within the limits of the District was 27,156; of English people, 2,764; of Scotch, 970; of Germans, 9,460; of Irish, more than any of these, and nearly as many as all of them put together—namely, 38,128. Of the Americans arrested, rather less than one-third were women, and the same thing is true of the Scotch. Among the English and the people of the British Provinces the women were not quite half as numerous as the men; among the Irish there were more than one-half as many women as men. It is true, too, that among colored Americans the proportion of women to men among criminals is greater than in the case of their white countrymen and women. It is about the same as among our resident English, and not so high as it is among the Irish. The total number of arrests made by the police within the year was 80,532, an average of 46 for each officer, or not quite one a week. Some of the other duties which the department is called on to perform make an odd figure in the report. For example, it has caused the removal of 6,198 dead dogs and cats, of 4,417 dead horses, of 5 deer, of 189 goats, of 423 "boba," whatever they are—calves, we believe—of 21,500 unsound eggs, and of 256,370 pounds of bad meat, fish, and poultry. The officers during the year have found open and unprotected no less than 5,907 buildings. In the seven years from 1861 to 1867, the citizens gave to burglars 31,170 opportunities for entering stores and dwelling-houses; and this carelessness appears to be increasing; there were more than twice as many cases last year as there were in 1861. Commissioner Acton defends the excise law by statistical tables of arrests made on Sundays and on Tuesdays in eleven months of last year. In November there were four Sundays and four Tuesdays, the arrests on those days respectively numbered 186 and 401, and the case was the same throughout the year. In the thirteen months during which the law has been in operation the arrests on Tuesdays number 6,021; those made on Sundays number 2,514. Before the enactment of the law the Sunday arrests always exceeded those of Tuesday. Very many other points of the report might well be noticed. We make room for some figures from the sub-report on the ferries. Mr. Coffee says that the whole number of passengers who have come into and gone out of New York on ferry-boats during the year is 79,925,000. His figures look suspicious, and are evidently "estimated," by whom we do not know—the companies, perhaps. The five Brooklyn ferries consolidated by the Union Ferry Company are set down as carrying half of this eighty millions of passengers; next comes the Jersey City Ferry Company, whose boats, connecting with the railroads of the West and South, carry 13,000,000; and next the Hoboken Ferry Company, which carries 5,300,000. "The death rate," says Mr. Coffee, "is less on the New York ferries than in any place in the known world where so great a number are on the move. They are safer than stages, railroads, steamships, or any other conveyance in my knowledge." This may be true enough, but Mr. Coffee evidently does not know of all the accidents that occurred on ferry-boats last year, for he leaves some out of his report. We must quote from him an observation which seems to us as remarkable an instance of liberality in the official mind as we have heard of recently. "Several of the ferries," he says, "have adopted the system of closed gates to prevent passengers in egress or ingress meeting on the boat or bridge. This I believe to be of doubtful benefit to passengers, the annoyance being greater than the risk of personal safety, which risk I believe every one entitled to take for themselves."

—Among English books issued or to be issued we notice these: In the "Bayard Series" of Low, Son & Marston—a very pretty and, even in this country, very cheap little set of very good books—the publishers intend to include Beckford's "Vathek." Other volumes to follow will be Sir Thomas More's "Utopia," Coleridge's "Lyrical Poems," "The Cavalier Ballads of England," and "Table-Talk of Napoleon." It seems a pity that the publishers intend to stray into poetry, as thus it cannot but happen that their series will have an incompleteness which might have been in a great measure avoided.——The new edition of Lamb's works has been entrusted, Mr. Welford says in the Book-Buyer, to some person so devoid of the sense of literary congruity that if the critics do not influence the publishers to stop him he is going to let George Augustus Sala write the "Introductory Essay."——Mr. Richard Henry Major, head of the Geographical Department in the British Museum Library, has just published a book which condenses the labor of a lifetime of research. Its title is as follows: "The Life of Prince Henry of Portugal, surnamed the Navigator; and its Results, comprising the Discovery, within One Century, of Half the World, with new facts in the Discovery of the Atlantic Islands; a Refutation of French Claims to Priority in Discovery; Portuguese Knowledge (subsequently lost) of the Nile Lakes, and the History of the Naming of America, from Authentic Contemporary Documents; Illustrated with Portraits, Maps, etc.," including a beautiful illumination of Prince Henry, from a unique original MS. Mr. Welford tells us as an instance of the services rendered to literature by the poor, despised book-collector, that Mr. Major searched long in vain to find a book which Hakluyt, three centuries ago, strove in vain for twelve years to find. It was Antonio Galvão's "Treatise on the Discoverer of the World" (Lisbon, 1555). Mr. Major was fortunate enough to meet at last with a copy of the work, and he found it not in the great libraries of Europe, but in the library of Mr. John Carter Brown, of Providence, a collector of books illustrative of American history.——Mr. Kinglake's third and fourth volumes of the "Crimean War" are now passing through the press. Murray, Mr. Welford says, when the book was offered to him, proposed to print but a thousand copies of it. This, though the author of "Eothen" had a name. The actual publishers, Messrs. Blackwood & Sons, have already sold between eleven and twelve thousand volumes of the book, in its expensive octavo form, and in this country also its sale, though probably less, and doubtless less profitable, has been large.——It is unlikely that the state of Count Montalembert's health will permit of the completion of his "Monks of the West" on the scale which he at first had in mind. Mrs. Oliphant's translations of the fourth and fifth volumes have appeared, and the work stands finished. They include the Christianization of England.——Apropos of the promise of a four-volume standard edition of Tennyson's complete works, which is to be revised by the author, and to contain notable additions, the Book-Buyer tells us that Good Words has agreed to give the Laureate two thousand pounds for twelve poems, to be furnished monthly during the current year. For "The Victim," then, we are to suppose that he got over eleven hundred dollars in greenbacks. As Mr. Tennyson had a poem in the January Once a Week, and another in the February Macmillan, it looks as if he were becoming a regular writer for the periodical press. Among the rest of the current gossip about the poet is the report that he gets all his publishing done for a commission of fifteen per cent., which to a good man of business like him must have its satisfactions.

MOTLEY'S NETHERLANDS.*

The Netherlands are obliged to Mr. Motley, and he to the Netherlands. No other subject, so little worn, promised more to an admirer of stubborn heroism who is fearless of hard work. And, on the other hand, no country was in sharper need of a foreign historian. It has lost the leading place it had conquered for itself. Its comparatively unknown language and vernacular literature have failed to redeem its geographical littleness and to check its descent from distinction to respectability. Something more than two hundred years ago quaint old Fuller advised his countrymen, if they would see much in a little, to "travel the Low Countries. Holland is all Europe, in an Amsterdam print, for Minerva, Mars, and Mercury; learning war, and traffic." Something less than one hundred years ago Mr. John Adams, in Holland on public duty, described the country as the most curious, the peoplé as the most incomprehensible, and the constitution of government as the most singular in the world. And now Mr. Grant Duff tells us of a person of some position in London who asked a Dutch gentleman the name of the "present stadtholder." Such a country may be grateful to a writer who translates its fame into more current speech, and holds up its early honors to the admiration of his fellow-citizens.

In the two volumes now before us, Mr. Motley closes his history where Grotius closed his: with the making of that truce for twelve years which virtually owned, though it did not seal, the independence of the United Provinces. The period covered by these volumes extends from 1590 to 1609. It boasts of no hero of the stature of William the Silent; and no Invincible Armada is there "to come, see, and perish." But the essential elements of the history survive, and some new actors cross the stage. The last exploits of the Prince of Parma, the sudden but ripe generalship of Prince Maurice, and the outburst of Spinola's martial renown give free play to the author's descriptive powers. Barneveldt's strong hand is still on the helm, and Philip, living and dead, comes up for reiterated doom. The crown of England passes from Tudor to Stuart, and that of France has just passed from Valois to Bourbon.

The moral dimensions of the strife between the United Provinces and Spain were out of all proportion to the diminutive area in which for the most part it was carried on. The struggle was so far a test, on which was staked the success of Philip's grasping and grinding policy, that failure to subdue the Netherlands was fatal to the vision of universal empire. Emancipation of the Low Countries was, more or less, emancipation of Europe. This fact is the key-note of Mr. Motley's theme. It gives a central character to the outlying flat, not twice as large as Massachusetts, which a war of forty years could not conquer, and it justifies the writer in bringing within the frame of his map a considerable tract of adjoining history. The sovereigns of England and France, in the attitude of anxious observers, keen calculators, or cautious auxiliaries, form a background to the civic aristocrats of the young republic.

* "History of the United Netherlands, from the Death of William the Silent to the Twelve Years' Truce, 1609. By J. L. Motley." In four volumes. Vols. III and IV. Portraits. 8vo, pp. vii., 633. New York: Harper and Brothers.

Mr. Motley's merits are too well and too popularly known to need or to warrant formal eulogy. His capital quality is the sustained interest he takes in the men and the deeds he describes. Even where he dislikes, he does not allow himself to grow weary. This interest of his own he imparts to his readers; and when he throws himself into a campaign, he enlists them to fight it through. While many a chapter gives proof of hard reading in unpublished manuscripts and in rare or little used books in all the main languages of Europe, he never claims an audience till he has shaken off the dust. The reader, when he lays down one of his volumes, is sure that he has been with real men and in the heat of real action. The account of Maurice's surprising victory at Nieuport, of the three years' siege of Ostend, of the heroic voyage of Barendz, or even (in spite of its disagreeable details) of Philip's sickness and death, are striking instances of narrative power. Mr. Motley has a passion for freedom, and exerts himself to kindle a like enthusiasm in others.

The mere selection of a subject emphasizes that subject, and nearness seems to magnify men and events. And there are portions of history in which an epic flavor is inherent. Mr. Motley is not insensible to this. He is generous to his own; but he would not, therefore, be niggardly to others. He would give all their due; though possibly, here and there, his Dutchman (as he ought to do) turns the better penny. We get, for instance, at sufficient length, Sully's special strictures on the English character; but Mr. Motley unconsciously overlooks the paragraph in which the Frenchman's sharp eye takes the measure of Dutch, English, and other esprits du Nord alike. So, too, when, in introducing the very interesting narrative of the voyages of the Dutch in quest of a North-eastern passage, he says that "the expedition [in 1594] set forth towards those unknown Arctic seas which no keel of Christendom had ever ploughed," he appears to claim for his hardy friends a chronological precedence to which they are not altogether entitled. In a later voyage we learn that Barendz, in lat. 73°, deemed himself to be near Sir Hugh Willoughby's land. That brave man had perished forty years before in a similar enterprise.

Mr. Motley says (rather hyperbolically, considering the extent and diversity of Philip's dominions) that his theme down to 1598 has been the reign of Philip II. But French and English history come in for a large share of his labors; and, on the whole, having to take note of scenes and events of such range and variety, the author has held the threads of his narrative with no little skill. Out of the Low Countries the prominent figures are Philip II. and Henry IV., gloomy and gladsome. Philip's ghost knew well what to expect from his judge. No false hopes had been held out; and here we have the sentence: "If there are vices—as possibly there are—from which he was exempt, it is because it is not permitted to human nature to attain perfection in evil." And elsewhere he says that, if Philip had been living when Spinola was winning victories for him, "he would have felt it his duty to make immediate arrangements for poisoning him." Certainly, in this case, a potential indictment is quite superfluous. The dying bigot asked for little favor; but even Mr. Motley, as man, if not as judge, is touched by "the perfect gentleness" to others and perfect resignation in himself which he showed in the agonies of fearful pain. In how "great degree" this was to be ascribed to an "internal conviction of general righteousness" may be doubtful; so far as it goes it may pass for one sign of grace. Of Henry IV. the judgment is less stern, but it is hardly more favorable. No attempt is made to draw a complete portrait of him. In truth, it is all but impossible. The pencil is baffled by the artless and artful changes of the features. Such a paradox appears the man himself that it would almost seem as if only paradoxes could expound him. In a few sagacious sentences Burke has struck off a rapid sketch of his public character; and a recent French writer (not alone of that mind, even in France) suggests that the one thing he wanted was "cette exquise faculté, qu'on appelle la conscience." Mr. Motley meets him from time to time, and seldom lets him go without adding a stroke to the canvas. The strokes are often happy, though here and there, it may be, somewhat too full. Thus we read: "He would have cut off the head of D'Aubigné or Duplessis Mornay to gain an object." Another potential crime, which makes Henry a monster He was hardly that. Our author is not blinded to Henry's genius by his faults and vices, nor does he accept the genius in absolution of the faults and vices. Nowhere, indeed, so far as we are aware, does he trifle with moral responsibility.

In these volumes the rights of historical students are not forgotten. Mr. Motley conscientiously lays down his authorities, thus subjecting himself to a test of his fidelity and ability, and smoothing the way to independent investigation. He uses them, so far as we are able to judge, very honorably. Perhaps, at times, too much of involuntary inference enters the text with the testimony, but not, we believe, in an unfair or sophistical spirit. Sully's "Mémoires" being an easily accessible book, we have compared the original with Mr. Motley's account of that famous man's mission to England. We find here the summaries and reductions excellent in the main, though some slight liberties have been taken. In both volumes the copious "Relations of the Venetian Ambassadors," now recognized as a fertile source of information, have been freely and profitably used. Mr. Motley has not neglected such statistics as could be drawn from these and other observers, though we think that, in one or two cases, unreconciled discrepancies are not explained.

Mr. Motley's best style is singularly animated and energetic. He conducts a siege or fights a battle as if he were there. Many of his portraits are thrown off with great spirit; and he can hold and exhibit with success a course of affairs. He transfers his readers from topic to topic, from region to region, and from land to sea, by natural and well varied transitions. He is never at a loss for words, and his words are very often pithy and nervous. But he does not keep his style faithfully up to its best. His taste is strangely capricious and intermittent. Without flagging for an instant he goes through the three years' siege at Ostend, and then dismisses it with a picture that is simply provoking. He can descend to fine, to smart, and to flat writing. Often his wit is not terse, his satire not forcible, and he too seldom practises that economy of expression which suggests a reserve of thought, and is the best compliment to the reader's intelligence. Some of his sentences are incredibly below his capacity and his reputation. It needs no purist to wonder at such words as these: "Aged counsellors justified themselves in a solemn consumption of time such as might have exasperated Jared or Methuselah in his boyhood," "Subterranean regions where the effluvia of falsehood becomes (!) almost too foul for ordinary human organization," and "What if it were found out that we were all fellow-worms together, and that those which had crawled highest were not necessarily the least slimy." Some of these defects are more apparent as he approaches the confines of historical philosophy. His style often lacks the sure balance and firm texture suited to a vehicle of solid and steady thought. Nor is it backed, at least in the regions of reflection, by powerful imagination There is too much of exaggeration and declamation. This is the more to be regretted, because it takes from the fair effect of the generous and manly principles which run through his work. What, for instance, is gained to the cause of peace, of which the author is a staunch friend, or for science, which he is celebrating in a highly elaborate paragraph, by saying that "the most enlightened of peoples are now broken up into warring tribes of internecine savages"? And in an interesting sketch of Barneveldt, how much light is thrown on him or on anything by the statement that "his perceptions as to eternal necessity in all healthy governments taught him that comprehensible relations between the state and the population were needful to the very existence of a free commonwealth"? We venture to dwell a little on these blemishes, because they set an example of the very sort most likely to be followed, especially in this country, by writers without a tithe of Mr. Motley's knowledge, sense, or power.

One word more. In dealing with opinion the historian has a double duty; he has to maintain, as it were, a double consciousness; he must think in the present, and he must think as in the past. Mr. Motley often summons the past to the bar of the present—a perfectly fair proceeding. But we are not sure that he sufficiently admits in mitigation of sentence the plea that the past was once the present. He tells us of "the long, hideous, senseless massacres, called the wars of religion." Too true, in a modern sense; but one might ask, as it has been asked, what could the Huguenots do but fight?

No one who has ever read the proof-sheets of a book is ignorant of the extreme difficulty of avoiding errors of detail. And he who writes a book must be painfully sensible of the difficulty. We may, without captious criticism, point out a few errata. It was not the Duke of Lorraine, but the Duke of Bavaria, who won the Battle of Prague in 1620. The year 1600 was not the first year of the seventeenth century. The Turks are not pagans. Aldebaran is in the Bull, not out of it. Egotism, in the sense of the French égoisme, is not yet naturalized. And the "odoriferous pistil," that was "the cause of so many pitched battles and obstinate wars," was a flower-bud, and it was not "the growth of a particular gillyflower." The clove is not the clove-gillyflower.

Mr. Motley informs us that he is now engaged on the history of the Thirty Years' War. He has somewhere called it a "war of demons." The task will be long and arduous. We could have wished that he might give us the century of Dutch history between the Twelve Years' Truce and the Peace of Utrecht. But now we can only hope that he may find all the years in store for him that he will need to bring him to the goal. In the Dutch section of his new history he will be hurried at once into the tempest of political and theological hate that brought Barnevelt to the scaffold. But the name of Grotius will lead a line of distinguished natives and sojourners, and we may look for greater detail in the biography of men of letters and science than was possible while the stormy struggle for national existence was the engrossing theme. We must beg Mr. Motley to remember that in America we have not reached the manufacture of popular historical atlases. The map of Germany has been revolutionized since the seventeenth century; his readers will need help from charts, plans, and tables. He has hitherto been too sparing of these assistances. His next history will be obscure without them; as obscure as chapters of Mr. Bancroft's last volume are to men not used to Brooklyn Heights or the Bronx Valley, and who did not know the name of Spuyten-Duyvil before it became an offence to ears polite.

THE DERVISHES.*

We know nothing of Mr. Brown except what we learn from this book and what we learned by reading some poems of his which have appeared in we forget what newspapers. In the poetry there was nothing attractive, and in the volume before us what there is that is attractive is, most of it, not to be credited to Mr. Brown. On a very taking subject he has made a book which is to be called badly made, and which, when in parts it is good, is good mainly by reason of the labors of other men. Not that he himself does not bring new facts to light; apparently he is in possession of information out of which most men of any pretensions to literary ability would have made a book which not only would have answered the requirements of a popular work, but would have had authoritative weight. Setting aside his want of ability as a thinker and the badness of his style, two faults of which are constant bad grammar and occasional ignorance of the meaning of common words, he writes so very confusedly as regards the general arrangement of his matter, is so incapable of distinguishing the important from the utterly trivial in the facts which he has gathered together, that we do not know when we have read a book more tantalizingly unsatisfactory. The obligations to other authors to which we have referred Mr. Brown acknowledges in his preface; and in the body of the work in every case where he borrows from previous investigators he gives them full credit. But the book might have been a very great deal more than he has made it—namely, a bad compilation, rather dry and useless, made with considerable honesty to be sure, to which is joined in a very unworkmanlike manner some little information got at first-hand. Still, whatever it may be relatively to what it might have been, it is nevertheless a work of some value and interest, a book which to almost all general readers of good books will be neither uninstructive nor unpleasing. For it contains, quoted from M. D'Ohsson, a good historical account of Dervishism as it exists in the Ottoman Empire; a description, quoted from Mr. Lane, of those performances whereby the Egyptian Dervishes obtain most popular applause and most strike the attention of the mere traveller; a very clear account, quoted from Ubicini, of the Dervish faith, particularly as it differs from that of the Mohammedan; some translations of Dervish writings made by Mr. Brown himself, and a good deal of miscellaneous information, also from Mr. Brown, on the modes of initiation into the various orders, the Dervish costume and its meaning, the traditions of some of the orders, and so on. Mr. Brown's part of the book may be found valuable by future writers; to the present reader the part of it from which he will learn most and which he will like best is the large part written by the writers above-mentioned, and, beside these, by Sir William Jones, Malcolm, the historian of Persia, and other travellers and orientalists of real ability and real acquirements.

A few words about the Dervishes may not be unacceptable to our readers. It seems that there are twelve principal orders, and that the lesser orders are much more numerous, some writers reckoning them at sixty, some at a hundred. They are spread over all Mohammedan countries, most being gathered into tekkiehs or monasteries—to each of which belong as affiliated members many persons who live in their own dwellings and pursue their regular callings—a few wandering from city to city without fixed abode. The germ of all these societies is found in that association of forty-five citizens of Mecca who, in the first year of the Hegira, joined themselves with an equal number of citizens of Medina, and formed a fraternity having for its principal points of doctrine community of property, strict allegiance to the Prophet, and the daily observance of certain religious ceremonies. Soofees they called themselves. Of course the idea of such fraternities is older than Islamism, and so consonant is it with the peculiar character of the Eastern people that, though Mohammed said in a famous sentence, "No monkery in Islamism," it was not long before Islam was overspread by communities of Mussulman monks. Even Ali and Abu Bekir, relatives and contemporaries of the Prophet himself, each established one of them. The vast majority of all the orders trace their descent from the congregation of Ali. To give anything like an account of the distinctive character of the various orders, their different ceremonies, the dress peculiar to each, with the symbolical meaning of its parts, would be a work of great difficulty and little profit. Mr. Brown, we should say, has done this better, has given fuller details of the history of each sect, than any other author.

Of the doctrines held by the Dervishes it may be said in general that, as seen from the outside, they consist in an excellent system of morality, in the inculcation of religious practices entirely in harmony with the teachings of the Koran, and of exercises—dancing, howling, sword-swallowing, eating of live coals, musical performances, and so on—which were once held to be infractions of the law of the Prophet, but which are now everywhere accepted. But there is another view to be taken of their belief—a view not obtained from the outside nor even by all Dervishes. There seems to be taught by some, at any rate, if not by all, of the sheikhs—and to some, if not to all, of their followers—a secret as well as a public system of belief. According to the latter, the description of the true Dervish is this:

"When it is asked what Dervish means, the reply is, 'One who asks nothing of any creature; and to be as submissive as the earth which is trodden upon by the feet; to serve others before yourself; to be contented with little; to do neither good nor evil; to abandon all desires; to divorce even his wife; to submit hourly to all occurrences of misfortune and accident; not to drink wine nor to lie; not to commit fornication; not to touch what does not belong to you; to know the true and the false, and to restrain the tongue and speak little.'"

But when the novice has been proved, has practised the virtues above enjoined, has by austerities and mystical contemplation annihilated his individuality and purged his spiritual eyes, then, it is said, he is taught to dispense with the Koran, and to reduce his belief to mysticism, to believe that ecstatic communication with God is something within his own power, and to think of morality as a thing indifferent. "Purity, impurity, slowness, precipitation—all these distinctions are beneath Me," one of the sheikhs makes God say to Moses; and the Sheikh Bayazid cried out in the midst of his disciples, "Glory to me; I am above all things"—a form of words which, in the mouths of the Orientals, is applied to God alone. "O my master!" a disciple said to Jelâl ed Deen er Roomee, the founder of the "Dancing Dervishes,"—"O my master! you have completed my doctrine by teaching me that you are God, and that all is God." Many such passages might be quoted showing how different from the Mohammedanism of the Ulema is the faith of the Dervish. Pantheism, identification of God with the individual mystic, the exemption of the perfect from the chains of morality—which are only for the imperfect—the denial of submission to any authority except that of the Sheikh, the emptiness of positive religions and the allegorical character of all their dogmas—these are the tenets which seem to be held by the Dervish sects. Their identity with those of Indian mysticism and much modern quietism and transcendentalism is apparent. Metempsychosis also they believe in, and, as may be supposed, they are consistent fatalists.

Reading which most readers will find fresher and more interesting than to learn that the esoteric teachings of the Dervishes are Brahminical in character, are some of the stories which Mr. Brown's book tells us about the thaumaturgy of the Dervishes and their performance of feats similar to those with which the Convulsionists of Saint Medard once astonished France. And more interesting than that are his details in regard to the exercise by the Sheikhs of powers quite the same, apparently, as those exercised by our mesmerists, clairvoyants, and natural healers, and the same as some of those exercised by spiritual mediums. But the second title of the book, "Oriental Spiritualism," is a misnomer. For one of the least wonderful and best authenticated of these tales we make room here. It was related to Mr. Brown by a Dervish, of whom he seemingly thinks very well—a friend of his, he calls him:

* "The Dervishes; or, Oriental Spiritualism. By John P. Brown, Secretary and Dragoman of the Legation of the United States of America at Constantinople." Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. 1868.

"When I was at Kerkoot, in the province of Shehrazor, near to Mosul, I visited a Tekkieh of the Kâdiree Order, for the purpose of seeing a Sheikh of much repute and great spiritual powers. The Sheikh presided over the Tekkieh in question.

"When I reached the Tekkieh, a large number of Mureeds, or neophytes (disciples) were present, all appearing to be much excited by the power or the spell of the Sheikh; so much so as to rise and dance, sing or cry out involuntarily. On entering the hall where they were assembled in the presence of the Sheikh, I was also much affected by the spectacle, and, retiring to a corner, sat down and closed my eyes in devout meditation, mentally praying to the Sheikh to send away those persons, and to permit me to enjoy, alone, his society. The Sheikh was several paces distant from me, and, as I did not speak, could only have known what was passing in my mind by means of his wonderful spiritual powers, by which expression I mean the faculty which one spirit has of communing with another, and the power which a superior spirit has over the will of another spirit.

"On opening my eyes, I was amazed to hear the Sheikh address me in the following words—'In a few minutes' time your prayer, young man, will be granted, and you will commune with me alone.' To my surprise, in a few minutes the Sheikh, without speaking a word to any one present, had dismissed all his disciples from the hall, and so I remained with him alone. One by one each had ceased to be affected by his spell, and withdrew. I then experienced an impulse beyond my power of refusal to arise and approach him, which I did. I threw myself helpless at his feet, and kissed the hand which he extended to me. We next sat down together, and I had a long and most instructive conversation with him."

THE MAGAZINES FOR MARCH.

THE two new magazines grow better, we think, with each number, and are nearly equally good. Lippincott's has a very much better novel than the extremely weak story entitled "Too True" which is running through Putnam's, and the "Table-Talk" of Putnam's seems trivial enough beside the bibliographical and literary knowledge of the "Monthly Gossip" of Lippincott's; as regards the reviews of books the one is about as good, or bad, as the other, such superiority as there is resting with the Philadelphia magazine; and Lippincott's has this advantage, that there is less in it which one is unwilling to read than there is in Putnam's. It is an advantage due, perhaps, to the fact that Putnam's contains the greater number of pages, for we should not say that Lippincott's gives greater evidence than its rival of being in extremely good editorial hands. We do wrong, perhaps, to speak of the two magazines as rivals. They came into the world at the same time, however, and address the same class of readers. Neither is so popular in character as Harper's, and neither addresses an audience so cultivated as the subscribers to the Atlantic. This comparative method of criticism we do not apologize for, little profitable as such criticism is apt to be; for it is well to try to fix the place of new candidates for public favor, and this is best done by comparing them with a standard whose value is well known to every reader.

Mrs. Harding Davis, as was conjectured, turns out to be the author of the novel in Lippincott's. It was an easy guess, for that matter; nobody who had read her acknowledged works could fail to find the family likeness in "Dallas Galbraith." It has the same painful intensity as the others; one as surely says "morbid anatomy" when he ends a chapter of this story as when he ends a chapter in "Waiting for the Verdict" or in "Margret Howth." We were not ourselves born in New England—and, as Mr. Howells says, we cheerfully beg pardon for the youthful inadvertence—but we should not blame a native of that region if he were to smile a little at Mrs. Davis's estimate of the relative merits, mental and physical, of the Yankee and the man who is born and dies and raises wheat on the slopes of the Blue Ridge. Still, it is doubtless useful, except to the one who does it, to oppose bigotry to bigotry; when narrowness is set against narrowness, there is breadth for whoever can see them both. "Dallas Galbraith" we find a not uninteresting story. The one good character seems to have permanently disappeared from the scene; but two women are left who promise something. Messrs. Lippincott's proof-reader, let us remark, or Mrs. Davis, ought not to make the verb "to plead" irregular.

Louis Blanc's letter this month is a good one. He rejoices in what he considers Napoleon's enforced surrender to the clerical party, and gives a very intelligible account, and what we take to be a true one, of the Emperor's relations with the Liberals and the Catholics. His article, and the novel of which we have been speaking, and an article by Mr. Charles Astor Bristed on "Two Alsatian Novelists," and a clearly written, very sensible article by Amasa Walker, entitled "An Elastic Currency," seem to be the best worth reading of all the essays that this month's number contains. Mr. Bristed is not a critic for whose judgment or taste we entertain extraordinary respect; and the habit of writing for various sporting papers has given him a style that strikes one as odd when it is discovered in soberer periodical literature; but he has vastly more knowledge than most American critics, and he seldom writes many pages together without saying something somewhat worth hearing. Erckmann and Chatrian are the two Alsatian novelists of whom he talks in the paper before us—novelists little known to American readers. Of many other people, too, he talks, and sometimes in a way that will be found quite amusing. Here is one of his marginal notes: "The dictionaries write idyl; Tennyson and Stedman idyll. One Carl Benson, of whom the reader has probably never heard, did so before either of them. You may spell it which way you please, my dear little reader: you pays your money and you has your choice."

Putnam's opens with Dr. Bushnell's "Science and Religion." Next comes Phœbe Cary, who writes "The Three Wrens," and who is pigeon-livered and lacks gall for satire. The third article is by Professor Schele de Vere; "Pearls" he writes about, giving information old and new, and making a tolerably readable article. An article more readable, very lively indeed, is entitled "Mr. Thom. White's Little Sermon"—the extravagance of modern American women is the pregnant text, and Mr. White is apparently a bachelor of little faith. It is, we suspect, to a very fashionable congregation that he habitually preaches, and, after all, the majority of worshippers are not members of such. Most women do not spend more money than they have; most women are less extravagant than most men. "American Traits, as seen from Abroad," is another light article which will be found readable; and "City Postal Service in the United States," without being at all light, is also readable, and worth reading. It shows very plainly by its figures the wretched postal service which the people of this city and Brooklyn are compelled to accept at the hands of the Post-office officials, local and general, and makes it clear that we might without difficulty be as well off in the matter of mails as London, where, throughout the vast city, "a well-sealed and clearly-directed penny-post letter is the best messenger." However, the postal service here and elsewhere is a branch of the civil service, and as the tree is, so are the branches.

The best article in Putnam's for March is by some anonymous lover of old books, who begins a series of papers with the title "Out-of-the-way Books and Authors." The Rev. Thomas Adams, an English clergyman of the time of James the First, is his theme this month, and he gives copious extracts which seem to show that South and Fuller would have welcomed this learned and witty preacher as a kindred spirit. The passages quoted make one wish it possible that in the edition of old English sermonizers which Hurd & Houghton some time ago promised Adams's works might find a place. The writer of the article has apparently forgotten his "Troilus and Cressida," or he would not have mentioned as one of Adams's "strong original proverbs" a saying which, in that play, forms a part of one of the best speeches of Shakespeare's Ulysses. We hope the series may be a very long one.

More articles like Mr. Croly's on the question "What a Newspaper Should Be" we do not know that we wish for. It is in good part identical with Mr. Parton's North American Review essay on "James Gordon Bennett and the New York Herald," and it would have been well if the editorial scissors had been applied to it freely. Of the remainder, a portion is practically valuable for instruction of persons intending to establish newspapers, and a portion is not valuable to anybody. One of the writer's leading propositions, that a newspaper should merely reflect public opinion, seems to us to be dissented from entirely. But we shall not see the day, nor will our children, when the comments of exceptionally able men on current events will cease to be influential on the minds of other men, and it is hardly worth while to combat the writer's notion. As a matter of fact, we know that to-day ninety-nine men in a hundred in the most enlightened countries in the world might have presented to them fresh every morning the news of all the world, or let us say of Washington, and would be altogether incapable of forming without help a politically valuable opinion upon it. It is true that no paper can live which sets itself in perpetual, obstinate opposition to all public opinion, and it is true that no paper prospers which does not conciliate the good-will of a tolerably large public. These things are so; but that they are so is not at all a reason for believing that servile reflection of popular opinion is necessary or practicable or desirable. Newspapers are not omnipotent, but they are powerful. They are powerful because editors work on the passions of men and inform men's minds. This latter work they do to some extent by printing telegrams, and to some extent by publishing thoughts for people who can adopt thoughts which they could not have originated. The editorial is man talking to men, as Mr. Parton says, and the news is God talking to men. Everything is God talking to men; God, however, is, in no case, his own interpreter.

Except Mr. Dickens, none of the contributors to the March Atlantic are owners of distinguished names. It must be a bad number, then, if we reason after what seems the fashion of publishers. And it is not, in fact, a very good one. "George Silverman's Explanation" is apparently brought to an end at the end of the third part; but we do not certainly know. The depicting of a morbidly self-distrustful, unnaturally guileless, very self-sacrificing man—a sort of a Tom Pinch—seems to be the author's object; and that excessively familiar figure is to be seen at full length in these eight chapters as well, and as much to the reader's satisfaction, as if the canvas had been larger. Dr. Palmer writes like an "emancipated" doctor in his entertaining "John Chinaman, M.D."—an article which, with Dr. W. T. Helmuth's chat about "Some of the Wonders of Modern Surgery," we recommend for perusal. One cannot read the latter without a feeling of thankfulness; it is of a kind to stagger a pessimist. Other articles are: "Cretan Days," by Mr. Stillman; "A Conversation on the Stage," by Miss Kate Field; "Byways of Europe," by Mr. Taylor; "Free Missouri," by Mr. A. D. Richardson; "The Old Philadelphia Library," by J. M. Read, Jr., and two or three stories, or parts of stories. There are also three pieces of poetry. "A New Contributor" writes one of them, very commonplace indeed; one is by Celia Thaxter, and one, perhaps rather better than Celia Thaxter's, is anonymous. None is to be called good.

The March Galaxy has, for its most interesting matter, a very circumstantial account of Louis Napoleon's secret purchase, and a Mr. Petty's management, of the London Morning Chronicle. The disgraceful story we take to be a true one; at any rate, it has every appearance of truthfulness, and is well worth looking at as what may probably be a bit of the secret history of the Second Empire. "How Lamirande was Caught" and "John Bright at Home"—the one by Gaston Fay, the other by R. J. Hinton—are also readable papers of the kind in which the Galaxy has been noticeably successful—the subject not perhaps at all important, yet unhackneyed, and the treatment appropriately light. It is to be said, too, that of subjects quite sufficiently hackneyed the Galaxy treats often enough; light padding as distinguished from the heavy sort has always made rather too large a part of it, and every little while it prints a piece almost unaccountably bad, as, for instance, "The Ballad of Sir Ball" in the number in hand.

Of the heavier sort of padding Hours at Home furnishes a good sample in its article called "Insanity and Usefulness." In fact, it is of the heaviest sort. With perfect gravity Mr. Butterworth relates anecdotes worn threadbare, and accompanies them with comments marvellous for inanity. However, we do not mention him on that account. He has occasion to say that some men have thought insanity preferable to enduring the pangs of a guilty conscience—a statement not to be doubted—but next he falls into this wicked mixture of platitude and calumny: "In this view of the case, many who have figured in the most polished courts are more to be pitied than admired, and Garrick, Hood, and Hook lived no enviable lives." In any view of any case Mr. Rae Wilson lived no enviable life, as Mr. Butterworth will discover if he will turn to Hood's ode to that gentleman, and where Mr. Butterworth learned that Hood was anything but a very good man we are curious to know.

The rest of Hours at Home contains good reading. The moral uses of winter are Doctor Bushnell's theme, and he makes out a strong case—a case so strong that we almost fear he would have trouble to justify the ways of God to such men as inhabit countries that are hot. The Rev. Mr. Bacon will, we fear, be charged with indulging in unseemly levity in his "Sunday-school Muse;" but what he says is substantially sensible. Nothing more surely tends to immorality of character than the relaxing of children's minds by soaking them in the slop of twaddling songs, and surely it is high time that Sunday-school superintendents and teachers were warned of the iniquity of the "Minstrels" and "Bells" of various kinds, and "Choral Songsters," which fill so large a place in the instruction of scholars in both Sunday-schools and secular schools. Doctor Schaff translates with much felicity a fine piece of religious verse by Frederick Reickert; Professor W. S. Tyler treats of Constantinople, ancient and modern; Mary L. Booth gives three chapters of a translation of Madame de Gasparin's "Camille;" Motley's "Netherlands" is copiously quoted from; "The Chaplet of Pearls" is continued; Mr. Towle talks of the people and customs of Brittany; there is some very bad verse by the author of "The Schönberg-Cotta Family," and some very fair verse by Miss Josephine Pollard; and so the magazine is filled.

The Catholic World contains a learned review of Mr. Arthur Helps's biography of Las Casas—a review of a far higher character than is common in American periodical literature. Apparently the writer is using a language not his own, and his translations are particularly clumsy, but he seems to be, much more than Mr. Helps, master of the subject. Another review is a highly rhetorical essay on Doctor John Lord's "Old Roman World," which is treated with harshness. We have to commend, too, the Catholic World's lesser notices of books, which are vigorously written. It is true of them generally—that is, it has lately become true of them—that they give greater evidence of honest preparation on the part of the writers than is shown in the reviews published by any other monthly magazine except the Atlantic. Besides the long articles already mentioned, the magazine has an exposure, not in every instance made with perfect, unpartisan candor, of some of the stock falsehoods against the Romanists which have been current—more widely current once than now—among Protestant believers. "Canada Thistles" is the title of it. Then, on the other hand, there is an abusive, vicious attack on Victor Emanuel, Garibaldi, and the Italians in general for their bad behavior as regards the Roman question. Garibaldi is a filibuster, the writer thinks; the King and General Menabrea have lied recklessly, and a certain number of the European journals are following their illustrious example; every act of moderation and conciliation of the last eight years has come from the side of the Holy Father, and every provocation has come from "Piedmont"; Cavour was "the modern Machiavelli, the man of impromptu and chicane," and so on. It is quite a relief to turn from this sort of thing to the pleasant little story of Gluck, or the calm argumentation of "The Church and Her Attributes," or to Aubrey de Vere's "Abscondita," albeit that poem, with its absurdly Roman Catholic bird and its Virgin whose breath sweetened a world, and a world blind to perfumes, is a very long way from being one of the poet's best. It has, however, several verses that are pretty, and this pair characteristically subtle and forcible:

> "Of Him—Death's Conqueror—that from death > Alone would take the crown decreed."

LIGHT AND HEALTH.*

Business and sunlight in our large cities are fast becoming alienated from one another, and, as there is not room for both, the latter must yield to the ever-increasing demands of the former. We build up our stores and offices as high as the strength of materials will allow of, and, when checked in this direction, we spread out horizontally and cover the space which those who lived before us thought indispensable to healthful existence. The result of this solidifying process is that the sunlight comes to us through deep and narrow fissures called streets, and possibly down a slender, chimney-like space called a court. In this way this life-giving principle visits, almost exhausted, thousands and thousands of not poor, half-starved, and half-clad human beings, but men of at least some means and a liberal endowment of common sense. We set brain and body at work under the influence of a light which has lost most of its health-sustaining power by innumerable reflections, and then, when the sun sinks below the horizon, issue forth to seek recreation and refreshment by gas-light. Because of this constantly increasing evil, every serious effort made to impress upon the public the necessity of sunlight for health of body and mind is welcome.

The work before us is divided into four parts. In the first, which treats of the solar beam, the healthful and the morbid effects of light upon the animal and vegetable kingdoms are considered. Where it is not permitted to enter, there are disease and bodily deformities. The health-giving and beneficent influence of the sun's rays is evidenced by the ruddy faces and well developed bodies of those who live in the country and work in the open air; and the effects of their exclusion are to be seen not only in the faces of the miserable denizens of narrow streets and crowded alleys, but in the blanched, shrivelled countenances and stooping attitude, and more or less uncertain gait, of many of our business men who, judging by their years, are still in the prime of life.

Dr. Winslow refers to the experiments of Dr. W. F. Edwards on the influence of light on the structure and growth of the lower animals. Two portions of frogs' spawn were placed, one in the direct sunlight, the other in the dark. The former in due time developed, the latter not. Further, the change from the tadpole to the frog state was retarded for many days by the exclusion of light. The fact that the Proteus anguinus is found only in the grotto of the Madalena, many hundred feet below the surface of the ground, can hardly warrant the assumption that it remains in its half-reptile and half-fish condition simply because it lives in the dark, for there are many fish-like reptiles in the streams and lakes of the world which are ever open to the sun's rays; but the supposition that the blindness of this interesting animal, as well as that of the fishes of the Tyrol and Kentucky caves, arises from an arrest of development of the eyes as a result of a constant deprivation of light, will, with certain limitations, be accepted by all who advocate the Darwinian theory, though at present no animals nearly approaching these in structure are to be found in the surface waters of the above regions from which they may have been derived.

* "Light: Its Influence on Life and Health. By Forbes Winslow, M.D." New York: Moorhead, Simpson & Bond. 1868.

The author has some interesting remarks on the effect of the exclusion of light from animals and plants in deep-sea water, though we would remind the reader that the great depths which many navigators have reached, which far exceed the height of the highest mountains, must be accepted with considerable allowance. Professor W. P. Trowbridge, who was appointed by Professor Bache, of the United States Coast Survey, to make an investigation of the laws of motion of the sounding-weight and line, and used for his purpose the full reports made of the experiments conducted by Commanders Berryman and Dayman, who surveyed the route for the Atlantic Telegraph Cable, asserts that more or less uncertainty is connected with all the soundings at the depth of two thousand fathoms, and that those at still greater depths must be set down as very questionable, for it is impossible to tell when the lead strikes the bottom with such a length of line out. The authority of Professor Forbes is cited for the statement that animal life is not found in the sea below three hundred fathoms, and that plants reach to a far less depth; but, since the death of this eminent naturalist, Dr. Wallich brought up from a depth of 7,560 feet, in the North Atlantic, as many as thirteen living star-fishes, and also from a still greater depth a great variety of foraminifera (the calcareous shells of which compose chalk) in a perfectly fresh condition. This was in the summer of 1860, and about the same time some Swedish naturalists obtained, off the coast of Spitzbergen, from a depth of from 6,000 to 8,400 feet, many living worms, crustaceans, and mollusks. In the proceedings of the Academy of Science of France for the year 1861, Professor Milne-Edwards gives an account of several species of corals, worms, and mollusks which had attached themselves, at a depth of 6,000 feet or more, to the Mediterranean telegraph cable extending from Bône to Cagliari. As to plants flourishing at a greater depth than three hundred fathoms, Mr. Stimpson examined some diatoms at the time of their being dredged up by Lieutenant Brooke, at a depth of 2,700 fathoms, in the Sea of Kamtchatka, and found them living.

In this connection, the depth to which solar light is believed to penetrate the ocean is stated to be about seven hundred feet, but we cannot help but think that either it finds its way open to a much greater depth, for we know that the sea water varies in its transparency, or else the color of marine animals is in no way connected with it, for not only do many brightly-colored corals flourish far below the depth to which it is said the smallest amount of light penetrates, but the Swedish naturalists dredged crustaceans from a depth of 6,000 feet, of "brilliant colors"; and not far from the coast of Greenland mollusks of "bright red colors" have been obtained from a depth of 1,800 feet. There has been no evidence that, as Mr. Hunt declares, "everlasting darkness and eternal death" reign in the great depths of the ocean.

The second part, which is devoted to the lunar ray, begins with a reference to the opinions of the ancients respecting the influence of the moon. This luminary was believed to exercise a specific effect in the production and modification of bodily and mental diseases, and to play an important part in determining the character and destinies of people and nations. Animals and plants as well as men were also under her influence. Lord Bacon adopted the notion of the ancients so far as that the phenomena of organic life are subject to planetary control. The application of astrology to medicine originated in "actual observations of the connection between certain bodily affections and certain times and seasons." Dr. Winslow gives a long list of distinguished names in support of the doctrine of planetary influence, and states that the disposition so prevalent to discountenance this view is because of the difficulty of explaining lunar effects.

It is well known that there is a periodicity associated with the origin, progress, and type of many diseases, and the advocates of sol-lunar influence believe that this arises, directly or indirectly, from the action of the sun or moon, or of both combined, on the air. The author illustrates this part of his subject by drawing freely on the writings of Dr. Mead, who was a friend of Pope, Newton, and Halley, and of Dr. Balfour, who was a physician at Calcutta during the latter part of the last century. Dr. Mead's idea is that the heavenly bodies act on the air by increasing or diminishing its weight in the same way that the tides are produced, and so increase or decrease its value for respiration, consequently the phases of the moon are connected with certain states of disease. Many cases of hemorrhage of various kinds are cited which are believed to have been caused by changes in the specific gravity of the air through the moon's influence.

Dr. Balfour adopts Dr. Mead's views, and is convinced "that every type of fever prevalent in India is in a remarkable manner affected by the revolutions of the moon." We have not room to do justice to either of these writers; but, from the array of facts presented, we are willing to admit that the heavenly bodies do seem at times to influence disease, especially when their action on the atmosphere is so marked as to affect the barometer; yet we must make great allowance for the inhabitants of India and other countries, where all are taught from infancy to believe in lunar influence.

The third part is devoted to the question of "The Alleged Action of the Moon on the Insane;" and the fourth to the "Hygiene of Light." Exclusion from the sun, as it increases the white and diminishes the red blood-cells, produces a sickly, flabby, pale, anæmic condition of the face, enfeebles the nervous energy and vital strength, and induces organic changes in the various organs of the body. In this connection Dr. Winslow alludes to the condition of the poor in the large cities of Europe and America; to the changes for the better made in the past few years, and advocates the use of what the ancients termed solaria, or solar air-baths for children. The inestimable value of light, as an element in the treatment of disease, also receives attention.

We have thus been obliged to run rapidly over this work, which, however inconclusive it may be in some of its arguments, presents the subject in a clear and interesting manner, and will certainly have its influence in carrying on the reforms which have begun in improving the sanitary condition of all classes in large cities. We wish that the author had a better acquaintance with natural history, for then we should have from him a more correct use of its terms and a fuller illustration of his subject from this department of science; and also that he had taken a little more pains to render his book fully as suitable for the general reader as for the physician.

Recent Republications.—While "Men of the Time"* is fairly synonymous with "A Dictionary of Contemporaries," it is undoubtedly more flattering to humble but aspiring talent to be known as a man of the time than as a contemporary. We do not know the principles of selection by which the editor has been guided, except that he has not catalogued himself; but Mr. John Hollingshead, we remember, in that article on dramatic critics, in the Broadway, which occasioned so much irritation, hinted that to be placed among "Men of the Time" was the ambition and striving of certain fourth-rate intellects whom he either named or described. We have not searched for these gentlemen, but they can doubtless defend their claims to admittance along with Theodorus of Abyssinia, whose biography is given with all respectfulness as a reigning monarch. We have, of course, scanned chiefly the American names, which are generally borrowed more or less copiously and literally from the "New American Cyclopædia," though some are omitted which the latter contains, and vice versa. General Banks loses one s from his middle name, Prentiss; Mr. Bancroft, whose ninth volume of United States history is not mentioned, "is said to be one of the leading writers in the North American Review," which is scarcely true of late; General Butler's government of New Orleans is alluded to, and it is stated that "his name is in consequence held in abhorrence;" he is also "one of the bitterest opponents of President Johnson," who is said to have "prosecuted the war to a successful issue"—though it was virtually at an end before Mr. Lincoln's death—and since to have "manifested every desire to treat the conquered States with clemency." In this he is opposed by the Radicals, "whose object appears to be to crush the South." Thaddeus Stevens is "notorious for his bitter hostility to the South," in consequence of the rebel raid which burnt his forge; but his hostility to the President is not mentioned, nor is his confrère Mr. Boutwell a recognized man of the time. The English partiality to the "lost cause" appears on every occasion. General Grant is repulsed by Lee in three separate battles and baffled in strategy, and is forced to copy the peninsular campaign of General McClellan. Stonewall Jackson is the "lamented," etc. General Howard's services as head of the Freedmen's Bureau are not alluded to. Mr. Phillips "of late has become prominent as an orator and is an abolitionist." Mr. Whittier's poetical activity since 1847 is unacknowledged. Bennett's success with the Herald is noted without any judgment upon its morality. Frederick Douglass is allowed the alias of "Bailey," which will be new to most people, and is said to have established at Rochester L'Abeille (qu. A' Bailey?) du Nord, meaning probably the North Star, which afterwards became Frederick Douglass's Paper. Philadelphians will be glad to find the name of Mr. Rothermel (spelt Rothermal) among the artists; New Yorkers will miss Mr. Church. The Hon. George P. Marsh is not a man of the time; neither is Mr. Parton, but his wife is, with a duplicate alias, "Farmington."

* "Men of the Time: A Dictionary of Contemporaries, containing biographical notices of eminent characters of both sexes." Seventh edition, revised and brought down to the present time. London and New York: Geo. Routledge & Sons. 1868.

Mr. Grant White is overlooked. So, returning to England, are James Greenwood, the "Lambeth Casual," and Philip Gilbert Hamerton. Mr. Edward Dicey is named, but not his distinguished brother-in-law, M. Auguste Laugel. M. Henri Taine is omitted. The Hon. Mr. Stansfeld's ability and the public esteem for him irrespective of party would never be guessed from the paragraph devoted to him.

But we would not deny all value to this dictionary. With due reserves as to its accuracy and impartiality, it is certain to be useful for reference, and we dare say improves with each fresh edition.

We have already expressed our liking for the edition represented by the volume before us.* It is an edition of Bulwer, complete as regards the works included in it, cheap in price, handsome enough, so far as concerns binding, for any one who is satisfied with books bound in cloth, printed in large type, and, as we have said before, combining the qualities of portability, legibility, cheapness, and beauty, better by far than any other of the numerous editions of popular authors which are now so much in fashion. So much in praise. In dispraise it is necessary to say that the paper is a little too thin, and that there seems to be a fault in the ink, which, for some reason or other, is not perfectly absorbed by the paper, but, while the books are new at any rate, can be made, by a little rubbing, to soil the page. Still, we are able to say that the "Globe Edition" is the best Bulwer, at the price, of which we have any knowledge, and that nine novel-reading book-buyers in ten will buy half a dozen worse made American books before they will buy one better or two as good.

The American Beaver and his Works. By Lewis H. Morgan, author of "The League of the Iroquois." Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. 1868.—Any one who looks into the literature of zoölogy cannot but be struck with the fact that so much of it pertains to technical descriptions and classification, and so little to the study of the habits of animals. This seems all the more strange, since the former are uninteresting and tiresome to the last degree except to professed naturalists, and we cannot but think they must often be so even to them, while the latter have a charm which the very dullest cannot resist. If we would study the relations of animals to each other and to man, we certainly ought to take into consideration their physiological and psychical phenomena, as well as their exterior form and structure. Up to the present time, however, it has been one of the leading faults of naturalists to overlook the former. As one reads Mr. Morgan's book, he cannot withhold his astonishment that, since the days of Hearne in the last century, to whom we are indebted for nearly all that was known of the beaver, no one has appeared to make a full and careful study of the modes of life of this most remarkable animal. Mr. Morgan, with a zeal and patience worthy of Reaumer, the Hubers, or of Darwin, has re-examined the whole subject and largely increased our knowledge. The scene of his labors was chiefly in the immense tracts of forests on the southerly side of Lake Superior, where the beaver still exists in large numbers and constructs his peculiar works on a very extended scale. The subjects treated of—their anatomical structure, their dams, lodges, mode of cutting wood and of laying up supplies for the winter, their wary nature, their gradual extension over immense areas by migration along the rivers, their mode of reproduction, the method of trapping, etc.—can only be mentioned. We must, however, say a few words about dams and canals. The descriptions of the first are especially complete and are based on the actual surveys of more than fifty, extending over an area of as many square miles, and all carefully mapped. Finding every attempt to represent them by drawings unsatisfactory, the author had recourse to photography, and, after great labor in clearing away trees and other obstructions, has been able to present to us exact figures of these wonderful works. We can form an idea of the magnitude of some of them from the fact that a dam in one of the tributaries of the Carp River is four hundred and eighty feet long, and backs up water which covers an area of twenty-five acres. On one of the small streams flowing into the Esconnauba are three dams, one of which measures three hundred and eighty-five, and another five hundred and eighty-one feet in length. A dam at Grass Lake, on a transverse section, shows a height of little more than six feet, a base of eighteen feet, a water face of seven, and lower face of thirteen feet. The materials are pieces of wood from one to three inches in diameter, and from three to ten feet long; the interstices on the water side are filled with mud so as to form a solid structure, but the upper portion allows of percolation. In some cases, however, a "solid-bank dam" is made by filling in with mud on both sides; but as the flow of water over the crest would soon wash out the earth on the lower face, a sluice-way is left in the middle of sufficient size to discharge all the surplus. Contrary to the usual assertion, a fallen tree very rarely enters into the composition of a dam. Out of fifty-one, Mr. Morgan found only a single instance in which such was the case, and in that the tree had fallen from its own decay, and not before the teeth of the beaver. In that case, too, the sticks were all deposited below and not above the tree, a mode of construction which looks as if the engineering were unskilful. In connection with this we might advert to another assertion, often much insisted upon, viz.: that the beaver builds his dam with a convexity against the current, thereby increasing its strength; though frequent, this is by no means always the case. In a series of thirteen dams on the Carp River, all had their convexity downwards, while in others elsewhere the middle part was convex upwards, and the lateral portions were reversed; consequently had not the forms giving the greatest strength. Those who believe in the infallibility of instinct will do well to consider these facts. The most novel of Mr. Morgan's observations relate to the system of canals. We have not seen these noticed by previous writers, though the Indians and trappers, according to Mr. Morgan, have recognized their true nature. The former call them o-de-na-o-nane—literally, "made channel to travel in." They are excavations, the earth of which is often thrown out on the sides, and all the roots encountered give the usual signs of having been gnawed off by the beaver. On one of the plates is the plan of a canal four hundred and fifty feet long and from three to four wide, and on another that of a main canal one hundred and fifty feet long, with two branches, one measuring one hundred and the other one hundred and fifteen feet. These are just what their names indicate, and are used as passage-ways between the ponds and their wood-lots, along which they float the sticks of yellow birch, willow, poplar, etc., which have been cut for food or for the construction of their dams and lodges. In the concluding chapter, on "animal psychology," Mr. Morgan claims a wider range for the intelligence of animals than the metaphysicians are wont to allow. These last have taken far more pains to establish differences than to detect resemblances between the psychical phenomena of man and the lower order of beings. It certainly seems more philosophical to adopt the opposite method, and consider the acts of animals resembling those of intelligence as the results of intelligent action until they can be proved otherwise. Mr. Morgan, in accordance with this mode of viewing them, and with no fear of detracting from the "dignity of human nature," admits for brutes—or, as he more considerately calls them, mutes—the endowments of will, memory, and judgment, and that by the exercise of these faculties the beaver is enabled to construct his canals, his dams, and his lodges. In fact, it is only by adopting such a view that it becomes possible to explain the adaptation of their acts to varying circumstances, so that in some cases they construct partially submerged houses, while in others, where the conditions are different, they substitute for them burrows in the banks of the rivers; or for thoroughfares construct canals in the low and swampy lands of the regions of Lake Superior, but substitute for these, on the dry and abrupt banks of the Upper Missouri, their well-known "slides." When comparative psychology shall have made equal progress with comparative anatomy and physiology, the true limitations of instinct and intelligence will no doubt be reached, and we cannot but believe that the domain of the latter will be largely extended over that now assigned to the former. Mr. Morgan presents his subject in simple language, free from technicality, and in a manner which can hardly fail to attract all classes of readers. He writes cautiously, with an earnest desire to elicit truth and eliminate error, and has stated nothing which has not been verified by personal observation or the testimony of trustworthy witnesses. He has made himself acquainted with the habits of the beaver not only in the vast areas of trackless forests on the borders of Lake Superior, but on the upper waters of the Missouri, and in the equally inhospitable regions of Hudson's Bay Territory. He is justly entitled to an honorable place in the higher ranks of original observers.

A Manual of Inorganic Chemistry. By Charles W. Eliot and Frank H. Storer. Second Edition. (New York: Ivison, Phinney, Blakeman & Co. 1868.)—We are not surprised that this work has so soon reached its second edition, for it is so vastly superior to all American text-books on chemistry that teachers cannot hesitate about using it. It is, we are glad to say, what it pretends to be, a manual of inorganic chemistry, and not an attempt to furnish information in regard to all the natural sciences, with a few pages on chemistry as a supplement. Each subject is clearly presented with a sufficiency of details and experiments, and the recent changes in chemical formulæ are explained and adopted. The type and paper do credit to the publishers.

* "Harold, the Last of the Saxon Kings. By Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton, Bart." Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. "Globe Edition."

The Nation.

VOL. VI.—NO. 140. THURSDAY, MARCH 5, 1868. { FIVE DOLLARS PER ANNUM. TWELVE CENTS PER COPY.

CONTENTS.

THE WEEK..... 181

EDITORIAL ARTICLES:
The Impeachment Prospect..... 184
The Duty of the Bondholders..... 185
How may the President Test the Validity of a Law?..... 186
Inflation and the West..... 187

Why is Single Life Becoming more General?..... 190

England..... 192

CORRESPONDENCE:
The President's Trial..... 193

NOTES:
Literary..... 193

With the French in Mexico.—The Great Exhibition.—A French Country Family.—Waverley Novels: Waverley.—Das moderne Völkerrecht der civilisirten Staaten.. 196–197

Five Dollars per annum, in advance; Six months, Three Dollars; Forty Dollars to Clubs of Ten; Clergymen, Four Dollars.

THE NATION is sent till positively ordered discontinued, and all arrears have been paid. Subscribers are particularly requested to note the expiration of their subscriptions, and to forward what is due for the ensuing year, with or without further reminder from this office.

GEORGE STREET, 30 CORNHILL, LONDON, E. C., AGENT FOR THE RECEIPT OF SUBSCRIPTIONS AND ADVERTISEMENTS.

E. L. GODKIN & CO., PUBLISHERS, Box 6732, NEW YORK CITY.

The Week.

IMPEACHMENT and the subject of appropriations have occupied most of the attention of Congress this week. On the 26th of February, the Select Committee of seven Senators reported a resolution, at once adopted, to the effect that the Senate would take order in the matter. Then Mr. Saulsbury read his speech on reconstruction. In the House on the same day, the Senate substitute for the House Supplementary Reconstruction bill was passed and goes to the President, who will have an opportunity to veto it before his trial begins. The House authorized the Secretary of War to give the Lincoln Monument Association enough captured ordnance to cast the proposed statue, but first the association must raise $100,000 for the monument. On Thursday the Senate did nothing of general interest. The Speaker of the House surprised all the members, and frightened several of them, and surprised the country in general, by reading a letter, meant not to be publicly read, in which Police Superintendent Kennedy stated that five cans of nitro-glycerine had been fraudulently procured in this city and could not be traced, and hinting that they might be intended for use against Congress. The House took no action on the letter. On Friday, in the Senate, Mr. Howard, of the Select Committee on Impeachment, reported a set of rules for the government of the Senate during the trial. Fitz-John Porter's case was discussed. The West Point Academy was abused; but the bill making appropriations for it was of course passed. In the House, Mr. Schenck, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported verbally what progress had been made in the revision of the tax law. The committee, he said, would favor the removal of the special tax on all manufactures but five or six; as regards the income tax, they had come to no decision. Saturday, in the Senate, Mr. Garret Davis, in a long speech, advised the Senate to confess, through the Select Committee on Impeachment, that it was a fractional Senate only and incompetent to try a President—"elected by the whole country," Mr. Davis did not add. The Senate declined to accede to Mr. Davis's motion, and proceeded to consider separately its various rules for governing the trial. The House discussed its articles of impeachment. On Monday the debate continued. Mr. Butler tried to add an article charging the President with the gist of his "swinging round the circle" speeches. The House refused. He tried again on Tuesday, and succeeded. Mr. Stevens wanted an amendment, charging Mr. Johnson with intent to violate the Tenure of Office Act, and supported it in a speech of a kind which the House once regarded more than it now does; the amendment was shelved, for the House at four o'clock in the afternoon rose as Committee of the Whole, cutting off amendments not acted on, and as a House voted on the articles, adopting them by a party vote—General Cary, of Ohio, and Mr. Stewart, of this State, who voted No, being hardly Republicans. On Tuesday Mr. Bingham got a new article added. It alleges those disrespectful speeches of the President's which were made later than those brought up by Mr. Butler.

It cannot be said, as far as our observation extends, that impeachment has grown in favor with the public during the past week. In fact, the attitude of the public all along has been one of resignation rather than eagerness. The enthusiasm about it has been confined very much to the "original impeachers" in Congress and to those newspapers whose normal condition is one of enthusiasm; even these, however, have not been as excited as they have seemed. Owing to their habits of never keeping any emotion in reserve, they are obliged to go through extraordinary contortions in order to attract any notice on occasions which they really mean to be solemn. The prevailing feeling now, we think, is, it is safe to say, one of willingness to have Mr. Johnson got out of the way, by means of a fair and impartial trial, but of equal willingness to consign the Republican party to destruction in case the attempt to convict fails. That the Senate will not be at all influenced by policy, it is, of course, impossible to expect, because it is primarily a legislative body, and is composed of men; but that the trial will be as fair as it is possible for such a trial to be, under all the circumstances, we have not the least doubt. There are at least two good lawyers and cool heads amongst the managers, Mr. Wilson, of Iowa, and Mr. Bingham. We say this of the latter in spite of his rhetoric, which seems to be rather a functional than an organic disease.

The articles of impeachment have been adopted by the House substantially as they have been published. The retention of the charge of trying to induce General Emory to violate the law will, we think, be regretted by everybody who desires the proceedings to have moral as well as legal effect. General Butler has also succeeded in adding an article covering Mr. Johnson's bad language. The most remarkable feature in the debate on the articles was Mr. Stevens's speech, which he read from the clerk's desk. Nothing can be finer than the old man's pluck, and none can admire it more than we do; but that does not prevent his speeches being painful reading to those who believe that speeches on such occasions as this ought to be truthful and reasonable. It ought not to make much difference what a gentleman says who tells us, in his old age, that "never was a great malefactor so gently treated as Andrew Johnson;" that "his corruption of the voters of the nation, by seducing them with offers of office and intimidating them by threats of expulsion," was "a crime more heinous than that which brought many ancients to the block," and to which "he was prompted by the same motives which made the angels fall." If this were not rant it would excite indignation, when one considers that the gentleman who thus denounces the use of patronage to secure votes is an old Pennsylvania politician, who has witnessed in every election for the last forty years this very exercise of power which so shocks him in Andrew Johnson, and who is speaking for a party which, thus far, has shown no disposition to seize the opportunity now offered it of putting an end to these scandals by reforming the civil service. How many of those who are so sickened by Mr. Johnson's abuse of the appointing power, and are affected by the consideration that "similar behavior brought many ancients to the block," voted for Mr. Jenckes's Civil Service bill? There 's the rub. When we ask for reforms we get rhetoric and classical "lore." If the Republican party hold the Federal patronage at the next Presidential election, are they prepared to abstain from the use of it for party purposes, or do they only object to it when it is used against them?

The points on which Mr. Johnson is doubtless going to rely are, first, that he has not violated the law, inasmuch as the act deprives him of the power of removing only those whom he has himself appointed; and secondly, that if he has violated it, he has not done so with guilty intent. The act says:

"Provided, That the Secretaries of State, of the Treasury, of War, of the Navy, and of the Interior, the Postmaster-General and the Attorney-General, shall hold their offices, respectively, for and during the term of the President by whom they may have been appointed, and for one month thereafter, subject to removal by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

Mr. Johnson's argument, based on this, is, that Mr. Stanton having been appointed by his (Mr. Johnson's) "immediate predecessor," the act does not cover his case. The point, we presume, might and will be raised, whether Mr. Lincoln was Mr. Johnson's immediate predecessor in a legal sense, or whether Mr. Johnson is not rather Mr. Lincoln's substitute, filling not a fresh term, but the term Mr. Lincoln was to have filled. But there is no question that the point is a strong one and makes a good deal of impression, at least on laymen.

The debate in the Senate on the rules of procedure was concluded in the best possible spirit—was calm, considerate, and contained abundant evidence of a desire to do justice. The rules give the defendant every needful advantage. In the choice of managers in the House, Mr. Stevens received fewer, and Mr. Bingham more, votes than anybody. What Mr. Stevens will supply except hatred of the President it is hard to see, as his peculiar style of thought and oratory is not of much use before a court of law. General Butler—"the apostle John of salvation by impeachment," as the New York Tribune elegantly calls him—has been added to the list for the sake of his sharpness and experience as a criminal lawyer, but we venture to say that this is a mistake. The object of impeachment, as far as the Republican party is concerned, is not simply to convict, but to secure public respect for the conviction; and we take the liberty of doubting whether General Butler's share in the proceedings will increase the moral weight of the result should it be adverse to the President.

The new State Constitution of New York has at last been presented to the people by the Convention. Its most striking peculiarity is that it takes a step backward, and will, we believe, be the first attempt to stem the democratic tide which began to flow so strongly thirty years ago, and has since swept away so many ancient landmarks. The principle on which most of the constitutions of that period were drawn up was, that "whatever is is wrong," and they made such a thorough upturning that it seems as if it was only by accident they omitted to impose on horses the obligation of keeping their tails in their mangers. In the late Convention the à priori plan was to a great extent thrown overboard, and human experience called into service, and the result has been considerable improvement. The changes made are not great—much smaller, both in number and magnitude, than, we have reason to believe, the best men of the Convention would have desired—but they are as great and as numerous as the existing condition of the public mind will permit. The judiciary system is somewhat improved, and provision made for much greater improvement in it, five years hence, by popular vote. The State retains possession of the city of New York, which some of the new lights wanted to erect into an independent Alsatia. Many minor changes for the better are made, and the whole, which we hope to discuss more fully next week, shows that expediency and reason have still some influence on politics, even in New York.

The Florida Convention has at last composed its differences and adopted a constitution. The Louisiana constitution is also engrossed and signed, and those two States, with North Carolina and Arkansas, will very soon be voting on the ratification. North Carolina appears to be in a more healthy frame of mind than any of the other States lately in rebellion, and it will not be surprising if she is first into the Union. W. W. Holden, it is almost certain, will be elected as the next governor, though a stronger candidate might, no doubt, have been found. He will make the canvass as "a member of the Republican party." It is said that Mr. J. H. Harris, a colored man, was offered a Congressional nomination, but declined it, alleging the injudiciousness of sending up any but white representatives. Mr. Harris—a conscientious, clever, and modest man, possessing the political sense, too—may very likely have thus declined office, but, as a matter of fact, under the Constitution no colored man can go to Congress for some years. Georgia and Virginia are still in the full tide of debate. Georgia has changed her capital from Milledgeville to Atlanta, and gets on with reconstruction rather more slowly than any other State. South Carolina has just ordained a school system modelled after that of New England, which New Englanders have been, for six or seven years, assiduously teaching to South Carolinians. Mississippi has got as far as finishing her Bill of Rights. From Texas, we hear that the election for a convention has taken place, and that the vote is probably favorable.

The whirligig of time brings round its revenges in Wall Street as well as in other more favored localities. A few years ago the New York Gold Exchange was almost universally spoken of as the "Coal Hole." Gold brokers and the dealers in gold were stigmatized as "Jew moneychangers," "rebels," and "foreign traitors;" and every fluctuation in the price—especially if upward—was attributed to the machinations of these heartless speculators in the nation's misfortunes. No term of abuse was sufficiently expressive of the contempt and disgust with which these vile creatures were regarded by the community at large; and Congress—staid, sober, gentle Congress—stepped aside from less important duties to prohibit by terrible penalties all dealings in gold, thinking to stay the tide of human nature by its threats. That was but a few years ago. Yet during the week just passed no less than four of the leading journals of this city, and Congressmen and Senators of various degrees, have referred to the gold market as that "never-failing barometer of public opinion," and have been striving, with more or less success, to prove that the course of the gold premium is an endorsement of their particular views. The anti-impeachers point to the rise of gold from 141 to 144 as proving how unpopular impeachment is. Those in favor of impeachment point to the fall of gold from 144 to 141 to prove that impeachment, once decided upon, is looked upon as a measure of peace. Just now it is said that, so soon as the President is actually brought to trial, gold will fall five per cent.; and again, that if he is brought to trial it will rise.

We have spoken several times of the movement commenced in France by the Minister of Public Instruction, M. Duruy, for the higher education of women, and of the opposition offered to it by M. Dupanloup, the Bishop of Orleans, who is also in favor of the higher education of women as he understands it, but holds that it ought to be conducted or superintended by priests. The storm the affair has raised has been so great that it has reached Rome, and the Pope has intervened. He has discharged an epistle at the heads of the innovators, which certainly ought to bring them to reason. Our readers already know how Pius IX. lights up any subject he touches, and they will therefore be interested to hear what he thinks of the practice on the part of young ladies of attending college to hear lectures. He says that "these writers" (i. e., all writers who do not write under ecclesiastical supervision) "have hitherto confined themselves to corrupting education, insidious alterations of history, exciting wicked passions," and carrying on "all the manœuvres of a shameless impiety" amongst the young men. It appears, however, that the rascals have become disgusted with the slowness with which they approach the end they have in view, which, we are sorry to hear from such good authority as the Pope, is nothing less than "the ruin of religion and authority." In order to hasten their impious work they have now turned their attention to "females," and are seeking, by courses of lectures, and other "manœuvres of a shameless impiety," "to deprive her of her native modesty, to exhibit her in public, to turn her aside from domestic life and its duties, and to puff her up with false and vain knowledge." His Holiness says, moreover, that "if she was properly and religiously brought up, she would be like a pure and brilliant light in the house, the glory of her husband, and the edification of her family;" but that now, under the new system, "she will be full of pride and arrogance, she will disdain the cares and duties that are proper for women, will be a germ of division in the household, and will pervert her children," and what he thinks "profoundly deplorable" is that "those who are entrusted with public duties (M. Duruy) favor the schemes of impiety by strange and unheard-of projects." The friends of the "higher education of women" being thus found out and exposed, their powers of mischief will no doubt be considerably diminished. Take him for all in all, there is nobody like the Pope for laying bare the real designs of bad people. We wish he could be employed at the impeachment trial to deal with Andrew Johnson's case.

The French press bill has been steadily debated during the last two or three weeks in the French Corps Législatif, and the debate has been most interesting. The Government insists upon it that the bill is a liberal measure, and a real carrying out of the promises made by the Emperor a year ago, inasmuch as it abolishes the arbitrary power of the Executive in matters pertaining to the newspapers. It enables anybody who chooses to establish a newspaper, without having, as heretofore, to secure the permission of the minister—permission which, in practice, was never granted to any but Government favorites. It abolishes also the power of suspension after three warnings, and makes all press offences triable and punishable by the courts only—the very thing for which the Liberals have been clamoring for the last fifteen years. To which the Liberals reply: It is true you transfer press offences to the courts, but you do it in such a way as to make your concession a mere sham. You do not accord a trial by jury, as in England or America; and you do not even make press offences triable by the judges of the higher courts, though even to this Englishmen and Americans would never submit. You hand them over to the jurisdiction of the "correctional police," the judges of which are young men, the lowest in the judicial hierarchy, poorly paid, without learning or experience, and dependent on Government favor for promotion to higher posts, and who are never known to acquit a writer accused of a breach of the law. Moreover, you give them the power of inflicting fines which, in nine cases out of ten, would be ruinous; and, worse than all, you give them the power, in addition to the fine, of depriving persons convicted by them of all civil and political rights for five years after sentence. To this last penalty, which was made more monstrous by the fact that the Government reserves also the right of prosecution any time within three years after the commission of the alleged offence, the Liberals, led by Jules Favre, offered a vigorous resistance, alleging, and doubtless with truth, that it would be constantly used to drive opposition candidates at elections out of the field, by fishing out, just before election, old articles written by them, and giving the judges a hint to convict. Jules Favre's eloquence brought the opposition vote up to 59, the highest figure it has ever reached, but it was, of course, in vain; the majority was 158. Another section of the law which produced very general indignation was one aimed specially at the Orleans princes, forbidding "exiles" to print or publish in France. It was met by some unpleasant extracts from the works of his present Majesty, depicting the horrors of exile, and by recalling the fact that when he was himself a political prisoner his book on artillery was published in Paris under the patronage and responsibility of the Orleans princes themselves. A more effective retort still was drawn from a conversation which Napoleon I. had with Benjamin Constant during the Hundred Days, when, being in a very penitential mood, he expressed considerable admiration for liberty in general, and for the liberty of the press in particular.

The discussion of the bill has, of course, led to a good deal of discussion of the condition of the French judiciary also, which it seems to be generally agreed is rather low, much inferior, at all events, to that of the bar. The judges are not chosen, as in this country and in England, from amongst the practising lawyers. Judging is a profession in itself, into the lower grades of which a man enters when young, with just such knowledge of law as he gets in college, and rises step by step, the rapidity of his promotion, of course, depending on the satisfaction he gives the Government; so that he cannot be said to be independent till he reaches the highest rank, but by that time the habit of subserviency is apt to have grown too strong to be shaken off. The great traditions of the French forum are, however, faithfully upheld by the bar, which in refinement, in honor, in culture, in esprit de corps, and professional pride perhaps now stands higher than that of any other country. The English bar has fallen far below it, and in most of our States the idea that the bar is a profession in the high sense of word, and in fact anything but one of the many means of making money amongst which young men have to choose on entering on life, is rapidly declining. The elective judiciary bids fair to destroy it utterly before long.

The threatened or promised French loan has not yet been submitted to the Legislature, and the cause of the delay has not been fully explained. In the meantime, some astounding facts are being brought to light—the exact nature of the financial status which the Empire has created, and consequently of the magnitude of the trouble unseen by the world at large, with which M. Fould, in the latter years of his career, had such a hard struggle. The revelations on this point are something positively alarming. During the last sixteen years, the departments, cities, and communes, the latter answering to our towns, have borrowed and spent $403,300,000. Besides this, the Government has borrowed, for war and peace purposes, about $1,000,000,000 during the same period, and this does not include various scattering debts, contracted for special works of improvement. During the Empire, therefore, about $1,500,000,000 have been added to the public debt of France, although the population has not increased; and, at the very moment when these facts are becoming plain, another large loan for war purposes is about to be put on the market, and heavy drafts, heavier than ever before since the wars of the Empire, are about to be made on the labor of the country for military purposes. There can be no question that France is receiving a good political education, but it is costing frightfully.

General Menabrea is having a troublous time at the head of the Italian ministry, in the discussion of the budget of 1868. The opposition are too strong for him, but are not prevented by their inability to form a ministry that would take his place from incessantly harassing him. Count Cambray Digny, who has hitherto had little reputation except that of a fine gentleman, is, however, turning out a better financier than was expected, and finances are looking better, he confesses, than he himself expected. The opposition are making a strong effort to have the abolition of the legal-tender paper—or, rather, the withdrawal of the legal-tender character from the paper money—made part of his policy. The Italians, strange as it may seem to Western men, are disgusted with this kind of currency, and want no more of it, and want to get rid of what they have got and go back to a gold basis by a short cut. There are rumors, too, that the opposition want to cut down the interest on the public debt from five to three per cent.; but the ablest men in its ranks, Ratazzi included, are opposed to anything like a breach of faith with the public creditors, one of their reasons being that they do not want to see Italy reduced to the same level as Spain. If they wait a while, perhaps they may have the United States to keep them company in their degradation. We presume, however, that if the Italians cheat their creditors, they will have the decency not to prate about "the people's will," or call their unfortunate creditors usurers, or endeavor to find excuse for their cheating in "the letter of the law."

Articles on any of the subjects usually discussed in this journal will be received from any quarter. If used, they will be liberally paid for; if rejected, they will be returned to the writers on the receipt of the requisite amount of postage stamps.

All Communications which pertain to the literary management of THE NATION should be addressed to the Editor.

THE IMPEACHMENT PROSPECT.

THE articles of impeachment have been adopted by the House of Representatives in the shape in which the public has seen them in the newspapers. The charges are, stripped of legal verbiage, that Mr. Johnson has been guilty of a high crime and misdemeanor in attempting to remove Mr. Stanton from the War Department and appointing General Thomas to take his place as Secretary ad interim, and in attempting "to induce General Emory, in his official capacity as commander of the Department of Washington, to violate the provision of the Act of March 2, 1867," which directs that all military orders of the President and Secretary of War shall pass through the General of the army. It is but right to say that there is not in General Emory's evidence telling what passed between him and the President a particle of foundation for this allegation. So far as appears from the conversation between them, Mr. Johnson's object in sending for General Emory was to ascertain from him what, if any, changes had been made in the disposition of the troops belonging to the Department of Washington. General Emory told him there had been no recent changes; that if there had been, he would, under the provisions of the Act of March 2, be sure to have known of them. Mr. Johnson then asked for an explanation on this point, about which he did not seem to be very clear, received it, expressed his opinion that the statute was unconstitutional, and that "its object was very evident," and General Emory then took his leave. The general denied, before the committee, in answer to a direct question, that, "to the best of his recollection, one word had been said," by way of enquiry, whether "he would obey an order if it was sent to him without going through the headquarters of the General of the army." Under these circumstances, the object of drawing up the article containing the charge does not appear very clear, and only makes more apparent, what has been long apparent enough, that the leading impeachers are blessed with more zeal than discretion.

We must not be told, when we say this, that we are "injuring the cause." "The cause" has in no way received so much damage as from attempts to serve it without rhyme or reason. If the public were utterly stupid or ignorant, the course in which some of the impeachers most delight would be very successful; but it is neither one nor the other. It is an exceedingly intelligent and acute public, and has never been in the least degree lifted off its feet by this matter of impeachment. We have not the slightest doubt that if testimony could be taken on the subject, it would be found that the enthusiasm about Mr. Johnson's trial, and the accession of "glorious Ben Wade" to the Presidential chair, is confined very much to the Reconstruction Committee and the Washington correspondents of the newspapers. All attempts to create any excitement about it, and a good many have been made, have failed utterly. The attitude of the great body of the people at this moment is, we venture to assert, one of calm, and perhaps somewhat critical, observation. They are perfectly willing that Mr. Johnson should be tried, and, if a good case can be made out against him, that he should be removed; and nine-tenths of them, we think, will be heartily glad if he is removed. But then they are not enamored of the process. They do not expect impeachment "to open up a new era," or regenerate the nation, or anything of that sort. Therefore it is highly desirable that the impeachers should proceed very carefully, and should show in all their doings that they have their wits about them. It is all the more desirable because the country had not, before these proceedings commenced, very much confidence in them. They have spent a year collecting testimony against Mr. Johnson already, and kept assuring the world, in the most solemn way, all the while, that they were bringing to light the most horrible facts about him, which for the time it would not do to make public, we presume, lest he should run away. We waited patiently, holding our breath as well as we could, while General Butler and Mr. Boutwell threw out dark hints about assassination, adultery, peculation, and what not; and the country can hardly be blamed if it was not exactly impressed with the wisdom—we shall say nothing about the integrity—of these gentlemen, when it turned out that they had no legal proof for their charges at all; and that their dark hints were simply clumsy rhetorical devices, intended to give a little spice to discourses that would otherwise have been flat, stale, and unprofitable.

We were in hope that this experience would not have been thrown away on them, and that when they approached impeachment again they would approach it carefully and with caution. We were a good deal surprised, therefore, that the Emory charge was not struck out in the House. The mere insertion of it on such evidence tends to shake public confidence in those who have charge of the prosecution, leads people to doubt their judgment, doubt their wisdom, and doubt even their honesty. As Dr. Johnson said to Boswell, on one occasion, during the journey in the Hebrides, when the latter had been guilty simply of a harmless display of zeal, the great reason why things of this sort are objectionable is, that one can never tell what those who do them will do next.

The charges arising out of the violation of the Tenure of Office Act will doubtless be met by a denial of criminal intent, as well as of any breach of the law whatever. In other words, Mr. Johnson will say that, under the statute, he has the power to remove Mr. Stanton, and that, whether he has or not, his only object in removing him was simply to test the constitutionality of the law. The first of these points will be decided by strict legal rules of construction; in the decision of the second, of course, the question of character will come up. Mr. Johnson's previous relations with Congress, and his language and demeanor towards it, must be taken into account in forming an opinion as to his object in resisting one of its acts. A President whose antecedents were even fair, and whose honesty and sagacity were not generally doubted, would never be impeached for disobeying a law simply for the purpose of bringing it before the courts, because, as we have endeavored to show elsewhere, the validity of many laws, and this Tenure of Office Act in particular, would never be tested at all unless the President violated them. A President who commanded even an ordinary amount of public respect would undoubtedly be permitted to violate a law for this purpose, if he took care that the public service did not suffer by his action. But his claim to immunity on this ground could not rest on his assertion alone. His character and history would have to be taken into account before any conclusion could be reached about it.

The position of the Senate is undoubtedly an exceedingly difficult one; the most difficult one, perhaps, that ever fell to the lot of a legislative body. In the first place, impeachment is a party question. It is by a party vote that the President has been arraigned, and it will be by a party vote that he will be convicted, if he is convicted. The two-thirds who condemn him will be the two-thirds who have been fighting him for two years in the political arena; and the offence for which he is to be tried was committed in defence of doctrines which, whether they be bad or good, are held by a very large proportion of the Northern people. It will, therefore, be impossible to give the proceedings the air of a criminal trial, and the Senate, in acting as a court, will not enjoy the advantage which courts usually do, of having its fairness and impartiality presumed. On the contrary, the circumstances of the case raise a presumption of partiality, which it will have to upset by its manner of conducting the case. The appeals and warnings and expressions of confidence addressed to it, with which the newspapers are filled, are in reality indications of misgiving, and addressed to any other court would be almost insulting.

We, for our part, are fully satisfied that in all matters of law the Senate will follow the lead of its best lawyers, and in all matters of principle the lead of its best men. But, then, it would be more than human if it discharged its duty satisfactorily; and in this fact—the fact that, do what you will, you cannot give the proceeding much moral effect—lies the strongest objection to impeachment. We confess we look for none from it. We shall be heartily glad to see Mr. Johnson relegated to private life if he should be convicted, but that his fate will furnish either a warning or an example to his successors we do not in the least believe. To say the Senate will treat Mr. Johnson's case purely as one of law, and will in no degree allow policy to influence their decision, is what few will believe. In the first place, the Senate is composed of men, and most of them have for two years been Mr. Johnson's political enemies. In the next place, they are not all agreed by any means as to the nature of impeachment. Some think it a purely judicial proceeding, which should only be instituted for the punishment of indictable offences. Others, again—and we believe the larger number—are of the opinion that it is an allowable means of getting rid of an executive officer whose administration the majority believe to be injurious to the public welfare. As long as there is a division of opinion on such a vital point as this, of course there is little chance that policy will in no degree affect the decision. There is one other consideration, too, more powerful than any, and that is, that Mr. Johnson's acquittal will be the death of the Republican party. Why it will be so, it would be easy to explain; but that it will be so, very few will deny. The fear of this has, in fact, always been the strongest motive with some of the ablest and most intelligent members of the party for fighting against the process. The consequences of the complete and final downfall of the party would, of course, be so tremendous, so disastrous from the Republican point of view, to all good causes, that it is impossible to expect senators to be entirely indifferent to them. We doubt if even Aulus Fulvius himself would find it easy to say "not guilty" with such a prospect before him.

THE DUTY OF THE BONDHOLDERS.

Mr. Sherman's now pending bill, in support of which he has just made an elaborate speech in the Senate, is substantially the issue of a new five per cent. loan, into which the holders of five-twenty bonds are to be at liberty to convert the bonds they now hold, and which pay them six per cent.; that is to say, the privilege is offered them of taking one per cent. less interest than they now receive on precisely the same kind of security. Now, why should any holder of a five-twenty bond accept this offer? Would he in this way get any better guarantee for the final payment of the principal in coin than he now holds? Not at all; his present security is the national sense of honor; the proposed substitute would be just the same thing. Would the insertion of the words "payable principal and interest in coin" in the new bonds make them any better than the old ones, which do not contain these words? Not in the least. There is no court in which the United States can be sued on its promises to pay; and those who now deny that the five-twenties are payable in coin do not deny that it was generally meant and understood that they would be paid in coin at the time they were issued, and do not assert that mention of coin was omitted in certain bonds in order to protect the Government against liability to pay in coin. What they say is, that it is inconvenient for the debtors to pay. They do not dispute the moral force of the bargain, and do not assert that a bargain between a nation and its creditors has, or can have, any other than moral force. They simply say that, right or wrong, they won't stick to the bargain. Now, when dealing with people who test the validity of their agreements not by what they said or understood when making them, but by the convenience or inconvenience of fulfilling them, the wording of the agreement, in the absence of a tribunal to which the construction of the instrument can be referred, and which has power to enforce its decrees, is of no sort of consequence. A ten-forty bond, with the word "coin" emanating from such a source, is worth exactly the same amount as a five-twenty bond which makes no mention of coin. The argument ab inconvenienti, which is the only argument our repudiators use, is just as applicable to one species of security as the other. We hope, therefore, nobody will be deluded by the idea that, by exchanging his present bonds for Mr. Sherman's new bonds, he gains anything in security. Against the doctrines which have prompted this conversion no pledge is of any value. If the bondholders are forced into making it, they will have no guarantee whatever against the introduction of a bill next year making their interest or principal, or both, payable in currency, and issuing fresh currency for the purpose. The same excuse which is now offered for the crusade against the public creditors can be supplied just as readily then. The taxes will be nearly as heavy under ten-forty five per cent. bonds as under five-twenty six per cent. bonds; the holders will seem to have made almost as good a bargain with the Government when they made the loan; money will be just as "scarce" at the West; there will probably be droughts in various parts of the country and heavy rains in others, and there will, we may rely on it, be plenty of unscrupulous politicians ready to bring up and support any scheme, however detestable, which promises to secure them the support of the ignorant and unscrupulous or unreflecting.

Senator Sherman says that his bill is not a "threat." We can very well believe it, coming from him. We have no doubt it is an honest attempt to save the bondholders from total loss. He says, in substance: "Here is something which is not what was promised you, but which is nearly as good, and which we, the chiefs of the Republican party, advise you to accept, inasmuch as we may be compelled, by the growing feeling of hostility to you in the West, to sacrifice you altogether unless you make some compromise at once." This advice would, doubtless, be worth attending to if what he offered were really a compromise. But it is not. To compromise in cases of this kind means "to settle by mutual concession." But here the concessions are not mutual. The public creditors are asked to concede a good deal; the Government offers to concede nothing whatever. It does not undertake to put the bondholders out of the reach of those who are now assailing them; they would continue exposed to their attacks under the new arrangements. It does not offer any better security, and it does offer a lower rate of interest. Where, then, is the "compromise?" What he really asks, and what the New York Times, we are sorry to see, represents as a reasonable request, is that the bondholders shall quietly submit to be plundered, and pretend to think it a fair and proper commercial operation, by which both sides gain something. We, on the other hand, earnestly urge them to cry out lustily, to let slip no opportunity of presenting the transaction to the world in its true light, and to refuse to be a party to it except under compulsion. They must not connive at it, or seem to connive at it, or allow their approbation to be used to cover up its real nature. We advise this because, in the first place, as we have been endeavoring to show, they will gain nothing by submission. If assailed by a robber, with every reason to believe that though you surrender your watch and money he will cut your throat all the same, none but the veriest craven or imbecile would propose surrendering without fighting. Under such circumstances, the most romantic sense of honor and the lowest worldly prudence unite in counselling you to put your back to the wall and sell everything, your life included, at the dearest rate. Courage may save you; cowardly submission cannot.

We advise it, in the next place, in the interest of public morality. To the growth and maintenance of this every man and woman in the country owes all he or she can contribute. It is not enough that a nation be free and strong; it must be honest to be really great. If the bond which binds it together be merely a community of material interest, it is not worth the name of a nation. If it be simply a machine for enabling men to get rich faster and enjoy more immunity from police meddling than elsewhere, it is not worth fighting for or saving. Every nation that has a great place in the world, or will have a great place in history, is held together by some stronger tie than this—some sentiment or ideal or tradition by which it is ennobled and glorified and made worth dying for in the eyes of those who belong to it. No people in which each individual does not feel the national obligations to be his own, the national honor to be his own, the national character to be his own, can be fairly animated by this sentiment. A perfect nation would be one in which this feeling animated all its members; and the less of this feeling there is in any given nation, the weaker is the feeling of nationality in its highest sense. The most distressing feature about this repudiation cry is the indifference it indicates to what the nation promised or is pledged to, and the perfect equanimity with which Western politicians propose that the whole community shall be guilty of a piece of baseness which no individual dare be guilty of, or, at all events, avow openly his intention of committing. To the removal of this moral weakness everybody can contribute something by simply and invariably talking of and thinking of public policy as he talks and thinks of his own conduct and that of his neighbors. The curse of the human race thus far has been the almost total separation in practice of public and private morality. If the United States have a mission in the world, it is, in our opinion, to put an end to this separation, and to exhibit the spectacle of legislation based on the moral law. If it does not succeed in doing this, it is useless to claim greatness on the credit of corn and hog returns and population. The man who did in private life what the Western politicians propose to have done in public life would be a scoundrel. Let everybody say so who feels it, and the bondholders amongst the foremost, and, if we cannot stop the swindle, we can at least expose it, and, by exposing it, strengthen the moral fibre of the honest and high-minded portion of the community. The "people's will," about which we hear so much as an excuse for repudiating politicians, has no more effect in making wrong right than a monarch's will; and dirty and dishonest work done in obedience to 20,000,000 is just as dirty and dishonest as if done in obedience to his Majesty Napoleon III.—no more so, but no less. We do not venture to suggest what a politician should do at this crisis, because it is quite certain no politician would heed what we say. But it is safe to say that it is the duty of every newspaper, party as well as independent, to speak out plainly about it. The repudiators are now publishing an organ of their own in the West; but probably few, if any, have reached such a pitch of impudence as to "stop their paper" because it advocated the honest fulfilment of the national bargains.

Another reason for crying out is, that the repudiation scheme in all its forms, whether conversion, bond-taxing, paying in greenbacks, or not paying at all, is a secessionist scheme. The proper name for Senator Sherman's bill is "A Bill to Impair the Public Credit and Facilitate Secession." The strongest political bond which holds the Union together is the borrowing power of the Government. Whatever weakens it paves the way to dissolution. The arguments in favor of this doctrine are so familiar that we shall not repeat them. Their force was universally acknowledged during the war by both rebels and Unionists. The result of the war was a splendid illustration of their soundness; the present disregard of them we cannot but regard as a species of national dementia. If we had to face another attempt like the last to break up the Union, with our credit in the condition which the repudiators propose to leave it, the end would, in our opinion, not be doubtful. All the valor and patriotism and numbers of the North would be, or would have been, powerless without money. The Western repudiators and their Eastern abettors are, therefore, playing into the hands of the enemies of the Government, present and future. There is something very absurd in the elaborate precautions the Senate and House are taking to keep out persons like Mr. Thomas, of Maryland, who are even suspected of feeling kindly towards secessionists or of having breathed suspicion on the public credit in 1861, when bills like this of Mr. Sherman's are before them, and when loyal Republicans are advocating on the stump and on party platforms schemes which, if another war broke out, would make the difficulties of the Treasury in 1861 seem trifling indeed. Straining at gnats and swallowing camels may sometimes be convenient; but it is a repulsive spectacle, and ought to be done privately.

Finally, that great consolation of politicians who are advocating measures which seem doubtful in point of honesty or expediency—that "England has done the same thing"—is in this case denied them. We say nothing of the meanness of resting content with being no better than England or any other nation—above all with regard to money matters, considering our wealth and resources. We simply say that the statement made by General Butler last fall in Boston and—if the newspaper report be correct—endorsed by Senator Sherman, and which the New York Times a few days ago repeated, that England has done to her creditors what it is now proposed to do to ours—forcing them to submit to a reduction of interest, is totally untrue. It is true that England has at various times reduced the interest on her public debt. It was done three or four times in the last century and at least once in this; but it was done because the general rate of interest had fallen below that which the Government was paying, and not because the people had proclaimed its unwillingness to pay it. It is true, also, that it was, as far as the public creditors were concerned, a compulsory process; but with what were they threatened in case of refusal? Payment in printed promissory notes—Micawber fashion? Special taxation of their securities? Total repudiation? No; with none of these things. What they were threatened with was being paid off in coin, and the threat was effectual in every case. If Senator Sherman were to menace our creditors with a similar penalty in case of refusal to accept his proposal, we should not have a word to say. To be sure, it would be a breach of faith to pay them off even in coin before the money was due; but no nation's credit was ever injured by this kind of perfidy. If the country adopts his present plan, he need not flatter himself that American securities will rank with those of any first-class power. Our companions in disgrace in the money markets of the world will not be England or France or Prussia or Austria or Holland, or even Russia, but Turkey, Spain, and Greece; in other words, the dregs of European monarchies; nations in whom centuries of ignorance and oppression and misfortune and poverty have extinguished the sense of shame as well as the sense of honor, and who owe their very existence to the pity or mutual jealousy of their neighbors.

HOW MAY THE PRESIDENT TEST THE VALIDITY OF A LAW?

As a general rule, the President may not exercise an independent judgment, and determine whether a statute regularly passed by Congress is valid before he proceeds to execute it, or to take care that it be faithfully executed. This opinion has certainly been maintained by most American statesmen and publicists, although its correctness has been denied by political writers of no small reputation and ability. The arguments in support of the negative are substantially two. It is said that the President must only execute the laws, and not those legislative acts which have a legal semblance merely, but are void; that an unconstitutional statute is no more a law than if it had never received the assent of the legislature; and that no power is given to execute this nullity. It is also said that the oath taken by the President imposes upon him a personal and most weighty responsibility; that he is bound by it to be guided by his own judgment, by his own conviction of what is lawful, and not by the convictions and judgments of others.

These arguments either prove too much or they beg the question. All important officers, State and national, are required to take an oath to support the Constitution. The President's oath is but an amplification of this. The solemn promise in detail to "preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution" does not imply more than the equally solemn promise to "support" it; the conscience is bound by the one no more than by the other. If, then, the President obtains from his oath any authority to judge of the validity of a statute, the same is shared with him by every legislative, judicial, and executive officer of the States and of the nation. Reduce such a principle to practice, and absolute anarchy would be the immediate result. And when it is said that the President is only bound to execute laws and not void statutes, this is assuming the very point in dispute. The whole question is, Are certain laws valid or void? and giving him power to decide is to make him the sole dispenser of statutes, to clothe him with an absolute veto after his qualified negative has been overruled, to place him above Congress and the courts. The whole theory and plan of the Government demand, therefore, the adoption and strict observance of the general doctrine stated at the outset, and the ready acquiescence in it by all officers of the executive department from the lowest subordinate up to the chief magistrate.

Are there any exceptions to this general rule? To answer this enquiry we must examine the nature of the President's powers as a whole, and ascertain whether there are certain classes to which the rule plainly applies, and whether there are other classes which cannot be brought within its operation. The obscurity which rests upon this whole subject seems to result in great measure from a treatment of the executive functions as though they were all of the same grade and character, from a failure to recognize the essential differences among them—differences so great that no rule can apply to all. We have much of this confusion at the present day. Thus, Mr. Boutwell at one blow demolishes the President as an independent department, and reduces him into a position of complete subordination, by denying to him the power to execute laws at all, and by asserting that his sole duty is to take care that the laws be faithfully executed. If we arrange and classify the various functions and attributes conferred upon the President, we shall find that they fall into three separate groups, so distinguished from each other that there is no interference or overlapping. The first group contains those attributes and functions which have no necessary connection with proper legislation; which are completely conferred by the Constitution; which do not depend upon any prior statutes for the opportunities and occasions of their exercise, nor for their number and scope; which would still exist and might still be carried into operation if Congress should blot out all its laws, or should attempt to limit and restrain the President from calling them into action. By far the most important function of this class is that which relates to the management of foreign affairs, including the power to make treaties with the consent of the Senate, and the power to hold communication with other governments. Of less moment are the powers to furnish information to Congress, to recommend measures, and to convene either or both Houses.

The second group contains those attributes and functions which depend upon some statute of Congress for the opportunities and occasions of their exercise. The constitutional grants to the President are sufficiently affirmative and express, but they relate to such a class of acts that Congress must furnish the subject-matter upon which the power is to be exerted. But when the legislature has thus provided the occasion or opportunity, its authority is exhausted. In this group are plainly to be ranged the functions belonging to the commander-in-chief, the pardoning power, and the appointing power. The President's capacity as commander-in-chief remains dormant until Congress has raised an army or navy; his pardoning power awaits the action of Congress in defining crimes and apportioning punishments; his appointing power cannot be exercised until Congress has created the offices to be filled. Here also we must place his power of removal from office, if it belongs to him at all.

The third group contains those executive functions and attributes which entirely depend upon prior laws of Congress, not only for the opportunities and occasions of their exercise, but for their number, character, and scope. Over this class the legislature has a complete control. It passes laws which must be executed; it may leave a large discretion to the President; it may take from him all discretion; it may, and generally it does, entrust the actual execution to subordinate officers, with instructions plain and positive, so that the only duty of the President is to "take care that the laws shall be faithfully executed."

The general rule stated at the outset certainly applies to the exercise by the President of the functions and attributes embraced in this third division. All his power to act is based upon the statute which creates and defines his whole duty; in respect to that law the only constitutional utterance directed to him is to take care that it be faithfully executed. But we may go further. Not only has the President no authority to exercise an independent judgment upon the validity of statutes which set in motion his attributes of this class, and to refuse to execute them, but he has no authority to test that validity in any manner. The means of testing must come from another source. The law is to be executed by himself or by some subordinate. In either case it must be executed. By this official act private individual rights will be affected, and the persons thus interested are the only parties who can thereupon resort to a "case arising under the Constitution" by which the law can be judicially reviewed.

The general principle under consideration to this extent furnishes a rule of conduct for the President; it cannot be applied to those of his functions and attributes which are embraced in the first and second of the foregoing divisions and to the laws which affect those attributes, for if it were so applied many infractions of the Constitution by the legislature, however plain, would be absolutely remediless. An illustration or two will exhibit the truth of this proposition. If Congress should pass a law declaring that the President shall grant no pardon without the consent of the Senate, or shall grant no pardon until after trial and conviction, and pronouncing every pardon conferred contrary to the law void, and the person who issued it, the one who placed the seal upon it, and the one who received it, guilty of a high misdemeanor and liable to fine and imprisonment, the President himself must violate such statute or it would remain unassailable. As long as he acquiesced in it its validity could not be questioned. No criminal has a legal right to demand a pardon; no criminal could therefore claim that his private and personal rights had been invaded by this legislation. But still further: the only possible way for the President to test the law would be to violate it, to issue a pardon in opposition to its provisions, and thus to create a private right in some person who could afterwards become a party litigant in a "case arising under the Constitution." No quo warranto or mandamus could aid the President in sustaining his independent authority, because until some person had been clothed with a right in opposition to the law, the only party against whom any proceeding could possibly be taken would be Congress, and it is certainly not amenable to the courts. The same would be true of any attempt to restrain the President in the exercise of his functions as commander-in-chief. Thus, the statute which forbids him to communicate orders to any portion of the army except through the General, and which forbids him to assign the General to any place other than at Washington, although more than doubts exist as to its validity, must remain for ever effective until the President voluntarily disregards it. These illustrations might be extended to all the other executive functions included within the first and second groups before described.

This result cannot be avoided by saying that the cases assumed are extreme ones. The principle applies as well to those executive functions of the two classes named which are implied in the Constitution as to those which are expressed in positive terms, for, in fact, such implied attributes, if they exist at all, are as efficient as those which are plainly set forth in unmistakable language; there may be a dispute as to whether they exist, but if this point be established they carry no badge of inferiority to any others. Thus, it is a mooted question whether the Constitution confers upon the President the power to remove from office. If the power belongs to him at all, it belongs to him as independently and as absolutely as that to grant pardons, and cannot be restrained or limited by direct legislation. The Tenure of Office Act interferes with this power, and the only method by which the law can be tested is for the President to violate it and remove without consulting the Senate. As long as he acquiesces no question can be raised; the person removed according to its provisions cannot complain, for by either theory of interpretation he has been properly removed. No one would have any legal right invaded but the President, and if he remains passive the law must stand. Nor can the President bring the question to a judicial determination by any legal proceeding alone instituted for that purpose. No doubt the Attorney-General may apply for a writ of quo warranto; but if the officer have been left undisturbed by the President he will have a complete answer to the writ; he will show a perfect warrant for the exercise of his official functions, by proving his original appointment and the fact that he has not been removed. If, then, the President should resort to a quo warranto, he must, as the preliminary step, remove the officer, and thus in every event take the initiative by violating the statute. Unless, therefore, we are willing to admit that the power of Congress over these highest and most independent executive functions is absolute, and that its decision upon the Constitution is final, we cannot escape the conclusion that in these and similar instances the President must, to bring the validity of a statute to a test, intentionally disre ard its commands. But of course he does so at his own risk, and the action of Congress against him in case he does so is a question of policy, or of abstract justice, rather than of positive law.

INFLATION AND THE WEST.

To the Editor of the Nation:

In the last number of the Nation there appeared an article entitled "Inflation in its Relation to the Money Market." While agreeing with the conclusions at which the writer of that article arrives, permit me to call attention to the premises from which he derives them. He says, "Money is abundant, and can scarcely be loaned at four per cent." However true that may be in the Eastern cities, it is certainly far from the case here. It is extremely difficult in this part of the West to obtain money at ten per cent. Is it not on account of this scarcity that the West is so strenuous in its demands for more money, and does not the argument, where that is the case, wholly fail?

G. L. B.

Madison, Wis., February 19, 1868.

Money is, indeed, fully worth ten per cent. throughout the West, and in many places is difficult to obtain even at that figure. But does it necessarily follow that the scarcity and high price of money at the West are due to any deficiency in the supply of currency, of legal tenders, or could be remedied by printing an additional fifty or one hundred millions? As far as Wisconsin is concerned, the scarcity of money certainly is not due to any scarcity of greenbacks, for, unless the figures of the bank statement lie, the banks of that State had not lent more than fifty-five per cent. of the amounts they were by law entitled to lend in view of the reserve of greenbacks which they held on hand. The total circulation and deposits of all the Wisconsin banks on January 6, 1868, was a trifle over eight millions. Against this amount of indebtedness they were by law bound to hold one million four hundred thousand dollars of greenback currency, but no more. They did hold not only the amount required of them by law, but also one million more than the law required. Against this surplus million of greenbacks they could have lawfully lent nearly four millions of dollars more than they had lent, they could have increased their loans and discounts from four millions and a quarter to eight millions and a quarter, or nearly doubled the amount of money which they could place at the disposal of the mercantile community of Wisconsin. The banks had it in their power to actually double the amount of money on the market, which would certainly have made money easy enough, but they did not do it. The question is, Why not? Certainly not because there were no applicants for it, for we know that the demand was active. Certainly not because the rate of interest was insufficient, for, as "G. L. B." states, ten per cent. could readily have been obtained for it. Why, then, did the Wisconsin banks—and in the same way the banks of almost all other States—refuse to lend at a handsome rate of interest the money which was so urgently demanded, and which they were by law fully authorized to lend? The reason is as follows:

As we explained in the article referred to by our correspondent, "G. L. B.," a bank does not lend money; it simply lends its credit by authorizing the borrower to draw his check upon it for the amount loaned. As long as the money thus borrowed is wanted by the borrower only to carry on his home business, the check will pass into the hands of some neighbor who will deposit it in a neighboring bank. The lending bank will then not be called upon to pay it in money, but will pair off in its daily settlement with its neighbor, as we explained at length, and there will then be no change in the bank's ability to continue lending to the full extent allowed by law. But if the money is not borrowed for the purpose of carrying on the ordinary home business of the borrower; if it is, on the contrary, borrowed to be sent to New York to pay debts there, or to buy goods, or to speculate in stocks and gold, or to "carry" wool and flour and wheat, then, instead of depositing the check in some neighboring bank, the borrower presents it to the lending bank for payment in money, so as to get the greenbacks, which are the only money which he can send to New York. Now, if the law requires the bank to hold one dollar in greenbacks for every four dollars that it lends, it is evident that for every one dollar that it pays out in greenbacks its ability to lend is reduced four dollars. In other words, a bank agreeing to lend one dollar, which the borrower calls for in greenbacks, in reality lends five dollars and only gets interest on one. It does not actually lend five, but it is deprived of the ability to do so which before it had. If the one dollar had not been taken from it in a greenback, the bank could have lent four other dollars to four other borrowers, and made interest on all. By paying out the greenback dollar it not only loses the power to accommodate four other customers, but it loses the interest which it would have legitimately earned if it could have accommodated them all. For this reason, so soon as a bank sees the money which it lends taken away in greenbacks, it immediately stops lending entirely or else raises its rate of interest—wherever the law allows that—so as to check the demand for loans, and at the same time partially remunerate itself for its loss of business.

Of course, no prudent bank ever lends to the full amount allowed by law, nor delays contracting its loans until its greenback reserve is reduced to the lowest point. On the contrary, so soon as a bank notices a steady drain upon its legal-tender reserve it immediately curtails its loans, because it cannot possibly tell how far the drain may go. From the beginning of winter until a week or two ago, exchange in almost all the Western cities was in favor of this city—in other words, all the Western cities had payments to make in New York in excess of any moneys they had to their credit here. This excess had to be remitted here in greenbacks—a process which has continued all winter, and which has raised the greenback reserve in our banks in less than two months from 52 millions to 67 millions, and has swelled the deposits from 175 millions to the extraordinary figure of 217 millions. The greenbacks brought here had, of course, all to be drawn from the banks out West. The banks, as soon as they saw their greenback reserve infringed upon, not knowing how far the drain might go, immediately began to curtail their loans, and they have continued to do so ever since. Thus we see in Wisconsin and elsewhere high rates of interest and money scarce and extremely difficult to obtain, although the greenback reserves of the banks in that State not only are far from exhausted, but indeed are sixty per cent. above the requirements of the law. For home use the banks of Wisconsin could to-day lend four millions of dollars, but they find that whatever they lend is taken from them in greenbacks to be sent East, thus destroying their ability to lend further, and compelling them to stop lending entirely. It must be clear to every thinking mind that the scarcity of money at the West is thus not due to any actual scarcity of currency, but simply to the fact that the currency is being carried out of the State where it rightfully belongs, and where it is absolutely needed for home traffic.

In thus showing that the direct cause of the scarcity of money at the West is the drain of currency to the East, we should, however, be only half answering our correspondent's strictures if we did not further attempt to show what causes this drain of currency to the Atlantic cities. The currency is sent here either to pay debts, to buy goods, or to speculate. That the latter has been done to a large extent is undoubtedly true. It is notorious that Western men are among the heaviest speculators in Wall Street. Not only Western railroad stocks, but Eastern as well; not only Pacific Mail and other steamship and trashy land and speculative coal companies' shares, but gold and Government securities, and even cotton, in this market and Liverpool, have been within the last three months put up and down by Western speculators. The "margins" on which these immense operations have been carried on have been brought from the West. Whether they will return thither is another question; but in the meantime they have no doubt been a potent factor in the drain of currency towards this city, and have helped to heap fuel on the feverish fire of speculation that has burned in Wall Street all winter through. This speculation is, of course, injurious to everybody, and really beneficial to no one. Of all parts of the country the West suffers most from it. The principal temptation to it are the enormous fluctuations resulting from an unsettled currency. The mere thought of inflation fans it into tenfold activity. The first serious proposition looking to inflation would increase the temptation tenfold, would drain the West of every greenback that their banks could be induced to part with, all to be invested in Erie or Northwest "for a rise." Then money would indeed be difficult to obtain in the West, and not ten but twenty per cent. would be the common rate of interest. A great part of the scarcity of money at the West is due to Western speculation here. Inflation, or the printing of more currency, can only intensify that speculation. Is inflation, then, likely to make money easier at the West?

That not much money is brought here at present to buy goods is certain. Nobody is selling many goods, and what are being sold are rarely paid for in cash. The only reason, then, for money coming here, besides speculation, must be that the West owes it. But how is it possible that the great West, after the liberal crops of last year, has to bring money East to pay its debts? Can it be that its magnificent harvest was a delusion? Can it be that there is no demand for its hog products, its meats, its lumber, flour, and grain? Is it true that the West has nothing but money to pay its debts? Impossible! But if the West has wool and breadstuffs and other products wherewith to pay its debts, how is it that it sends money to the East to pay them—money which out West is so precious, and here a drug?

The fact is this: While no section of the country fought and suffered more heroically during our great civil war than the West, no section was pecuniarily as much benefited by it. The enormous advance in the price of all farm products enriched the West greatly, and helped to pay off many old mortgages and other debts. Unfortunately, throughout the West—and, indeed, for that matter throughout the East as well—this advance in prices has always been attributed to the currency inflation. The currency is still inflated; the real inflation of money, made by bank loans and discounts, larger than all the currency put together, is larger now than at any time during the war, but prices are not as high as they were; business generally is dull and unprofitable, and the West, which sprang into unaccustomed prosperity during the early times of inflation, attributes all its present deficiencies to currency contraction, and is, as "G. L. B." well states, strenuous in its demands for more money; not because money is scarce and interest stands at ten per cent., for that is about the average rate, but because prices for Western produce are not as high as producers would like to see them.

The West unquestionably has large supplies of produce stored on farms and in warehouses and along the railroads, more than ample to pay all it owes. But the West is not willing to sell. The whole West believes that, as in 1863 and 1864, more money would make higher prices for their breadstuffs and provisions, and they are holding back their products for inflation prices. No one is willing to sell as long as he can borrow to pay his debts. The debts are mostly due to the East; whoever borrows to pay his debts takes greenbacks from the Western banks to be sent here, and every dollar of greenbacks sent here deprives the West of five dollars of money, and makes money still scarcer and higher and more difficult to obtain. Of course the banks have no means of ascertaining beforehand what will be done with the money that they lend; once lent, it passes from under their control, and thus they are compelled to refuse accommodation to those who need money for legitimate home purposes as well as to all others, and thus the regular merchant suffers by the action of the speculator, and is gradually drawn over into the belief that the West is suffering from want of currency and that the printing-press could bring relief.

We are obliged to our correspondent, "G. L. B.," for the opportunity afforded us of bringing this question once more squarely before our readers, especially in those sections where the demand for "more money" is most strenuous. "G. L. B." admits the correctness of our conclusions that there is no good sense in printing more currency to make money cheap, because we can borrow any quantity of money from the banks at a very low rate of interest. He only says that at the West money cannot be borrowed from the banks at low rates. He admits the correctness of the argument as applied to the East, but denies its applicability to the West. We have pointed out wherein the position of the West differs from that of the East, but for a better appreciation of the whole question we propose to show the precise practical working of inflation as affecting the West.

Suppose Congress to-morrow authorizes the issuing of five hundred millions additional currency. They must consist either of national bank currency or greenbacks. If national bank currency, they can only be issued against deposits of United States bonds. These bonds must be purchased in the market, requiring a large amount of money. Suppose the whole new capital to be equally apportioned among the States, the West would have to send its proportion of bonds to Washington as well as the other States. Where can these bonds be purchased? Nowhere but in New York. The West would have to send more money East than ever before in order to buy the bonds upon which to get the new currency. That money sent East would all be greenbacks. We have just seen what effect is produced upon the Western money market by sending greenbacks East, and know, therefore, that this first step towards getting fresh national bank currency would scarcely help to relieve the money market. If we are told that the West has bonds enough without coming to New York for them, we will not deny the assertion, but will simply ask, How was it that they were not more generally used to borrow money on in New York at four per cent., as could have been easily done, making it very profitable to reloan the money at ten on good security? But suppose the West has the bonds, and does not have to buy a dollar's worth of them in New York, nor pay out a dollar for them at home; suppose that the total amount of bonds required is on hand, and the banks all organized and in possession of their newly printed currency, they cannot issue one dollar of it until they hold in their vaults a proportionate amount of greenbacks. These they can only obtain from other existing banks. The existing banks are already troubled at the loss of their greenbacks, and are curtailing their loans to prevent still further loss. Would the additional demand from new banks increase the supply of greenbacks? Would not, on the contrary, the existing banks be compelled to curtail their loans still further so as to meet the demand? And would the new banks be able to lend more than the old, or would they not be subject to the same drain to the East that the old banks are laboring under? Would not, as we have said, the mere prospect of inflation, with its consequent price fluctuations, cause more Western "margins" to be sent to New York, and the Western banks drained more dry than ever of their greenbacks? And would not money—the money of commerce, bank credits—be higher and more scarce than before the fresh addition to the currency? Inflation is very easily talked about, and is a very pleasant thing to look forward to for a thoughtless holder of large amounts of produce, but when you come to look at it closely, it does not seem as though inflation—at least by means of fresh national bank currency—was going to make money much easier at the West.

But suppose the new currency issue is made in the form of greenbacks. These are printed at the Treasury in Washington; how do they get into the hands of the people? The Treasury cannot give them away. They can only leave the Government vaults in payment of what the Government owes. As long as the revenues of the country do not fall off, as long as all taxes and duties are not abolished, the Treasury receives funds enough from these sources to pay all it owes. Unless, therefore, the new issue of greenbacks is given away, it can only leave the Treasury vaults and reach the hands of the people by being paid out in redemption of a part of the national debt. The only part of the national debt which the Government has the legal right to redeem is the issue of six per cent. bonds known as the five-twenties of 1862. Leaving aside the consideration that to pay off these bonds by a fresh issue of greenbacks would be downright flagrant repudiation, which even the most reckless inflationists scarcely dare to recommend, what would be the practical effect of such a step? These bonds are now selling in the market at about ten per cent. above par, but the Government in redeeming them would, of course, only take them at par; hence the first serious threat to redeem these bonds would suddenly depreciate the total issue—and not only the issue of 1862, but all other issues as well—producing a loss of fifty to one hundred millions of dollars to the holders, causing large amounts of bonds to be thrown upon the New York market for immediate sale, and precipitating a money panic here of the most terrible character, which would rapidly extend all over the country. The first effect of all monetary disturbances is to cause all lenders of money to withhold their loans. The banks of the United States are lenders to the extent of over six hundred millions of dollars. A panic among the banks of the country would withdraw more money from circulation in a week than all the Treasury presses can print in six months, and how would that make money easy?

But supposing instead of redeeming five-twenty bonds the Treasury uses the new currency only to pay off the maturing seven-thirty notes. The holders of these notes, who are now daily selling them to the Treasury, as soon as they receive greenbacks in payment invest them in some other security, generally in the new five-twenty bonds which the Government is now issuing. If the seven-thirties were paid off in greenbacks there would, of course, be no new bonds issued, and the holders of the greenbacks would have to invest them in something else. Now, the theory of Western men generally is, that these holders of unemployed greenbacks would immediately take their money out West and lend it to the farmers and merchants and speculators at seven or eight per cent. per annum, or else would rush into the markets to buy flour and grain and pork and wool, and would thus enable Western holders to sell out at inflation prices, and bring back the glorious days of 1863 to 1865. We showed in our former article that there were untold millions of unemployed money in New York two months ago—so much unemployed money that it could with difficulty be lent at four per cent. Yet holders did not rush to buy Western products, which are to-day, in spite of the advance in gold and the winter season and the unusual demand from abroad, scarcely as high as three months ago. Nor, although money was superabundant here and scarce at the West, did people rush to send their money there; on the contrary, out of the very scantiness of the Western supply a steady stream of money was setting this way. Now, what earthly reason is there for supposing that a great abundance of money, brought about by issuing fresh greenbacks, would produce any different effect from that produced by a great abundance of money brought about by any other cause? None whatever.

The whole inflation theory is a mischievous delusion, based upon popular ignorance of the true nature of money and the true principles of banking. Let the West—our brave, sturdy, self-reliant West—cast aside such vain chimeras; let it recognize the truth, now somewhat veiled from the popular sight, that the only honest and profitable course is to sell its produce at the market price, to pay its debts as soon as possible, and to stop all gambling speculation. We shall then hear no more about tight times, money will be easy again, honest labor will be at a premium, and financiering demagogues will be at a discount.

WHY IS SINGLE LIFE BECOMING MORE GENERAL?

The increasing infrequency of marriage at the present day is fast getting into the category of topics of universal discussion. It has long been a subject of family and social comment—the secret murmur of daughters and the loud complaint of mothers. It has been seized upon by the brilliant essayists, skilfully exaggerated and elaborated, and epigrammatically analyzed, satirized, philosophized, and moralized upon. It has become a subject of investigation for the political economist and the statistician—a theme for reports and papers in Social Science Conventions. It has been preached about from the pulpit, and has even found its way into governors' messages.

That marriage has become less frequent among the middle classes of France, England, and New England is not to be denied. It is a fact, established by abundant statistical proof, that a largely increased and increasing proportion of the population remain single. In France it is no new phenomenon. In England, the disinclination to the assumption of marriage relations is growing with a rapidity which the journalists characterize as alarming; and New England is fast following in the steps of her mother.

Such a phenomenon simultaneously appearing in the seats of our highest civilization is, indeed, a matter of serious interest. Its causes most certainly demand to be searched out. There has been no lack of a supply. It has had as many sources assigned to it as the Nile. The decrease in marriage in France is said to be owing to the drafting of the young men into the army, and their retention in it in enforced bachelorhood during the years when nature most urges to matrimony; also to the expense and trouble attending the ceremony; to the social usage which makes marriage a business arrangement, an affair de convenance, in which the affections of the heart cannot be gratified; and, finally, to the increased number and attractions of the demi-monde.

In English society the root of all the evil is "those hateful clubs," as Miss Araminta indignantly calls them. "It's so deuced expensive, you know, to have an establishment nowadays," according to the young milords. It is "the vacuity trimmed with lace," "the poverty proud of its purple clothing"—the frivolity, inanity, mental inferiority of the other sex, declare the clever men who do the social philosophizing for the English weeklies. In New England the reason is, that the young ladies are so extravagant in dress that they are unwilling to do their own housework and sewing, and what is more—don't know how, if they were willing; that they want to commence housekeeping where their fathers and mothers left off instead of where they began; that they will not marry any man unless he is rich. Then, too, the young men all go off West to seek their fortunes and leave at home an excess of women, who must necessarily remain single because there are no men to match them. The woman's rights advocates charge the decrease in marriage to the inequitable constitution of the marriage relation, to the discriminations of the law against the property and individuality of the wife, to her treatment by her husband as either a plaything and pet or a mere upper servant without wages, independent rights, or surcease of work and duty.

The rear of the lengthening line of reasons is brought up for the nonce by the counter-charge of one of our contemporaries, that the decline in the frequency of marriage is only one of the advancing ripples of the woman's rights movement. It is an effect, it is alleged, of the effort of woman to make herself independent of man and put herself on an equality with him. The champions of woman's rights, it is said, openly deny the man's claim to submission and obedience from the woman, and the whole class of young women at the present day, although but a small part belong to the woman's rights party, exhibit a growing self-assertion, masculinity, independence, which make men more and more wary of the matrimonial noose. Man cannot be expected, it is said, to assume the protection and support of a wife if he is not likely to receive obedience from her in return; he cannot be expected to tie himself up in a life-long union, if he cannot have supreme authority therein.

As long as the Nile had a dozen different sources assigned to it, it was pretty plain that the real fountain-head had not yet been discovered. These numerous reasons fail to afford a sufficient explanation. Part just invert the relation of cause and effect; part are only similar products of the same root; others contribute to the result, but are local, special, inadequate.

The prevalence of clubs, the greater number and greater influence of the demi-monde, and the greater frequency of illicit connections, instead of being causes of the decrease of legitimate connections, are plainly effects. So in regard to the woman's rights movement. It is equally plain that it is not because women are becoming masculine, independent, and desirous of equal rights that so many of them are left unmarried; but because so many women are left unmarried that they are forced to be independent, that they are made masculine, that they naturally wish for an equal chance with men in the struggle for a livelihood. They are not left unmarried because they seek to enter professions; but since they fail of getting occupation for hand and heart in a husband's house, they naturally seek for a career and an object of ambition in the callings and public posts of the world, and as naturally think it right that they should have equal rewards with their masculine competitors for work and success in them. The submissive and patient Griseldas are left single equally with the moral Camillas and the social Amazons. The masculine English girl is no more fought shy of than the convent-educated, unsophisticated French jeune fille. The fact is that there has been a real disarrangement of the old relations of the two sexes, and that they must be readjusted in some new order.

If the loss of rights which women must suffer in the marital relation makes them unwilling to accept it, yet this evil is much less instead of greater at the present day than formerly. In New England there is neither army service nor clubs nor the rivalry of a numerous demi-monde, nor governmental expense and trouble attending the marriage ceremony; the young women as a class are neither "fast" nor "masculine" nor frivolous, nor inferior in education and culture to the young men; the young people are left in complete freedom to follow their own hearts and tastes in choosing their companions—yet the same phenomenon of an increased proportion of single men and women is exhibited. Nor is it the excess of the women over the men left by the Western emigration. The excess of about forty thousand women in the State of Massachusetts, which has been made so much of, would only account for the unmarried state of about one-fifth of the single women. Nor is it altogether the young woman's extravagance and unwillingness to work. She can triumphantly repulse the attack with home-hitting shots: is she not about as economical as masculine Young America; if she were willing to, would he be satisfied to see her dress plainly and to live without hired servants; does he give her a chance to show whether she will marry a poor man and commence housekeeping humbly; is he willing to marry a poor girl who will not better either his purse or his social position; how is it, if he can't afford a wife, that he can afford cigars and velvet coats, champagne suppers and summer tours, that he has money to spare for billiards and theatres and horses?

This cause, if we mistake not, is nothing less than the higher development of civilization and the new form which modern progress has given to modern life. The decrease in the frequency of marriage is exhibited in the countries—France, England, and the United States—which have advanced the most in the path of modern civilization. The decrease is proportioned to the respective height of social development in each. By the general diffusion of education and culture, by the new inventions and discoveries of the age, by the increase of commerce and intercourse and wealth, the tastes of men and women have become widened, their desires multiplied, new gratifications and pleasures have been supplied to them. By this increase of the gratifications of existence the relative share of them which married life affords has become just so much less. The domestic circle does not fill so large a place in life as formerly. It is really less important to either man or woman. Married life has lost in some measure its advantage over a single life. There are so many more pleasures, now, that can be enjoyed as well or even better in celibacy. The distinctive sexual impulse, besides, is less powerful not only relatively, because of more numerous rivals, but absolutely, as a necessary attendant upon the development of the mental and higher faculties according to the laws of the conservation of force. While a less proportion of the enjoyments of life at the present day are to be sought in matrimonial life, the cost of it has come to be much greater. Not that its absolute cost is more; not that the necessaries of life for a family are greater in price than formerly—they are probably less—but that they are greater in number. Matrimonial life costs more than formerly because there are so many other gratifications, bodily, mental, and æsthetic, which demand satisfaction as well as the affectional impulses, and because so many more of these must be sacrificed by one of moderate means on entering matrimonial life. Commerce, labor-saving machines, the discovery of new sources of wealth, have made the world wealthier, have made luxuries before rare cheap, and gratifications before unknown common. Increase in wealth increases desires still faster. The more they are gratified, the further they are from being satisfied. Each new gratification brought within reach becomes not only a daily necessity but creates a taste for a dozen out of reach. He who rises a little in the social scale desires to rise still higher. The railroad, that great revolutionizer of the modern world, has been a potent forwarder of this tendency. By means of the railroad the bulk of population has been drawn from its distribution in small towns and cities, and has been collected in large cities. In cities, people are exposed more constantly to public view. They are brought more often in contact with wealth and luxury. They see more show. Every change of fashion is displayed before them. The new luxuries solicit them everywhere. The modern improvements force themselves upon every one's notice. One must do what others do, and have what others have. One must keep up with the times or get laughed at and lose position. Rivalry is excited, ambition sharpened; emulation whets emulation.

The city is the habitat of the single. The country town or even the small city is an uncongenial clime for the species. The single must have public amusements and public resorts, and these only flourish in great cities. In the country they can be only infrequent and of poor order. In cities they are constant, abundant, and varied, and invested with every attraction which ingenuity can devise and money procure. In cities, too, vice can find haunts in which to supply secretly the cheaper substitute for marital relations.

There, for example, was Jonathan in the little town of Tyanius fifty years ago, with an education comprising the three Rs—no daily paper, few books to be had, even if his taste for literature were less; not even a Sunday-school library in town; no theatre or concert hall; billiard-tables not yet known in the land, and the cigar and meerschaum comparatively unknown; public amusements limited to a weekly lyceum and an occasional circus or political meeting; about his only means of enjoyment in his leisure evenings outside of the home and feminine society was to lounge at the tavern or to go off on a spree to the next town. Mary Jane, sans piano, studio, sensation novels, and picture galleries, sans German and Italian, was still worse off for single enjoyments.

When people have no other amusement, it has been cynically said, they always imagine themselves in love. It may commence in mere imagination, but it generally ends in reality. The dictum that nature abhors a vacuum has been exploded as a law of matter, but it remains a law of the heart and mind. The natural result of such a condition of things was a plentiful crop of engagements. And the engagements had not to be protracted for five or ten years before marriage could be thought of. There were few things to prevent their speedy consummation. Mary Jane, brought up at home by her mother instead of in a fashionable boarding-school, knew all the mysteries of housekeeping and required the aid of no Bridget to make either bed or bread. Mary Jane, in fact, saved Jonathan having to hire help to carry on his dairy. A frame house of four or five rooms, with plain furniture and sanded floors, answered to begin housekeeping in. The children, also, as soon as they got to be ten or twelve years old, became helps instead of burdens. The girls assisted in the housework, the boys worked in the field or garden or at a trade. Going little in public, they needed little for dress.

The city young bachelor and young miss of to-day, on the contrary, have a surfeit of independent resources. With such a multiplicity of occupations and entertainments outside, neither John nor Jennie feels much need of each other's society and of domestic life. The larger part of all these accustomed gratifications they must drop if they will have the latter. To commence housekeeping at the present day is no light affair. Let the young couple be willing to start modestly and live economically, yet they must have the necessaries and the decencies of life. They must have furnace and range, hot and cold water, marble mantelpieces and wash-basins, sofas and carpets, silver table-service and pictures on the wall. They must have servants to cook and do the housework, for in the costly course of study in which Jennie has passed her life hitherto no instruction nor practice in these branches was given. Then the children must not grow up in ignorance. They must have a good education. They must remain in school the whole year round or be put down in their classes. The sons must be sent to college and the daughters go to a seminary or private school till twenty "to be finished." Their children must be dressed well, so as not to be put to shame among their schoolmates. The need of married life so much less, the burdens attendant on it so much heavier, so many more things to be crowded out by it—here is ample explanation of the increasing number of men and women who are disinclined to try its risks.

The widening and heightening of men's and women's tastes have acted in another way to increase the number of those who remain single. As in the process of civilization man's desires grow faster than his productive power, so it is the action of education to develop the sensibility and the critical faculty more than character or executive ability. By the diffusion of a finer culture throughout the community, men and women can less easily find any one whom they are willing to take as a partner for life; their requirements are more exacting; their standards of excellence higher; they are less able to find any who can satisfy their own ideal and less able to satisfy anybody else's ideal. Men and women have, too, a livelier sense of the serious and sacred character of the marriage union, and of the high motives from which alone it should be formed. They are less willing to contract it from any lower motives. These tendencies have been intensified and exaggerated by the universal novel. Little Jennie must have in her John the piercing intellect, the dauntless courage, and the noble soul of Estracourt. If John does n't possess them, he cannot satisfy the wants of Jennie's heart. If John does not grow pale with throes of passion and gush his love in tides of broken rhetoric, he cannot feel real love for her; and if she herself does not thrill in John's presence and pine in his absence and experience all the ecstasies of emotion which Lilian Holme does for her beloved, John cannot be her destined soul-half; and so, though Jennie likes John much better than any other of the fellows, she tells him, with a little sigh, "We must be only friends, you know."

Is this decrease in the frequency of marriage a thing that should excite alarm and lamentation? We think not. Nor do we think it calls, either, for strenuous preaching up of matrimony to our young folks. Is not this prudent hesitation more to be praised than the precipitancy with which thoughtless, ignorant, inexperienced, poverty-stricken children rush into the sacred responsibilities of parents? It is not the number but the character of its people that determines the worth of a country. It is not by increasing the quantity but the quality of its inhabitants that the world is benefited. "Better fifty years of Europe than a cycle of Cathay." Why? Simply because fifty Europeans are worth more than a thousand Cathayans; because it is better to have in a country fifty educated, accomplished, and cultured people than a thousand ignorant, brutish, and vicious.

There is another advantage attendant upon the decrease in marriage. This decrease is found chiefly in the middle and upper classes. It does not reach the poor, for its causes, as we have seen, are advanced culture, refinement, and style of living. Room is thus made in the upper ranks of society to be filled by the rising into it of the best members of the lower ranks, instead of there being an overplus among the upper and middle classes, which would be necessarily crowded down among the poor. The social current is thus made an ascending instead of a descending current.

When some one rises from poverty to wealth, though he have the spending, during his life, of no more money and traverse exactly the same pathway and steps of fortune as one who descends from the upper ranks of society to the lower, we yet reap ten times as much gratification from his course. That which gives this upward direction to the general course of life contributes vastly to the happiness of mankind.

The social philosophers are now perturbed at the loss of population caused by the infrequency of marriage. But it is only about fifty years ago when they were all terribly frightened because marriage was so frequent, and population was increasing so fast that the means of subsistence could not keep pace with it. The new comer into the world, they feared, would soon find no place for him at Nature's board, and room would have to be cleared by the small-pox, the cholera, or some other ravaging epidemic. The poor were told that they were committing a wrong against society in marrying as they did and bringing into the world mouths for which there was no provision, and that if they would not reform they were rightly punished by hardship and starvation. The present tendency to single life is the corrective that is preventing any such catastrophe. It is the easy and gentle check of Nature that is always at hand, and spontaneously interposes whenever an overplus of population commences to be felt. As the alarm of too much marrying and of overpopulation was groundless, as Nature found an easy and gentle remedy for that tendency before it became excessive, so with this alarm and this tendency. We may trust the planets to be in the proper path of their orbit, however they may seem to veer this way and that, and we may trust Nature herself to know her right course and be always in it.

ENGLAND.

LONDON, February 14, 1868.

PARLIAMENT has just met. For the next few months the debates of that august assembly will push on one side all the remaining contents of our newspapers, and will furnish the texts upon which half the remainder turns. Whatever else may be said for or against the House of Commons, it is unrivalled as a machine for talking and making talk. If in some other assemblies there is as much discussion, there is certainly no assembly whose discussions range over so wide a field, and are watched with so much interest by every class and interest throughout the whole nation. Before I am forced by other imperious demands of parliamentary contests to devote my space to their subject-matter, allow me to touch upon one or two little points which will pass out of sight when the session has fairly begun.

All London society has been in a state of intense excitement for the last two or three weeks about the mysterious disappearance of a clergyman. Mr. Speke, a brother of the African traveller (who, as you remember, was killed by a shooting accident), came up to London to attend the marriage of a friend about five weeks ago. He went into a hatter's in Pimlico, bought a hat about 5:30, and expressed his intention of going to dine with a friend at 6:30. Meanwhile he walked off towards Westminster, and has never since been heard of. His hat was found in Birdcage Walk, opposite the railings of a garden belonging to a married sister. These are about all the facts of the case, and all London has gone wild about it. It is hard to say why certain murders or disappearances have, so to speak, a success which is denied to others of equal merit. This incident has undoubtedly, in theatrical language, made a decided hit—if you will excuse a phrase which is not intended to be heartless. Neither the Mar murders described by De Quincey, nor the Palmer murders, nor the Waterloo Bridge mystery (when a mangled body was found in a carpet-bag) produced greater excitement. The Times is deluged with correspondence. The weekly newspapers write elaborate articles, after the fashion of Poe's murders in the Rue Morgue, spinning the most refined theories out of the very narrow set of facts. Parallel cases are hunted up in every direction. One man tells us how he was asked to get into a cab, where, had he not fortunately refused the invitation, he would certainly have been robbed and murdered. Another has been taken into a shop on pretence of buying cigars, and it is quite clear that, if he had not come out safely, he would have been plundered after being first rendered senseless by chloroform. Other persons spread divers rumors about Mr. Speke's habits, to prove à priori that he must have committed suicide, or that he must have been enticed into some den of thieves, or must have simply run away for no particular reason and been ashamed to come back. Another class of agitated persons recommends the use of revolvers or life-preservers, and invents as many rules for walking London streets in safety as for travelling through the centre of Africa. Meanwhile the police say with due solemnity that they are in possession of a clue which may in due time lead to further discoveries—or may not. From all which I am content to infer that nobody knows anything about the matter except those who have a very intelligible dislike to publicity; and further, that it is a curious thing to watch the spread of excitement, by a kind of moral contagion, through a vast mass of human beings as eager as ever were the people of Athens to be hearing and telling some new thing.

The great topic at all dinner-parties which has disputed the pre-eminence with poor Mr. Speke's disappearance is the new movement for the consumption of horseflesh. In this we are only imitators of the Parisians; but the apostles of the movement have taken it up with a zeal and energy which bid fair to bring the later converts to a level with the originators of the movement. I say, deliberately, apostles, for the zeal displayed in the cause reminds one rather of the propagators of a new religion than of a simple question about an addition to our dinner-tables. I had the honor of attending a great horse-dinner at the Langham Hotel, and sitting opposite to one of the most earnest supporters of the movement. I ventured to make one of those small jokes which are perhaps pardonable, by way of starting talk at a dinner-table. Had I indulged in a sarcasm about eating pork at a dinner of rabbis, or made playful allusions to roast-beef in a meeting of high-caste Brahmins, I could not have shocked my hosts more unmistakably. I was immediately treated to a glowing burst of eloquence proving that the great hope of elevating the toiling masses of Europe lay in popularizing the consumption of horseflesh. I was to eat the dishes set before me in no trifling spirit, nor to make them the occasion of any unseasonable levity. I was performing a sacred act, as though I had been attending the feast of some ancient idol; and when a "baron of horse" was brought in in solemn procession, preceded by a beef-eater blowing a triumphant strain upon the cornet, and the whole company rose to their feet in a spontaneous burst of enthusiasm, I felt for a moment equal to my lofty duty, and could have vowed to eat horse as unflinchingly as the British soldier should advance in the face of hostile bayonets. Next morning, when the virtuous glow had faded from my bosom, I confess that I suffered tortures, over which I will draw a veil. It is enough to say that a medical friend who happened to be called in declared that the symptoms were in no way due to any specific action of horse, but that they were such as not unfrequently follow a very crowded, hot, and noisy banquet in an atmosphere thickened after dinner with the smoke of many cigars, and followed by a due allowance of liquors. This humiliating confession will, at least, prove that I speak frankly in declaring that to my mind horseflesh is like moderate beef, that I should be perfectly willing to partake of it again, but that, on the whole, I had rather that it should become a popular article of consumption with the poor. It is, of course, a gain that so much meat should be put to human use which was formerly wasted or thrown away upon dogs. I do not think it will be a great addition to the tables of epicures, and I will add that the taste appeared to me to be perfectly familiar, as I think it would to any one who has ever partaken of filet de bœuf at a rather inferior French café.

The hippophagous sect is only carrying out in one direction what appears to be at the present moment a predominant desire in the breast of the British public. We have suddenly come to the conclusion that we are an extravagant people, and that we ought to reduce our bills. The plan of economy is to eat our horses which were formerly thrown away. Another is to attack our tradesmen. A war is at present being waged between the grocers and the public of London. So long as it was confined to indignant letters from "paterfamilias" to the Times the grocers could afford to laugh. A far more efficient mode of warfare has been discovered in the co-operative societies. The benefits which they promise to confer are worth notice; as I dare say that even in America, unless that part of the world presents a complete exception to the rest of the civilized community, housekeepers have grievances as to tea and sugar and other family necessaries. The extraordinary success of the co-operative stores at Rochdale seems to have first suggested the idea to some members of the Civil Service. They started a co-operative store for the supply of all the usual articles of household consumption. The main principles were that all payments were made in ready money; the best articles were obtained from the wholesale merchants, and the price charged was only that which was necessary to pay the expenses of superintendence. The customers fetched their own articles, or a separate charge was made in case they were forwarded by the store. The society thus established flourished moderately for some time. At last the British public was seized with one of its usual fits of excitement about the tradesmen, and it suddenly occurred to the agitators that by joining the Civil Service store they would be able to set their enemy at defiance. The society decided to admit persons who were not members of the Civil Service, on payment of a small fee. A rush of eager applicants for admission immediately set in. The society had soon to desert its old premises and set up a large house in the Haymarket. When I went there the other day the place was crowded, the clerks had more work on their hands than they could well perform, and a whole row of carriages was blocking up the street. In short, the concern has suddenly obtained a gigantic success. The grocers are trembling. Some of them are endeavoring to combine and refuse to deal with the wholesale merchants who supply the Civil Service store. Others have lowered their terms, and offer to supply the same articles at the same price as the Civil Service store on condition of ready-money payment. In short, paterfamilias is for once triumphant, and has, for the time at least, got the better of his ancient oppressor. One gentleman writes to the Times to say that he has saved enough money by joining the society to give his family a trip to Switzerland in the summer.

The limits wherein the plan is likely to prove of permanent advantage seem to be clearly marked. It is simply a plan for securing a simpler mode of distribution, and for not allowing a series of middlemen to make a profit by unnecessary intervention between the consumer and the producer. The ultimate difference is the difference between the profit of the tradesmen and the amount which it is necessary to pay to secure an effective superintendence of the store. In such commodities as tea and sugar and others where there is no great advantage in giving to the distributor a personal interest in suiting the taste of his customers, the plan may probably be successful. All that is wanted is the simplest possible device for handing over the article in question to the consumer. In such articles as, for example, female dress, the case is entirely different. Where it is necessary to take a deal of trouble in consulting individual tastes, the superintendent with a fixed salary is not so efficient as the tradesman who has a direct interest in his sales. It will be impossible, therefore, for the co-operative store to compete effectively with shops where the proprietor has far stronger motives for taking an interest in each particular sale. In short, the co-operative principle will be efficient in proportion as the transactions which take place are merely a mechanical transfer of goods of tolerably uniform quality. Where individual caprice and variation of choice come into play it will be beaten by the old system. A lady does not like a milliner's where her complaints would be expended upon an official board instead of a responsible tradesman.

There is another way in which it may be useful, namely, by the substitution of ready-money payments for the old plan of long credits; and, by the force of competition, the old-fashioned tradesmen are encouraging this mode of dealing. The advantages are made evident to the simplest capacity by the success of the co-operative system. The wastefulness of English management in private as well as in public affairs is one of our most conspicuous faults, and I think I am not mistaken in fancying that some share in this weakness has been inherited by our descendants in other quarters of the globe. Anything which promises to administer a decided corrective to this propensity is so far an advantage, and the attention directed to the principles of co-operation is likely in that way to have a beneficial effect. It is curious, I may add, that in this case the example was first set in the working-classes, and has spread from them upwards to those who are more intelligent, but who certainly have less reason for applying their intelligence to the details of domestic economy.

Correspondence.

THE PRESIDENT'S TRIAL.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: The paragraph in your last editorial, page 164—"The Crisis at Washington"—beginning with "It must be admitted," etc., to the end, is so horrible to my sense of justice, and so damaging, if true, to the Republican party, that I beg of you to explain it.

Do you really mean to say that Congress will dare to say to the meanest and most wretched criminal on earth that his "character is so bad that it will not allow him to question their acts, even by legal process?"

If so—if the Republican party says this, then the sooner that party "goes to the devil," the better for all men.

I was a Liberty Party man, and have grown up a Republican, and I believe you are mistaken. Pray look at the words and answer me, and, I doubt not, others. ——.

Boston, March 2, 1868.

EXTRACTS FROM OTHER LETTERS.

"Of course it is not for us to dictate its course to the Nation, but you may be willing to listen to the criticism of friends. We had hoped at this time that, in the discussion of principles, the Nation would prove to be a calm, judicious, and able exponent of the young and educated ability of the country—of those who try to detect sophism even amid excitement. The writer of your leader of the 27th takes the ground that Congress may make it an impeachable misdemeanor on the part of the President if he shall refuse, at their bidding, to flagrantly violate the Constitution, or even if he shall attempt to get a judicial construction of a law in flagrant violation. For instance, Congress passes a law conferring a patent of nobility over the veto, and directs the President to issue the patent within thirty days, and makes his failure to do so a misdemeanor. As I read the Nation's law, the President must issue the patent, and his neglect to do so not only renders him liable to impeachment, but he cannot even plead any prior, contemporary, or subsequent judicial construction before the Senate as a court of impeachment. Congress can cut him off from the Constitution by law, and we cease to be a constitutional government, as Congress is supreme. Many of us cannot consider this good law."

Boston, March 2, 1868.

"I do not know anything which has grieved me more of late, or surprised me so much, as the deflection of the Nation of the 27th from its usual high tone of morality in its editorial on 'The Crisis at Washington.' After pointing out that the remedy by a writ of quo warranto is the true and time-honored remedy to be taken by the President in such a case, it goes on to say that this method is denied him by the terms of the law, and then actually justifies this denial of justice by saying that it is a 'general belief' that the President is not an honest man. Anybody else could have had his legal rights, but this man cannot, because 'of the bad reputation (sic) he has acquired for himself.' 'His character is so bad that they (Congress) will not allow him to question their acts, even by legal process.' I do not see any difference between this and any justification of tyranny or mob law. The man who wrote that article would deny the right of a fair trial to a man generally suspected of having committed a murder. There is no enormity which this reasoning would not justify and excuse. The writer believes in the old English rule about trials for high treason, where the accused was denied counsel because of the heinousness of the crime with which he was charged.

"I don't so much mind the Nation taking different views of the matter from myself, though I should think that the delay of a week might have saved the editor from falling into the popular error of supposing that the President disobeyed the law because he thought it unconstitutional, when the fact was that he gave to it one of two equally doubtful and equally permissible constructions—that one, doubtless, which was approved by his constitutional legal adviser, the Attorney-General. But I do grieve to see the Nation, which has tried to be, and has succeeded thus far in being, impartial, and in preserving a real genuine moral judgment about political affairs, now telling the American people that it is all right to deprive the popular victim, the man of bad 'reputation,' of a fair trial of his case by the laws of the land. I am a Republican, but I am a gentleman, and I believe in the laws, and in fair play."

Boston, February 29, 1868.

[We usually say what we mean—at all events, we try to do so. In this instance we do not seem to have succeeded. Our position is that the President is not entitled stricti juris to such delay as will enable him to test the constitutionality of a law in the courts before he executes it. Congress is not bound to allow him to suspend the operation of an act or to refuse obedience to it because he has doubts in his own mind as to its validity. Such a rule would produce anarchy. But under ordinary circumstances, and in dealing with an ordinary President enjoying a fair amount of public confidence, Congress would unquestionably allow him, in a case admitting of any doubt, to satisfy his scruples by an appeal to the courts without inflicting on him the penalty which they may inflict in all cases of disobedience whatever; for to the Senate it undoubtedly belongs to decide what is a crime or misdemeanor in office, and for the purpose of impeachment whether a law is constitutional or not; at all events, there is no appeal from its decision. Now, we are still of opinion that in a bad case—and we hold Mr. Johnson's to be a bad case—Congress may say, "We shall not grant you any indulgence. We shall not wait for you to sue out a quo warranto. Your past conduct has been such as to leave us no confidence in your honesty. We shall therefore use against you all the power at our disposal." This does not strike us as so very horrible a thing as our correspondents seem to think. Mr. Johnson is not bound to test the constitutionality of a law; he is not bound to execute it, for he may resign and then appeal to the people if he finds himself powerless; and he may stand impeachment and go on with his quo warranto. The process does not touch his life or liberty or property; it only touches his tenure of office and his reputation; and this, even, the Senate cannot damage, even if he is removed, for his reputation is in the hands of the nation at large. We had elsewhere stated, before receiving the letters from which we have quoted above, more clearly than we were able to do last week, our view of the President's position with regard to the testing of laws.—Ed. Nation.]

Notes.

LITERARY.

On account of its being abusive, we do not print the whole of a letter which we have received from Mr. Thomas Clarke—writing for Clarke & Bowron, publishers, of Chicago. A part of it, however, we print. It will, perhaps, be recollected that the firm above-mentioned published some books that were spoken of unfavorably in the Nation. Not long afterwards there was printed in a Chicago paper, on the authority of Clarke & Bowron, a highly commendatory critical notice of the books which purported to be taken from this journal. We called attention to what seemed rank dishonesty on the part of the publishers. This explanation of their conduct is now given, and we cheerfully accord it, as is requested, a place as prominent as that occupied by our previous statement:

"To the Editor of the Nation:

"Sir: A friend has just pointed out to us an article in your paper of the 20th inst., reflecting on us as misrepresenting your criticism on our books, 'Sir Copp' and 'The Two Angels.' We will explain: An editor residing at Washington, Indiana, whose name we can give you, wrote to us for copies of our books, at the same time sending us his paper containing a copy of your criticism, as he affirmed. Not having seen your paper, we believed him, and framed our advertisement accordingly; but on finding our mistake, we have removed the obnoxious paragraph, and it will appear no more."

—We regret to announce the decease, after less than a year's life, of the Chronicle, the most learned of all the English literary journals. It wanted the critical insight which is the most satisfying of the Spectator's many good qualities, and it was all but entirely destitute of the cleverness and brilliancy of the Saturday Review, the man-of-the-worldly tone of which paper probably seemed to the writers of the Chronicle utterly abominable. In fact, the Chronicle was extremely heavy. Most people who read weekly papers found it too hard reading. This was so for several reasons. In the first place, its articles, written almost always with a fulness and minuteness of knowledge elsewhere only very rarely matched, were by reason of the very qualities that made them valuable to the special student distasteful to the general reader. Then, it is true that very many of its articles were to be called clumsily written, whether considered as addressed to the reader of ordinary cultivation or to the trained student. No essayist does well to demand of his readers the ability and to impose on them the necessity of reading between the lines, not only once in a while, merely, but in the case of every pair of lines; and the essayists who desire a weekly paper to be profitable in England, or in any other country, for that matter, are still more than other writers bound to avoid this fault. Then, again, as regards religious topics, the paper had a tone peculiar to itself, which we hardly know how to describe. It was not Roman Catholic, and yet it seemed oftener to be written by Roman Catholics, supervised, perhaps, by a sympathetic Episcopalian editor, than by anybody else. Although liberal in politics, it was never other than in open hostility to what is styled "advanced thinking" in religious matters, and its learning made it a dangerous antagonist, if not to that cause, at least to almost any of the individual champions of it. And, finally, it was devoted to the sensible Irish side of the Irish question, and so pleased almost nobody; and it was addicted to the treatment of rather out-of-the-way questions of Continental politics and contemporary history, in which very few people are at all interested. There perhaps never was a journal of so much ability conducted with so entire a lack of the editorial sense; but its great merits so much overweighed its defects—which were mostly mere matters of machinery—that it is not incorrect to say that the Chronicle died because it was too good. Certainly it published many astonishingly good essays—one series in particular it published, that on Shakespeare's "Sonnets,' which we wish might be put into a more permanent form. They would make a book of which most readers would have to turn students before they would understand it, but they would make a book that would repay study, and for several reasons. We have some hope that they may be gathered into a volume, for the Shakespeare enthusiasts make a good-sized audience, and no Shakespearian library would be complete if it wanted this ingenious and learned explication of the sonnets.

—For a long time the better portion of the English press has had frequent occasion to condemn, with a mixture of anger and mirth in its tone, that body of country clergy which holds itself in reserve generally, but every once in a while comes up to Oxford—an irresistible array of "such as wear shovel hats"—and commits Convocation to some piece of exceeding illiberality. The action of this bucolical conservative force which attracted most attention here was the recent rejection of Mr. Gladstone as the Parliamentary representative of Oxford, and the substitution of Mr. Gathorne Hardy. Another illustration of the same spirit was given by the governing body at Cambridge when it rejected Mr. Henry Yates Thompson's offer to establish in that university an American lectureship. We called attention at the time to the remarkable literature of the controversy which then at once arose between the friends of the proposed measure and its enemies—the men of the university whose names are known outside of it and the men whose names are not. It was a record which showed pretty conclusively that ignorance of America is a part of an Englishman's education, and was excellent as an exhibition of the state of mind of which we have been speaking. And just now, at Oxford, the non-resident members of Convocation have refused to elect Mr. J. E. Thorold Rogers to the chair of political economy, which he has ably filled for the last five years. His offence consisted in holding liberal opinions in politics, and there is good authority for the statement that the friends of Mr. Bonamy Price, the successful candidate, secured his election by dishonorable methods. The election of a professor of science was turned into a political party contest—a thing not to be commended, though perhaps to have been expected. Not only, however, was this so, but amid the appeals to political and ecclesiastical prejudice there were falsehoods also, which were circulated secretly on a calculation that before they could be discovered and refuted it would be too late for a refutation to be of any effect. Mr. Price's friends—not all of them, but some of them—issued private circulars charging him with Dissenting sympathies, or want of fidelity to the Established Church, the sole foundation for the charge being his having attended a political meeting held in a Baptist meeting-house, in default of any other suitable room. The misrepresentation was exposed, but not till it had done its work. Mr. Rogers was defeated by a large majority. The expected result was obtained; so was another one, no doubt—the lowering of the character of the university by the infliction of punishment on a teacher for his political opinions, and by doing so at the expense of very mean electioneering expedients.

—Mr. Gladstone has a decided turn for literary pursuits—a weakness it may be called, considering its results. For he produces works which really might, on the whole, as well be left unproduced. In support of this assertion we should cite his book on Homer—it was in that, by the way, if we remember right, that the comparison was made between the goddess Minerva and the magneto-electric telegraph—his early book on the connection of the church with the state, which was destroyed with a great destruction by Macaulay, and a late criticism on Sir Walter Scott as poet and novelist. Very evidently Mr. Gladstone is a statesman imbued with literature, and is far enough from being a valuable literary critic or really a literary man. No one, we should say, who is familiar with his books will be surprised to hear that, in his opinion, if the great names of literature were to be mentioned in their proper order, Scott's would be third! Shakespeare's and Homer's would be above his, and except theirs no one's. Mr. Gladstone's Greek, one would have thought, ought to have prevented his committing himself to such a judgment, even if he had forgotten modern men, such as Cervantes and Molière and Dante and Goethe and the scores more of "the dead who rule the world" with a power that makes the power of Scott seem small indeed. From his praises of Scott for the moral effect of his writings there is perhaps nothing to be detracted. And just now there is need to insist that a writer of fiction ought to be a good man. For how very far indeed one fares through literature before coming upon a man with a sounder, wholesomer nature than Scott's appears—commonplace as it was in some of its elements—as it is exhibited in his novels. But one wonders a little at the almost unqualified praise which the head of the Liberal party gives Scott as a writer of historical novels. Surely Scott's novels left uncorrected would have made a statue of Cromwell bought with public money an impossibility in England. To his own question,

> "Shall we match the base Skippon, and Massey and Brown,
> With the barons of England who fight for the crown?"

every one of the novels that deal with the struggle between prerogative and the rights of all the rest of the people except the kings gives a decided answer in the negative. And it is not to be forgotten that deeper students of mediævalism than Mr. Gladstone—such students as Mr. Ruskin and Baron Bunsen—have little hesitation in condemning as rubbish to be got out of the way Scott's presentation of feudal times and men. It seems not doubtful that Scott is truly great only when he is Scotch. There is critical justness in the contemporary name for his works—"the Scotch novels"—and good reason on the side of those who praise his "Antiquary" above all the rest of his writing in prose, and good reason, too, on the side of those who put almost all his prose above almost all his poetry. In another view Mr. Gladstone's lecture before the Hawarden Literary Association is wholly pleasant, and so also, looked at in the same way, are his other books and lectures. For he then appears as one of those statesmen, hardly to be found out of England, who habitually seek in pure literature relaxation from their regular labor. Such vacation work may not do much for literature—literature also, as well as law or legislation, is a mistress to be assiduously wooed and hardly won—but of its excellent effect on the man there can be no question.

—One of the many curious customs that obtain in the great schools of England is chronicled in the latest English papers. Eton has a new head master, the Reverend Mr. Hornby; so, in accordance with a long established usage, a large birch adorned with blue ribbons was the other day presented to him with much ceremony at the beginning of eleven o'clock school. Mr. Hornby replied in what may be called a few "very appropriate words"—that is, he said he hoped he should very seldom have occasion to use the implement, and referred to the system of mutual confidence which had always existed between the late head master, Doctor Balston, and the school. It is noticeable that, whatever the reason may be, nothing of this kind ever takes place in democratic America. We have abundance of college customs, many of them puerile, almost painfully silly, and some of them commendably sensible in spirit and productive of good results. For example, we have the "mock-parts" morning of Harvard, when the more or less fierce democracy of that university devotes itself to giving and taking criticism of undergraduate character and manners as sharp and salutary as that with which members of the Oneida Community are in the habit of sweetening existence for each other. But among all our college usages of the non-serious sort there is none, we believe, in which any part is borne by the teachers. The American school or college is less than the English a community of which the instructor is a part, and in the total life of which, the play life as well as the business life, he has his share. Among us the master always "means business," and jokes are not tolerated except where both parties to them are in pupilage.

—A writer in the London Times writes a chapter of the history of the British postal service since the days of Sir Rowland Hill's great reformation of it, and, as writers on the postal service are easily able to do, makes a very interesting paper. He records, for instance, the curious fact that within quite recent times a genuine new popular superstition has risen and spread widely. At the Dead Letter Department letters are continually received from people who are not too ignorant to write, yet who seem to entertain the extraordinary notion that the secretary or head of the department is in actual communication with Death himself; at any rate, that there is some connection, more or less direct, between the King of Terrors and the routine business of the dead-letter branch of the service. One correspondent begs that no more letters be returned, as they bring death into the house; another complains that since a letter had been returned to her no less than twenty-four persons had died in her neighborhood; another tells the secretary that in case any more of those dead letters should come back for her he is to burn them and "never send them back to me to heare after that. Our letters get carried and offered and done I cannot tell what with," she says, in a plaintive way, "and murders is the end of it." If this letter recalls the image of Mrs. Gummidge, here is one—or, rather, the address of one—which might have been written by Sarah Gamp: "E. R——, a cook as lived tempery with a mrs. L——, or some such a name, a shoemaker in Castle street about No. — Hobern in 1851, try to make this out she is a Welch person about 5 feet 1 stoutish. Lives in service someware in London or naboured. London." Another odd address, which was guessed out by a "blind" man—that is to say, by a person expert in making out "blind" addresses—was "Mr. Owl O'Neil, at the Post-Office." Sir Rowland Hill was meant. Stranger than any of the out-of-the-way addresses is the fact that in 1865 no less than 12,000 letters were posted in Great Britain without any address at all. They contained valuables and money to the amount of £3,700. The total number of letters sent through the mails goes on increasing in a ratio far higher than the increase in population would alone warrant; in 1839 the number was about 75,000,000—that was before the reduction of postage; now, the number of articles—letters, papers, books, samples, and so on—passing through the Post-Office can hardly be less than 1,000,000,000; in 1865 it was 819,000,000. We use round numbers. It may readily be believed that for the transaction of this vast amount of business the utmost order and perfection of machinery are requisite, and it is the unvarying testimony of those who write upon the subject that there seems to be almost nothing left to desire in the way of improvement. The spirit of improvement, at any rate, seems present in full force, and there could hardly be a more striking contrast than that between the present official ideal and the ideal expressed in a recorded remark made by a British Postmaster-General of a couple of hundred years ago. He was asked by some gentlemen of Warwick not to delay their letters by sending them to Warwick by way of Coventry. "Nay," he said, "from London, through Coventry, to Warwick is more than eighty miles, so that we can charge threepence a letter going that way; whereas we could only charge twopence a letter if they went direct." Now, the English postal service is managed entirely, we may say, in the interest of the people—although, to be sure, it has a surplus revenue of about two millions sterling—and is probably the best managed department of the whole civil service of the empire.

—To find why the science of jurisprudence has been so little cultivated by English lawyers is not hard. It would not be easy to prove that in any other field of intellectual labor there have ever been at work heads much abler than those which, during the last thousand years, have been making the common law, and, after making it, have reasoned so cogently and acutely upon its applications. A good deal of the hardest work of some of the best minds of one of the ablest nations in all history has for its result the common law of England. Yet the irrationality, the arbitrariness of the premises on which is based very much of this astonishingly subtle and forcible reasoning is proverbial, and jurisprudence, which is the philosophy of laws, the application to law of right reason, the exhibition of the fundamental rules of justice and common sense that underlie, or ought to underlie, the statutes of states—this has little chance of being studied in a country where to know what has been done is, to the lawyer, knowledge of vastly more importance than to know what ought to be done. On our continent, even in that part of it occupied by British subjects, the American lawyer is better off than his brother in England. To him, too, skill in technicalities and a minute knowledge of precedents is necessary, for we, too, live under the common law. But it is the common law immensely modified by statutes. Yet there is no doubt that a man who should prepare a good treatise on jurisprudence would confer on the students and teachers of law among us, as well as upon the same classes in England, extraordinary benefit. The rising generation of lawyers has lost much in losing the accomplished John Austin, who seemed capable of supplying the want so long felt and so really to be deplored; of raising their thoughts, as Lord Stair said, "to a distinct consideration of the fountains and principles of the peculiar laws of all nations, which common reason makes intelligible to the judicious when plainly and orderly proposed." For, as the same author asserts, "no man can be a knowing lawyer in any nation who hath not well pondered and digested in his mind the common law of the world, from whence the interpretations, extensions, and limitations of all statutes and interpretations must be brought." There is not, so far as we know, any hope of our immediately getting such a work—profitable "not only for judges and lawyers, but for all persons of honor and distinction." We know of one which is partly prepared, and which ought to be a good one; but it is only partly prepared. And we now learn of another that exists as a fragment. The latter is by James Lorimer, Regius Professor of Public Law and of the Law of Nature and Nations in the University of Edinburgh. It is no larger than a small pamphlet, and is the introductory lecture of a course which Professor Lorimer would have been now delivering had he not been prevented by sickness from filling his chair. In the one lecture printed the author disposes of the ordinary definitions of the law of nature, defines natural right, and shows the value of the philosophic study of law, drawing some of his illustrations from recent American history—as, for example proving the importance of the study of jurisprudence by relating the confessed failure made by two of our statesmen in dealing with the blockade question, a failure that would not have been made, Mr. Lorimer believes, if either Mr. Seward or Mr. Lincoln had not been so anxious to follow rules that they were unable to act according to reason. "I believe, indeed," he says, "that not a few of the blunders that are committed in sudden emergencies by consuls and captains in the navy arise from a hasty and imperfect reference to Wheaton or Vattel, and would be avoided if they had neither Wheaton nor Vattel to refer to, but carried about with them in their heads some sort of rational conception of the principles of general jurisprudence"—a remark that will seem still truer if one recollects Kilpatrick and Commodore Rogers in the harbor of Valparaiso a year or two ago. The book, which is well written, is published at Edinburgh by Edmonston & Douglas, and has for its title "Reasons for the Study of Jurisprudence as a Science."

—The Austrian frigate Novara—the same which the other day took back Maximilian's remains from Vera Cruz to Trieste—was sent on a scientific expedition in 1857, and was gone two years, her return home having been precipitated by the outbreak of the war between France and Austria in 1859, of which the commander received news at Rio Janeiro, but which need not in reality have changed his plans, as orders had been issued by the French Government to have the ship respected wherever she might be. She was under the command of the present Austrian Minister of Commerce, and had a scientific commission on board, composed of Dr. Hochstetter as geologist, Drs. Schwartz and Jelinck as botanists, and Messrs. Frauenfeld and Zelebor as zoölogists, while Dr. Carl Von Schertzer devoted himself to ethnography and geography in their relations to commerce and social economy. The expedition before starting received some valuable instructions and suggestions from Humboldt, and visited in succession Rio Janeiro, Cape of Good Hope, the islands of St. Paul and Amsterdam, Ceylon, Madras, the Nicobar Islands, Singapore, Batavia, Manila, Hong Kong, Shanghai, Sydney, Auckland, Tahiti, and Valparaiso. The collections it brought back have been placed in a special museum in Vienna, and the commission is hard at work preparing a report, which is to be published in splendid style at the expense of the Government, but the cost of which is to be so great that it has been delayed by the financial and political difficulties of the empire. It is to be divided into seven parts, each devoted to a special subject. M. Von Schertzer, the political economist, has in the meantime published an account of the voyage, in two volumes, which has had the enormous sale (for Germany) of 25,000 copies, and he has recently published another volume containing the statistical results of his observations, which is a most important and valuable contribution to the literature of political economy, owing to the philosophic spirit with which his investigations have been conducted, and the absolute indifference which he displays throughout to the bearing of his observations on any theory of government or society. This is a field in which the Germans, considering the bulk of their labors in others, have done comparatively little, and yet they are, perhaps, better fitted for it than any other people, owing to their remarkable power of surrounding themselves with a purely scientific atmosphere. The French or English or American economist rarely forgets that he is a politician; while the German can generally, if he pleases, manage to forget everything but the matter in hand.

With the French in Mexico. By J. F. Elton, late of the 98th Regiment, etc. (Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. New York: James Miller. 1867.)—Mr. Elton reached Vera Cruz in April, 1866, and left that port for home in January, 1867. He was just in time to witness the turning of the tide against the Empire as the French troops began to withdraw from the country, and he had the best opportunities for observing the process of evacuation. His narrative is to be recommended for its clearness in a military point of view, showing the last offensive operations of the French, and presenting forcibly the situation in which their retirement left the unfortunate Maximilian. Mr. Elton traversed the line from the capital to Saltillo.—the northernmost outpost of the French—but participated in only a single engagement, which perhaps is rather to be described as a pursuit, more terræ. One of the incidents of it was a "leva," enforced by the Mexican auxiliaries on the able-bodied men of a harmless little village, in spite of the piteous entreaties of their wives. The French refused to interfere, though the treaty of Miramar gave them supreme command of mixed troops. This was another of the customs of the country; one that Maximilian, on his advent, attempted to abolish in favor of the French method of conscription. Afterwards he felt obliged to tolerate that, as he did General Forey's contre-guerillas, the summary execution of all armed adversaries, and general retaliation—like that practised, for instance, by the Egyptians, when "they sallied forth from Tejeria to kill every man in a village hard by, where one of their comrades had been assassinated" (p. 12). It is a wonder, indeed, that the Emperor did not early perceive, from the demonstrations of his own party, the Clericals, how hopelessly incongruous were his bon naturel and European training and the character of the people whom he had undertaken to reconcile and govern. Mr. Elton mentions the astonishment caused by Maximilian's proposing to pay a fair indemnity to the purchasers of the confiscated church estates, the complete restoration of which was one of the first clerical demands; and the horror he excited by ordering civil registers of births, deaths, and marriages to be kept. In fact, the macadamized road to Chapultepec and the laying out of the plaza at capital are, perhaps, the most enduring traces of the Imperial régime.

The author's style is conversational and familiar, and leaves a favorable impression of his candor. His descriptions of scenery and of people are well executed and interesting. Frequently he is reminded of India—at Puebla of Lucknow, at San Luis Potosi of Delhi. The Indians seem to have attracted him—through their history chiefly—and while he does not overlook their peonage, he notes their inherited "exquisite taste and fondness for flowers," and the preference of their women for bright colors in dress. The engravings scattered through the book are well cut, and have an authentic air, and we are altogether obliged to Mr. Elton as an honest man who has not written in vain.

The Great Exhibition; with Continental Sketches, Practical and Humorous. By Howard Payson Arnold. (New York: Hurd & Houghton. 1868.)—This book had already been published once before it appeared in book form. Its contents were sent as letters to the Boston Post, a paper which for many years has employed foreign correspondents of much cleverness, though never any of the highest ability. Its letters from abroad have often been the perfection of gossip, and Mr. Arnold was a worthy successor of "Spiridion" in "Spiridion's" favorite walk. A newspaper might easily do worse, in fact it would be with difficulty that any American newspaper should do better, than to employ Mr. Arnold to write for its readers amusing, intelligent, rather trivial letters from abroad. But we confess ourselves unable to praise the book before us as a book. Its contents had answered their purpose before the second publication, and in laying claim to the honors of an author Mr. Arnold has courted trial by a standard the application of which he is not able to bear. The practical part of his "Continental Sketches" may be found, more practical, in the guide-books; the humorous part—why, a man consents to read it in his morning paper. This is a sample of it: "My friend was in perfect unison with the scene around, and wore lemon-colored gloves and a large bouquet, radiant as if cut from a solar spectre. 'Balm of a thousand flowers,' said I in my festivest mood, 'whither away?' He smole a smile slightly clouded with contempt, and said ——" What he said is not of importance. We do not assert that his remarks are not to some extent amusing; we do not mind confessing that we read many pages of matter not very dissimilar with some pleasure; we can safely promise anybody who is fond of such reading that he may get a good deal of it in the five hundred pages of Mr. Arnold's volume; but it seems to us proper to say that it would have been as well, on the whole, if Mr. Arnold could have contented himself with his reputation as a lively correspondent. As it is, he has made a bad enough book out of good enough letters.

A French Country Family. By Madame De Witt, née Guizot. Translated by Dinah Mulock Craik. (New York: Harper & Brothers. 1868.)—This is rather an uninteresting and prosaic little story, which is, perhaps, well enough adapted to the intellectual requirements of good but unimaginative children of very tender years. The translator's preface expresses the belief that in giving it an English dress a benefit is conferred not only upon children, but on their parents also, since it will afford the latter an opportunity to correct an erroneous opinion too commonly entertained, and inform the young folks that French society is not altogether such as it is depicted in the modern French novel. For more satisfactory as well as more entertaining proof of that fact we should, however, refer the adult reader to "A Week in a French Country House," by Madame Sartoris, or to Madame Michelet's "Story of My Childhood."

Madame De Witt's book introduces us only to the society of one small Protestant family, each member of which is far too monotonously good to answer any purpose as an example, unless, indeed, he might serve to point a moral, which was probably not contemplated by the author, as to the fatally uninteresting nature of so much perfection. True, one of the children has a fault—but it is, after all, only an overgrown virtue—a desire to overrule others for their good, and assume everybody's responsibilities and cares. Becoming aware, however, at the age of twelve years, of her evil tendencies, a six weeks' visit to Paris, during which she heroically spends her time in the school-room, instead of participating in the exciting gayeties of that capital, is quite sufficient to cure her of them.

We are sorry that Mrs. Craik selected this particular story for translation. Such a choice confirms a suspicion engendered by her recent original works, that the pen which once gave us novels so good as were "John Halifax" and "The Head of the Family," is now given over to tameness and puerility.

Waverley Novels. Waverley. (New York: D. Appleton & Co. 1868.)—This edition of Scott's novels has all the merits of the popular edition of Dickens issued by the same house, and is uniform with it in size, type, and paper. If any one had wished in gold times to buy either of these series he would have found them cheap, and they are now therefore remarkably cheap. They have, of course, the disadvantage of compression, but the print is as clear as it can be made. For the library they will not compete with the Ticknor & Fields "Waverley" or large-size Dickens; in all other respects they are adapted for a circulation commensurate with the fame of their authors. They are apparently patterned after the cheap edition of Mr. Hotten, the London publisher.

Das moderne Völkerrecht der civilisirten Staaten (The Modern Law of Nations). Von Doctor T. C. Bluntschli. (New York: L. W. Schmidt.)—Doctor Bluntschli's work is a valuable addition to other excellent works on the same subject. It is clear, terse, and exhaustive; its numerous theses read like statutes. We have already referred (see the Nation of December 12, 1867) to the author's purpose in preparing this code, and the immediate occasion of his so doing. For the benefit of those who may wish to consult it, we shall briefly outline the contents of the book. In the introduction Doctor Bluntschli dwells on the importance and progress of the law of nations, gives an account of its history in all ages, of its emancipation from religious prejudices, of the measures against slavery, and of religious liberty. He then touches upon embassies and consulates, the law as to foreigners, common navigation, etc. Passing to the laws of war, he establishes the principle that the states are enemies and not the individuals. Neutrality and the right of national development and self-government form the concluding topics.

The work is divided into nine books, the first of which treats in general of the foundation, nature, and limits of the law of nations; the second, of the states and state systems; of the origin and recognition of new states, the influence of constitutional changes on the law of nations, of annexation and cession of territory, of sovereignty and legal equality; the third book treats of the heads of states, ambassadors and diplomatic bodies, agents and commissions, etc.; the fourth book speaks of territorial sovereignty, public waters, free seas, right of navigation, etc.; the fifth, of the relation of state sovereignty to the individual, the protection of personal liberty, protection of citizens in foreign lands, extradition and asylum; the sixth, of treaties, their requisites and effects, their form, of alliances; the seventh, of transgressions against the law of nations and its re-establishment, of intervention, umpire, of compulsory methods apart from war, self-defence by means of reprisal, retaliation, etc.; the eighth book treats of the law of war, the object and consequences of war, of lawful measures against the enemy's territory, against hostile and peaceful individuals in the enemy's country, of wounded, prisoners, hostages, exchange of prisoners, and release on parole, of the treatment of deserters, spies, traitors, robbers, rebels, etc., of the property of enemies and of peaceful individuals, of armistice, capitulation, and peace; the ninth and last book treats of neutrality in particular, its condition and duties, neutral commerce, contraband of war, right of search, of blockade and prizes.

THE MARCH NUMBER

OF

Lippincott's Magazine

CONTAINS, WITH OTHER ARTICLES,

LOUIS BLANC'S

EUROPEAN CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. DIXON'S NEW WORK.

SPIRITUAL WIVES.

BY W. HEPWORTH DIXON,

AUTHOR OF "NEW AMERICA," ETC.

Complete in one crown 8vo volume, tinted paper.

WITH PORTRAIT FROM STEEL.

Extra cloth, price $2 50.

"No more wondrous narrative of human passion and romance, no stranger contribution to the literature of psychology, than Mr. Dixon's book, has been published since man first began to seek after the laws that govern the moral and intellectual life of the human race."—London Globe.

"The subject of 'Spiritual Wives' is at once sensational, appalling, and full of deep interest. If we look at it simply as a system, it is replete with scenes which cannot be surpassed even in fiction."—London Morning Post.

"Mr. Dixon's book, which may be read from beginning to end without pause, is of absorbing interest. . . . He has, on the whole, treated a very difficult and delicate subject with great refinement and judgment, and he has certainly produced a book which is calculated to absorb the attention of every intelligent reader who opens it."—London Star.

 For Sale by all Booksellers, or will be sent by mail, postage free, on receipt of price, by

J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO.

Publishers,

PHILADELPHIA.

L. W. SCHMIDT,

GERMAN BOOKSELLER,

24 BARCLAY STREET, NEW YORK,

Imports regularly all the leading Foreign Publications, including Periodicals.

Foreign works noticed in THE NATION kept constantly on hand or procured to order.

25 CENTS A MONTH—$3 A YEAR.

THE BROADWAY,

NO. 7, FOR MARCH,

IS NOW READY, AND CONTAINS:

1. Brakespeare; or, the Fortunes of a Free Lance. By the author of "Guy Livingstone." With a full-page illustration. Chaps. XXIX. to XXXI.
2. London Newspapers. By HENRY SEDLEY, Editor of the Round Table.
3. Women's Novels.
4. The Story of 'Lorn Light: A Poem. By TOM HOOD. With a full-page illustration.
5. New York Theatres. By MOLYNEUX ST. JOHN. Part II.
6. Public Statues in London. By FRANCIS TURNER PALGRAVE. Part II.
7. Wall Street and American Finance. By ROBERT TOMES. With an illustration.
8. Second Thoughts. By F. C. BURNAND. Chaps. XVI. to XXI.
9. Change: A Poem. By DORA GREENWELL.

THE MICROSCOPE:

ITS HISTORY, CONSTRUCTION, AND APPLICATION; being a Familiar Introduction to the use of the instrument and the study of microscopical science. By JABEZ HOGG. With upwards of Five Hundred wood engravings, and Eight colored illustrations by Tuffin West. Crown 8vo, cloth, $3 50.

"One of the best of the numerous English works on popular science is this of Mr. Hogg's, of which the present edition purports to have been partly rewritten, and is profusely illustrated. As a treatise on microscopical science and art the book cannot vie with Frey, Carpenter, or Quickett, but it has, nevertheless, fulfilled the author's object, which seems to have been to excite, outside of scientific circles, a wide-spread desire to investigate the wonderful microcosm which the compound achromatic microscope has revealed. . . . . The colored plates added to this volume are very handsome, and generally correct. On the whole, the book is one to be recommended to persons of both sexes who can afford to purchase an instrument, and who desire a recreation healthful to mind and body, and a source of unending pleasure and surprise."—The Nation.

GEORGE ROUTLEDGE & SONS,

PUBLISHERS,

416 BROOME STREET,

NEW YORK.

RARE, CURIOUS, AND VALUABLE BOOKS,

In all Languages and Departments of Literature,

For sale by

GEO. P. PHILES & CO.,

172 Fulton Street, New York.

ANGELL ON CARRIERS—NEW EDITION.

LITTLE, BROWN & CO.,

BOSTON,

Publish this day:

A TREATISE ON THE LAW CONCERNING THE LIABILITIES AND RIGHTS OF COMMON CARRIERS. By JOSEPH K. ANGELL. Fourth edition. Revised and enlarged by JOHN LATHROP.

"Since the third edition of this work was published, in 1857, the law of Carriers has been so much considered by the Courts, that I have found it necessary, in order to bring the work down to the present time, to add sixty pages of new matter, containing over one thousand cases not cited in the previous edition. By adopting a uniform system of abbreviating the names of the reports, I have been able to add this large amount of new matter without increasing the size of the work."—Editor's Preface.

RECENTLY PUBLISHED:

THE BANKRUPT ACT OF 1867; compared with the Act of 1841, the English Bankrupt Law, and the Insolvency Law of Massachusetts. With a Digest of Decisions of the Courts of the United States, the several States, and of England, and with Forms of Proceeding. By EDWARD AVERY and GEORGE M. HOBBS. 8vo, law sheep, $4 50.

IN PRESS—NEARLY READY:

UNITED STATES STATUTES AT LARGE. VOL. XIV.

UNITED STATES DIGEST. VOL. XXIV.

UNITED STATES COMMERCIAL DIGEST.

ALSO:

BRAZIL AND THE BRAZILIANS. By REV. J. C. FLETCHER and REV. S. P. KIDDER. Eighth edition, revised and brought down to date. With 150 illustrations on steel, stone, and wood.

THE SPIRIT OF SEVENTY-SIX; or, THE COMING WOMAN. A Prophetic Drama. II. A Change of Base. III. Dr. Mondschein.

[These little comediettas were originally written only for presentation in private theatricals; but the interest with which the first has been received by the audiences before which it has been recently performed, has induced their publication in the present form.]

EVERETT'S ORATIONS. VOL. IV.

THE DIVINE PROVIDENCE.

BY EMANUEL SWEDENBORG.

1 vol. 12mo, extra cloth, bevelled boards, gilt top, $1 25.

The object of this work is to unfold the laws of order according to which the Lord's moral government is regulated. It shows that the Divine Providence works according to certain invariable laws; that it is universal, extending to the least things as well as to the greatest; that it has respect to what is eternal with man, and to things temporary only for the sake of what is eternal.

All the writings of Swedenborg and collateral works constantly on hand.

Publishing House of the New Jerusalem Church, 20 Cooper Union, New York.

JOS. R. PUTNAM, MANAGER,

 SEND FOR A CATALOGUE.

THE MOST POPULAR

BOTANICAL TEXT-BOOKS.

By Asa Gray, M.D.,

Fisher Professor of Natural Science in Harvard University.

This Series of Text-Books presents the latest and most accurate principles and developments of the science, and supplies the most full, clear, and admirable apparatus for the study of Botany in Schools, Academies, and Colleges ever prepared in this country, furnishing a comprehensive classification and description of all plants known among us for analysis.

For comprehensiveness of scope, exactness and clearness of description, accurate and scientific analysis of plants, and beauty of illustrations, they have no equal.

HOW PLANTS GROW. A Botany for Young People and Common Schools, intended as a simple introduction to Structural Botany; with popular Flora, or arrangement and description of Common Plants, both wild and cultivated. Illustrated by 500 engravings. Small 4to.

LESSONS IN BOTANY AND VEGETABLE PHYSIOLOGY. With a Copious Glossary, or Dictionary of Botanical Terms. Illustrated by 360 drawings. 8vo.

FIELD, FOREST, AND GARDEN BOTANY. (In press, and will be ready in September.) This will be an easy introduction to a knowledge of all the Common Plants of the United States (east of the Mississippi), both wild and cultivated. It will be the popular and most generally used Botanical Class-Book of the Series. 8vo.

MANUAL OF THE BOTANY OF THE NORTHERN UNITED STATES, Etc. With twenty plates, illustrating the Sedges, Grasses, Ferns, etc. 8vo.

STRUCTURAL AND SYSTEMATIC BOTANY AND VEGETABLE PHYSIOLOGY. (Botanical Text-Book.) Illustrated with over 1,300 cuts. 8vo.

FLORA OF THE SOUTHERN UNITED STATES. By A. W. Chapman, M.D. 1 vol., 620 pages.

 Correspondence and Orders will receive prompt attention.

Address the Publishers,

IVISON, PHINNEY, BLAKEMAN & CO.,

47 and 49 Greene Street, New York.

New Editions of IRVING'S WORKS.

CRAYON MISCELLANY, the sixth volume of the Knickerbocker edition of Irving, is now ready for delivery to subscribers. This edition has been prepared with great care, and is now in large demand.

It is sold to subscribers only at $2 25 per volume, and in half calf extra, $3 75.

The same volume of the People's Edition has just been published. This edition, in 16mo, neatly bound in dark cloth, will be issued in monthly volumes until completed. Price $1 25 per volume.

Recently Published:

THE BOOK OF THE ARTISTS. By Henry T. Tuckerman. 8vo, cloth, $5.

"A full and interesting record of the progress of art in the United States."—Boston Post.

THE LIFE OF MAJOR-GENERAL GREENE. By Geo. Washington Greene. 3 vols. 8vo. First volume now ready. 8vo, cloth, $4.

"Let every father give this book to his son, that the young generation, instead of receiving distorted impressions from the perusal of such trash as that of the Headley, Spencer, and Abbott school, may see in their true light the glory and shortcomings, the success and failures of that glorious period of American history, and that they may learn to emulate the example set by Greene and his compeers."—Evening Post.

WHAT IS FREE TRADE? By Emile Walter. 12mo, cloth, $1.

"The most telling statement of the leading principles of the free-trade theory ever published."—The Nation.

E PLURIBUS UNUM; or, AMERICAN NATIONALITY. By L. Bradford Prince, LL.B. 12mo, cloth, $1; paper, 40 cents.

"Mr. Prince's book is an admirable and timely exposition of the origin and grand features of our national Constitution."

G. P. PUTNAM & SON,

661 Broadway, New York.

NEW BOOKS

JUST PUBLISHED AND ADDED TO THE

AMERICAN EDUCATIONAL SERIES:

A Manual of Inorganic Chemistry,

Arranged to facilitate the Experimental Demonstration of the facts and principles of the science. By Charles W. Eliot and Frank H. Storer, Professors of Chemistry in the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. In cloth, 12mo, 645 pages, price $3 50.

Robinson's Differential and Integral Calculus,

For High Schools and Colleges. Edited by I. F. Quinby, A.M., LL.D. In sheep, 8vo, 472 pages, price $3 25.

The design has been to prepare a text-book thorough and comprehensive in its character; and while it does not cover the whole ground of this branch of mathematics, yet so far as the subject is treated it is progressive and complete; and it is confidently believed that in literary and scientific merit the work will more than justify the expectations of those who have waited long and patiently for it.

THE KEY to the above is in preparation, and will be ready in April, 1868.

Kiddle's New Manual of the Elements of Astronomy,

Descriptive and Mathematical; comprising the latest discoveries and theoretic views, with directions for the use of the Globes and for studying the Constellations. By Henry Kiddle, A.M. In cloth, 12mo, 284 pages, price $1 25.

This book is designed to take the place of the "Manual of Astronomy," published by the author in 1852. It is also offered by the Publishers to accompany Robinson's Mathematical Series. In method of treatment it is entirely new, and is much more comprehensive than the previous work, containing a fuller exposition of elementary principles, and embodying the chief results of astronomical research during the last fifteen years.

 Correspondence and orders will receive prompt attention.

IVISON, PHINNEY, BLAKEMAN & CO.,

47 and 49 Greene Street, New York.

A CHOICE LIBRARY EDITION,

In elegant crown 8vo volumes, handsomely printed on toned paper, of HALLAM'S COMPLETE WORKS.

From the last London edition, revised and corrected by the author; the most accurate and reliable extant. Comprising—Middle Ages, 3 vols.; Literature of Europe, 4 vols.; Constitutional History of England, 3 vols. Uniform sets, 10 vols.; or any of the works separately, $2 25 a vol.

UNIFORM WITH HALLAM:

MAY'S CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY OF ENGLAND,

From the Accession of George III. to 1860. By Thomas Erskine May, C.B. A continuation of Hallam's great work, tracing the progress and development of the British Constitution during an entire century. 2 vols., $2 25 a vol.

W. J. WIDDLETON, Publisher,

17 MERCER STREET, NEW YORK.

 For sale at principal Bookstores, and mailed, postpaid, on receipt of price, by the Publisher.

DAVID C. FRANCIS

(Formerly C. S. Francis & Co.),

DEALER IN NEW AND OLD BOOKS,

506 BROADWAY (up stairs).

Priced catalogues of books in stock issued from time to time, and will be forwarded free to any address.

Orders for any obtainable books promptly filled.

Binding executed in any style.

NOW READY, PRICE 25 CENTS EACH,

Parts I. and II. of the New Series of

THE PEOPLE'S MAGAZINE.

Two beautiful Chromo-Lithographs:

I. LITTLE RED RIDING-HOOD.

From a Painting by J. E. Millais, R.A.

II. THE DAWN OF CONSCIENCE.

From a Painting by J. Hayllar, R.A.

Also two full-page illustrations:

I. THE PET.

By Sir Edward Landseer, R.A.

II. BALMORAL CASTLE.

From a recent photograph.

Also, upwards of 30 excellent wood-engravings, illustrating the articles, which are highly interesting, and consist principally of Historical Sketches; Brief Biographies; Two Serial Stories of striking interest; Adventures by Land and Sea; Science and Art; Inventions and Discoveries; Domestic Economy; Natural History; Original Poetry, Literary Varieties, etc., etc.

Each number contains

SIXTY-FOUR LARGE PAGES,

on extra thick paper.

SINGLE NUMBERS, 25 CENTS,

For sale at most of the principal Book-stores and News-depots.

One or both the numbers sent by mail, prepaid, on receipt of price.

Subscription for the year, postage prepaid, $3; three copies, $8 50; five copies, $12 50; ten copies, $25, and an extra copy free.

Liberal inducements offered to canvassers and agents. Send for a circular.

Subscribers are requested to send their remittances direct to

POTT & AMERY, Publishers,

2 Cooper Union, New York.

LONDON BOOKS.

NOW OPENING,

A NEW INVOICE OF ENGLISH AND FOREIGN BOOKS.

A. DENHAM & CO.,

late Jayne & Denham,

4 CORTLANDT STREET (Up-Stairs).

 Priced Catalogue No. 8 now in press, and will be sent free of charge to any address.

ALLEN EBBS

183 Broadway (Up-stairs), New York,

IMPORTER OF

Fine Standard and Illustrated Books.

SHEFFIELD SCIENTIFIC SCHOOL OF YALE COLLEGE.

This department of Yale College, under the direction of President Woolsey, and Professors Dana, Norton, Lyman, Silliman, Whitney, Brush, Gilman, Johnson, Brewer, Rockwell, Eaton, Marsh, and Verrill, furnishes regular and special courses of instruction in Chemistry and Metallurgy, Civil, Mining, and Mechanical Engineering, Agriculture, Natural History, etc. For circulars address Prof. D. C. Gilman, Sec., New Haven, Conn. March, 1868.

The Nation.

VOL. VI.—NO. 141. THURSDAY, MARCH 12, 1868. { Five Dollars per Annum. Twelve Cents per Copy.

CONTENTS.

The Week..... 201

Editorial Articles:
The Senate and the People..... 204
Mr. J. S. Mill on the Irish Difficulty. 205
Presence..... 206
The "High-Toned Gentleman."..... 206
The Volunteers of 1867..... 208

Correspondence:
National Repudiation..... 209

Notes:
Literary..... 210
Spiritual Wives..... 213
Newport as It Was..... 213
Mr. Moss's Christian Commission.. 214
Life of Maximilian I., late Emperor of Mexico.—Randolph Honor..... 215–216

Five Dollars per annum, in advance; Six months, Three Dollars; Forty Dollars to Clubs of Ten; Clergymen, Four Dollars.

The Nation is sent till positively ordered discontinued, and all arrears have been paid. Subscribers are particularly requested to note the expiration of their subscriptions, and to forward what is due for the ensuing year, with or without further reminder from this office.

George Street, 30 Cornhill, London, E. C., Agent for the Receipt of Subscriptions and Advertisements.

E. L. GODKIN & CO., PUBLISHERS, Box 6732, NEW YORK CITY.

The Week.

Impeachment is still the subject of overshadowing interest in Congress, though both the Senate and House have been occupied with numerous other matters, and have got through considerable routine business. On the 4th of the month the Senate began by discussing the letter from Chief-Justice Chase, in which he took the ground that nothing can be done by the Senate in the matter of impeachment until the Senate is complete as a court, and that for its completeness as a court his presence as presiding officer is necessary. He expressed his willingness, however, to abide by the Senate's decision. Nothing came of this letter immediately, but afterwards, on Friday, the Senate practically adopted his views; by a vote of 24 to 20 it sustained his decision that on that day the Senate was not a court but a Senate, and, further, in deference to his judgment, it formally readopted the rules which it had adopted as a Senate. At one o'clock on Monday the House managers, accompanied by the House, proceeding to the Senate chamber, proclaimed themselves ready to exhibit articles of impeachment, and, silence having been commanded, the articles were read by Mr. Bingham. The trial thus opens just a year, to the day and almost the hour, before Mr. Johnson's successor is to be sworn in. On the same day, in the House, Mr. Jenckes's additional article was debated and referred to the managers. It charges the President with unlawful intent in endeavoring to assume control of the army. The House then went to the bar of the Senate, and on its return debated the case of Roderick R. Butler, member elect from Tennessee. The proposition before the House was to strike out for his benefit that part of the oath of office which makes the affiant declare that he never held office under any power hostile to the United States. On Friday the bill was passed. It establishes a precedent in accordance with which future members from Southern States will probably be admitted. Mr. Butler's disabilities were removed because his general record was good. On the same day a bill was passed which permits all persons relieved of political disabilities to take the same oath as that taken by Mr. Butler. Previously to this, on Thursday, the Senate called in the Chief-Justice, to whom Justice Nelson administered the oath required in such cases, and the Chief-Justice proceeded to administer it to the Senators. When he reached Mr. Wade the process was interrupted by Mr. Hendricks, of Indiana, challenging him as counsel might a juror. This gave rise to debate which consumed the rest of the day and which occupied all of Friday. The House passed a bill making the oldest justice on the bench the successor of the Chief-Justice in case of the death or removal of the latter. On Friday, as we have said, the Senate continued the debate as to Mr. Ward's right to participate in the trial, sustained Judge Chase's views as to the incompleteness of its organization as a court, and Mr. Hendricks withdrew his objections to Mr. Wade upon discerning him in his true character as a brother senator. The court was organized, and the President summoned to appear before it to-morrow. On Saturday nothing of general interest was done in either House. On Monday, Mr. George Vickers, senator from Maryland in place of Mr. Thomas, was sworn in. It was decided that Mr. Harvey, who, it will be remembered, is our Minister to Portugal, and whose salary has been withheld for about two years because he wrote a letter finding fault with Congress and approving Mr. Johnson's action, shall hereafter be paid for his services. Mr. Logan, in the House, had a singular story to tell about the pretended destruction and real preservation of cancelled bonds amounting in value to nearly nineteen millions of dollars. The Committee on Retrenchment are to investigate. On Tuesday nothing of interest was done in Senate or House.

There has been little news of importance from Washington during the week. A slight coolness has grown up between the Senate and the Chief-Justice owing to what has seemed to the majority in the former an over particularity on his part. He, in the first place, held that he ought to have been present at the organization of the Court of Impeachment, or, as the enthusiastic impeachers love to call it, "The High Court of Impeachment;" and, in the second place, he is understood to believe in his own right to vote at the trial, which is denied by the majority. This has raised a debate on the force of the word "preside" as used in the Constitution, and Mr. Conkling, of this State, in an elaborate argument attempted to show from English precedents that the presiding officer in a Court of Impeachment did not vote except as a peer. The result is that the Chief-Justice now begins to be roughly handled by many of his former friends and admirers. We should not be at all surprised to hear that, like Henry Ward Beecher, "he had turned his back on morals and religion." We trust he will at every stage of this proceeding stand on the law, the strict law, and nothing but the law, and let the "original impeachers" speak or feel as they may.

Mr. Johnson has retained Mr. David Dudley Field, of this city, as one of his counsel, and the rumors as to the line of defence to be followed are numerous and conflicting. The latest is, that he will make a general objection to the majority of the Senate on the ground that they have expressed opinions about his case; and if this point fails, as of course it will, he will object to be tried in the absence of Senators from the Southern States, and, this failing, he will resign, and thus avoid being sentenced to incapacity to hold office, in the hope that the Democratic party will take him up. Whether he can escape in this way from the jurisdiction of the Senate, after he has been regularly impeached, is more than doubtful; but we must say we think if it were possible for a President immediately after, or immediately before, impeachment to appeal to the country, it would furnish a very efficient, and the only efficient, preventive of the abuse of the impeaching power—that is, its employment by a hostile Congress against the President for simple difference of opinion—of which, when the public got familiarized with impeachment, there would be a great deal of danger. The question of giving Congress the power of impeaching for simple "maladministration" was discussed in the Constitutional Convention and voted down on the express ground that it would place the President at the mercy of the Senate, inasmuch as the term "maladministration" could be made to cover anything.

We have received since our last issue two or three additional letters reprobating our course in attempting to justify Congress for having, on the ground of Mr. Johnson's bad reputation, refused to give him time to get a judgment of the Supreme Court on his course before impeaching him. One of these letters, signed "K.," we should have printed had it reached us soon enough. They all, however, seem to be due to the impression on the part of the writers that impeachment is like an act of attainder, and that being impeached is the same thing as being convicted. Now, impeachment, as we understand it, is simply indictment before a proper tribunal which is judge both of the law and the facts. Therefore, the "horrible" thing which we excuse is the willingness of the House of Representatives to bring Mr. Johnson to trial before a competent court sworn to do justice. What we affirm is, that if all Presidents were permitted as a matter of course to refuse to obey any law until they had tested it on appeal in the Supreme Court, it would be in the power of any President, no matter what his character or motives, to arrest the execution of any law he pleased until its validity had been tried by a process the commencement and conduct of which would rest exclusively with him, and which he might delay for months or years. Therefore, we say that it is eminently fit and proper that the House of Representatives should, when a President declines to obey a law, satisfy themselves whether he is acting in good faith, and whether according him the delay necessary to procure a judicial ruling will or will not be injurious to the public interests. What the House has done in this instance is simply to say to Mr. Johnson: "You may be right in thinking the law unconstitutional, but we will not allow you to disobey it until you choose to get a judgment of the Supreme Court on it. Your character is such that we have no confidence in your good faith, and believe you merely seek delay in order to impede reconstruction. We shall put you on your trial at once before the Senate, and then have the whole matter reviewed there by a tribunal before which we shall be heard as well as you. If you can satisfy the Senate that you have acted in good faith, or that the law is unconstitutional, it will doubtless acquit you; but we shall not, as far as we are concerned, suffer you to go on." The fact is, the rant of "the original impeachers" about the nature and object of impeachment has caused a great many people, and our correspondents amongst the number, to forget what the process really is, to confound it with condemnation unheard, secret torture, or some other summary and inquisitorial mode of getting rid of political adversaries.

During the period of twelve years from 1856, when Fremont led the Republican party, to 1867, both years inclusive, the Republicans carried New Hampshire eleven times and the Democrats once. It would be better to say that the Democrats have never carried it, for in 1863, though the Republican candidate was not elected by the people, neither was the Democratic, and the election of a governor being thus thrown into the hands of the Legislature, that body chose Mr. Gilmore, the Republican candidate. This year, after a most animated canvass, after speeches in every school district in the State, and laborious calculations made by the committees of both parties, both anticipated victory, and fortified their hopes with elaborate estimates. There are less than eighty thousand voters in the State; there are few doubtful voters, for it is almost a proverb that every child born in New Hampshire is born a politician and always remains so, and it is true, too, that New Hampshire men adopt their political creed after thinking, are able to give a reason for the faith that is in them, and, as a rule, adhere to it with firmness; so it is not hard for the State committees to give a very near guess, if indeed it can be called a guess, as to how much of a victory the winning side is going to gain. The Democratic Committee claimed for Sinclair a majority of 2,974 in a total vote of 71,898. This, on the supposition that what the canvassers call the doubtful vote—2,506—would be equally divided between Sinclair and Harriman. The Republicans, on the other hand, expected a total vote of 76,531—a larger one than New Hampshire ever cast—and predicted for Harriman a majority of 3,234. Much of this figuring was done before the impeachment business came up, but though neither party made any change in its estimate on that account, the Democrats evidently lost faith as the election approached. On Tuesday Governor Harriman was re-elected by about the expected majority, in a total vote of at least 72,000, and certainly the largest which the State has ever cast.

The Committee on Retrenchment have made a report on the frauds in the collection of the revenue which more than confirms the statements recently made by Special Commissioner Wells. It says that out of $200,000,000 which the whiskey tax ought to bring in, not over $20,000,000 are collected; that princely fortunes have been amassed in this business by cheating the Government with the connivance of its own officials; that these officials are mostly knaves of the worst kind, and that the President, though knowing their knavery, will not remove them; that "some of the worst men secure appointments as revenue inspectors and agents;" "that some of these officers have lately graduated from the state prison, and others have been in the rebel service." It says, moreover, that the President "has encouraged their practices when the persons implicated would agree to pay money into the Democratic election fund." Now, what remedy does the committee propose for this shocking state of things? A thorough reform, the simple reader will doubtless answer, in the civil service, appointment on examination and certificates of character, tenure of office during good behavior, promotion for long and honest service; and, in fact, the removal of the whole machine from the corrupting influence of party politics. Nothing of the kind. Its remedy is simply the abolition of bonded warehouses and the reduction of the whiskey tax!

The New York Times on Saturday alleged, in reply to us, that the case between the bondholders and those who propose to cut down their interest is simply one of difference of opinion on the construction of the acts of Congress creating the debt, and that, therefore, it is not fair to charge the latter with dishonesty. We must, however, form our conclusions on this point by an examination of the circumstances. In this case we do not pay much attention to the claims of the repudiators to be considered simply honest dissentients; first, because the authorized agents of the Government, the authorized exponents of its meaning—its Secretary of the Treasury, the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means—and the loyal editors and orators went on for four mortal years assuring the world that United States bonds would be paid "principal and interest in coin," the public sending in the money freely on this understanding, and, we assert without fear, the Government well knowing that it would not have been lent on any other; but during the whole of this time not one of the present repudiators or their abettors opened his lips by way of warning, remonstrance, or explanation. Senator Sherman says, now, "these individual declarations of the Treasury officials had always embarrassed his mind more than any other." If so, why did he not speak out at the time? Why did he wait? How has he the courage to avow that he waited till the money was all paid in, and misrepresentation had done its work, before exposing it? Secondly, we pay no attention to this claim of honesty because "these differences of opinion," on a point affecting deeply the national credit, did not make their appearance till the opening of the Presidential campaign, and until the Democrats had first started the cry. In fact, the Times knows as well as we do, that the Republicans are going into this repudiation business just as they did into the Fenian business last year, and hope, by keeping abreast with the Democrats, to retain their hold on the ignorant or selfish or short-sighted, whom the prospect of sacrificing the public creditor might attract to the shop over the way. Their discovery, at this late date, that the Government is not bound to pay its debts in good money, imposes on very few, and we feel satisfied will not help the party in the long run.

The Times, however, really disposes of its own claim, that the repudiators are simply honest though erroneous construers of the law, by its counsel to the bondholders to accept Mr. Sherman's proposal as a matter of wisdom and prudence, inasmuch as by assenting to his conversion they "will silence the demand for taxation of the bonds which politicians will perhaps otherwise find irresistible," and it admits that "such taxation would be a clear violation of the contract." Now, this confirms all we said on this subject last week. Senator Sherman may be quite honest himself, but he is acting in this matter as the agent of those who are not. It must surely be by way of pleasantry that the Times asks us to ascribe the unwillingness of the repudiators to pay in coin to an honest difference of opinion, when it confesses in the same article that these very persons, if the bondholders do not yield to them on this point, will proceed to tax the bonds, which the Times admits would be "a clear violation of the contract." Stronger confirmation of the advice we gave the bondholders last week, "to cry out lustily" and not to trust their assailants, we could hardly wish for. In fact, the counsel of the Times to them to be "prudent" and "compromise," remind us of Dogberry's instructions to the constables about the thief—"to let him go, and thank God they were rid of a knave."

There continues to be more or less talk of cheating the public creditors in some shape or other, but it produces no impression on the home market, and little on the foreign one, owing to the general belief that it is buncombe, intended for campaign purposes. The probabilities are, that from now till November the Democratic and Republican politicians will vie with each other in professions of dishonesty, and that divers bills and resolutions aimed at the bondholders will be introduced into Congress for the purpose of persuading their dupes throughout the country that, as Mr. Perker wrote to Mr. Pickwick about the Bardell case, "everything is going on as well as can be expected." The impeachment will probably serve the good purpose, however, of preventing positive legislation between now and the adjournment, and the Presidential campaign once over, we may hope that discussion will have done its work, and the sober second thought of the people will drive repudiation and its advocates out of sight.

United States Consul Cushman, at Rome, fearing that the government at home might be left in a state of painful uncertainty as to the events of the Garibaldian campaign, went into the field with the Papal Zouaves, and was present at one battle. During the fight he was rendering assistance, he says, to a wounded man, when a Garibaldian rifleman opened on him and fired at him twice. Consul Cushman, after the second shot, became convinced that the Garibaldian's intentions were hostile, and, to use his own delicate language in his report to Mr. Seward, began to fear that "unpleasant results might ensue" if the Garibaldian kept on. He therefore seized a musket, and was preparing to reply, when his assailant withdrew. But just about this time somebody seems to have recognized him and noticed his valorous behavior, for a Mr. Rothwell promptly reported to Mr. Seward that the consul had been seen fighting valiantly on the Pope's side. Mr. Rothwell's letter having been forwarded to Mr. Cushman, he replies, first, that Rothwell is old, that his habits are eccentric, and that he is an indifferent artist, and that the facts of the case were as we have recounted them. Mr. Seward was, however, not satisfied, and in spite of Mr. Rothwell's age, habits, and the poor quality of his pictures, has given Mr. Cushman a very smart scolding, which all intelligent people will read with gusto, and warns him that nothing but very good behavior will enable him to retain his place. We must not lose this opportunity, however, of saying that the way to make consuls keep their places through good behavior is to make the places worth keeping, which of course brings us once more to Mr. Jenckes's Civil Service bill. We have before us at this moment a short sketch, from excellent authority, of the history of half-a-dozen United States consuls in one European country, which makes one's ears tingle as one reads it, being as it is the record of the drunkenness, fraud, and gross ignorance, amounting in one case to inability to spell, of a batch of United States officials pushed by political influence into posts which are not paid well enough for an honest or respectable man to hold them, and which, in nine cases out of ten, nobody but a broken-down adventurer is willing to accept.

The event of the week in England has been a debate on the Alabama matter brought on by Mr. Shaw Lefevre, the son of the former Speaker of the House, and who travelled in this country two years ago. The debate was very moderate in tone, Mr. Lefevre urging settlement by arbitration, and the Government saying little in opposition. Mr. Shaw Lefevre's speech was, though temperate, full of allusions to "the sad past," which must have been very galling to the Tory side of the House, particularly the passage in which he recalled the cheers with which Mr. Laird's insolent and indecent boast, that he had built the Alabama and was proud of it, was received by the House. The discussion cannot be said to have thrown any new light on the subject, but it showed that there is the best disposition amongst all parties in England to deal with it kindly and fairly, and to sit on the penitential stool about it to any reasonable extent.

The subject which most occupies English attention, however, is the Irish question, and the discussion of it has received a fresh impetus from the appearance of two pamphlets—one by Lord Russell and the other by John Stuart Mill. Lord Russell proposes the division of the whole of the property of the Irish Church establishment—about $100,000,000—amongst all the sects, Catholics included, in proportion to their population; that is, to endow them all, instead of endowing only one; to "introduce the practice of giving long leases," whatever that may mean; and to give the tenants a legal title to compensation for improvements. The introduction of long leases cannot, however, be effected without the very interference with "the rights of property" which Lord Russell earnestly deprecates, because landlords will not grant them unless they are forced to do so by law; and if they are forced to do so by law the very principle on which Mr. Mill bases his proposed perpetuity of tenure will be conceded. At present, leases of any length whatever have nearly disappeared in Ireland. Formerly they were common, but the rule now is tenancy at will. Lord Russell makes some confessions which are almost a justification of Fenianism; they are certainly an explanation of it. One is that he and other political leaders held twenty or thirty years ago the very opinions about some of the leading Irish grievances which they hold now, and yet that in that long interval they did nothing and attempted nothing.

Mr. Mill's scheme is, he confesses, and as every one may see, revolutionary, being nothing less than the transfer of the soil to actual occupiers in perpetuity, subject to the payment of a fixed rent to the landlord. It is, however, hardly more revolutionary than Stein's reform in Prussia, and we have not the slightest doubt it would do more for Ireland than that did for Prussia. The main objection to it is that there is no chance of carrying it at present. That it will come eventually we have no doubt. We have discussed more fully elsewhere the arguments by which Mr. Mill supports it.

There are rumors from Italy of an approaching attempt at insurrection in the southern provinces in the interest of the Pope and the King of Naples, aided, it is said, by donations of money and arms from Spain. The Italian cabinet has accordingly forwarded vigorous remonstrances to Paris against the plot-hatching which goes on at Rome, but with what result is not yet known. In the meantime the Government is making vigorous military preparations to meet the emergency. There is something wonderful in the blind stupidity with which the Papal Government continues to make its own duration impossible, by making itself every day more detestable and more contemptible.

Articles on any of the subjects usually discussed in this journal will be received from any quarter. If used, they will be liberally paid for; if rejected, they will be returned to the writers on the receipt of the requisite amount of postage stamps.

All Communications which pertain to the literary management of THE NATION should be addressed to the Editor.

THE SENATE AND THE PEOPLE.

THE New York Tribune, in replying to a correspondent on Wednesday week, who had asked what would happen in case the Supreme Court or the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment, were to decide differently on the question of the constitutionality of a law, replied, as we think correctly, that "the Constitution has vested the power of deciding upon the constitutionality of laws, in so far as may be necessary for purposes of impeachment, in the House and in the Senate sitting as a High Court of Impeachment, and not in the Supreme Court." Whether this be the true view of the matter or not is, at all events, a question which, though it may have a good deal of speculative interest, has no practical interest whatever. If the Senate decides a law to be constitutional, on the trial of the President for disobeying it, and removes him accordingly, the decision stands for the purpose of impeachment, no matter how the Supreme Court may afterwards decide, inasmuch as from the decision of the Senate there is no appeal. The sole remedy, if it decides wrongly, lies in the hands of the people, who, if they do not approve of the use Senators have made of their power, can turn them out of office on this ground on the expiration of their term. But, of course, as far as the particular case is concerned, this is no remedy at all, or only a very imperfect one. It can clear the President's fame, but it cannot restore him to office.

But the Tribune is not content with this. It lays down the doctrine that not only can the decision of the Senate not be interfered with by the Supreme Court, as far as regards the defendant against whom it may have been pronounced, but it is binding on the Supreme Court in all cases. Not only this, but if "the Supreme Court should construe the Constitution differently from the construction placed on it by the High Court of Impeachment," Congress "has either one of two ways to assert its constitutional supremacy, as the creator of the Supreme Court, over the thing it has created and as the immediate representative of the present people of the United States over the representative of the generations whose bodies moulder in the dust and whose opinions rust on the shelves of law libraries." "It can either impeach or remove the judges of the Supreme Court for construing the Constitution differently from the construction placed on it by the High Court of Impeachment, or it can reorganize the Supreme Court so as to make it consist of thirteen judges, and as many more as may be necessary."

According to this doctrine, the Senate and House are the sole judges of the constitutionality of the laws they themselves pass. The Supreme Court has no power to decide any law unconstitutional, and therefore no power to examine into the constitutionality of any law whatever, for the judges may be deposed and impeached should they come to a conclusion contrary to that of the majority in Congress. This, of course, amounts, in practice, to the total abolition of the Constitution, for when a legislature, as in England, may decide for itself what is constitutional or not, it is, as the British Parliament is, omnipotent. We are not going here to combat this position with regard to the powers of the Senate or its relation to the Supreme Court. The mere statement of it will be sufficient to answer our purpose with most readers of the Nation, and part of our purpose is to show to what heights of absurdity we are being carried by the continued supremacy, in the Republican party, of raging enthusiasts, who act and talk as if the experience of the human race and the principles of human nature were absolutely useless to persons engaged in the devising and using of political means. When a writer or speaker tells you, as Mr. Boutwell and the Tribune do, that the Supreme Court is "the creature of Congress," he has exactly the same advantage over you that a disputant has who denies that you have a nose on your face. You feel at once that he has got out of your reach, and that there is no use in pursuing him, because, like people in dreams, if you should press him hard he is sure to take to flying in the air, leaving you no resource except the very melancholy and insufficient one of calling him names from a distance.

We are not in the least afraid that either the Supreme Court or the Constitution will be disposed of by this last ingenious device. If the Senate ever attempted to assert any such authority as is here claimed for it, we feel right well assured the judges would do their duty and resist it, and let the Senate impeach them if it dared; and we are equally well assured that if the Senate did impeach, the sane men of the United States would be found sufficiently numerous at the next election to recall the Senate to its senses. Whenever the people get tired of the Supreme Court, they will abolish it or restrict its powers in the regular way by an amendment to the Constitution, and not by conniving at such a ridiculous farce as the interpretation in last resort of a written constitution by the very body which the instrument was framed to restrain.

But this is not all. We were curious to learn what kind of law it was which this new tribunal of the Tribune's was to administer, and what principles or rules of construction it was to follow in interpreting the Constitution and imposing its decisions on the Supreme Court. We accordingly turned to another organ of the same school of feelers—they would, we feel sure, resent being called "thinkers"—the Independent. In an article on impeachment in that journal last week, it said:

"The issue is one in which the people have an immense stake, and their relations to the Senate in this crisis are very different from those existing between themselves and an ordinary jury. The facts are well known to them; the law, in spite of all that ingenious casuists may say, is so simple as to be within their comprehension; and feeling, as they do, that the life or death of the republic may depend upon the result, they ought to, and will exercise their right not only to watch the trial at every step of its progress, but to express their convictions as to the duty of the Senate in the verdict which it must pronounce."

. . . . . .

"We hold it, therefore, to be the duty of the friends of liberty everywhere to let the Senate know that they are watching the trial with eager, anxious interest; that they desire and expect a verdict of guilty upon the evidence now before the country; and that they will sustain such a verdict with one united voice, and with all the power at their command. Senators will doubtless think much and say little; but they will recognize the right of their constituents to make known to them their feelings and convictions. Above all, they will respect the right of the people to declare their sentiments freely, and to take all proper measures to create a public opinion that shall demand and sustain a verdict in accordance with their judgment. To deny this right would be alike prudish and preposterous.

. . . . . .

"Citizens should write to their immediate representatives in the Senate, not in the language of menace or dictation, but respectfully reminding them of their duty in this momentous crisis, and assuring them of the support and gratitude of the people when that duty shall have been discharged. The mails going to Washington from every part of the country should be burdened with such letters, and the press should do all in its power to create an enlightened, wholesome, and courageous public opinion.

"It is fearful to think of the calamities that would probably ensue if the President should escape his just deserts through the weakness, the personal ambition, or the treachery of individual senators; and, on the other hand, it would be impossible to exaggerate the benefits that would result from his impeachment and removal. Impeachment would be the triumph of law over anarchy, of justice over oppression, of patriotism over treason. The defeat of the measure would put Congress under the heel of an exultant traitor, expose the emancipated bondmen to untold horrors, and fill the friends of constitutional freedom everywhere with discouragement and dismay. Christians of every denomination should offer unceasing prayer to God that such calamities may be averted, and the country saved with a great salvation."

Here we have it explained how the Senate is to form the judgment which the country is to accept as a legal decision from a "High Court of Impeachment," which is to bind the Supreme Court in all cases, and for dissenting from which trained jurists, sworn to do justice without fear or favor, are to be impeached and deposed. "Citizens" all over the country are to get "the facts" from the letters of those accurate, judicial-minded, and eminently trustworthy chroniclers, the Washington correspondents of the daily papers; they are then to make up their minds as to "the law" of the matter under the guidance of the dry and austere intellects which produce the editorials in our more "advanced" organs of political thought, with occasional assistance from the speeches of Mr. Stevens, Mr. Ashley, General Butler, and other worshippers of pure reason; and then, having made up their minds as to the judgment the Senate ought to deliver, they are to "burden the mails" with letters to "their immediate representatives," telling them firmly but respectfully what they ought to do in the premises. They are, moreover, to offer "unceasing prayer to God" for a verdict of guilty, and in their prayers, of course, to think and speak of such a verdict as "a great salvation."

Of course we know very well that the Senate would be as much amused by this plan of deciding on the constitutionality of laws as all men of intelligence and education throughout the country will be when they hear of it. We comment on it not for the purpose of warning anybody against it—for we do not believe the Nation is read by anybody who needs such warning—but for the purpose of calling the attention of all those who believe that it is on popular training and popular tradition, even more than on written constitutions or legal enactments, that the preservation of free government depends, to the kind of education in jurisprudence and political philosophy which an immense body of the very best people (morally) that the country contains are now receiving during the present political crisis. The Tribune and Independent both enjoy an enormous circulation amongst a very excellent portion of the community, whose consciences the anti-slavery and temperance agitations have cultivated out of all proportion to their intellects, and whose opinions now exert a very powerful influence in politics, and who actually seem more and more in favor every day of making, by indirect means, a total change in the structure of the Government, simply because a man whose stupidity, wickedness, meanness, and contemptibleness they are never tired of dwelling upon has, by a deplorable accident, made his way into the Presidential chair. Nor is this all; they are basing this change on doctrines which set reason and history at naught, and on which it needs but a little knowledge of human nature to know that no permanent or valuable political fabric ever has been or can be set up. We believe in liberty, and we believe in equality, but we believe, too, that one of the ends of the Almighty in endowing men with memory and judgment was that they might use them in that most difficult of all the arts, the art of government.

We cannot help saying one word to those who propose during the next week or two to occupy themselves with "unceasing prayer to God" for Andrew Johnson's conviction, and it is this: In discussing political questions with our fellow-men, the difference between the wisest and most foolish of us is, after all, so small that we may fairly feel great confidence in our own opinions, and show our confidence in our language and demeanor. Confidence is necessary to earnestness, and earnestness, next after knowledge, occupies the highest place amongst the instruments of persuasion. But when we carry our politics into the presence of our Maker, the greatest statesman and wisest jurist is what Thaddeus Stevens would call "an impudent citizen," if he pretends that he knows anything at all, or if anything finds its way to his lips but a confession of his own ignorance and shortsightedness and feebleness. To pray, therefore, that some little device which we, who do not see one hour or one minute before us, have fixed on as the way of salvation, may be carried into execution, is to presume unwarrantably on God's pity and indulgence, to presume even more than religious newspapers or "radical reformers" are justified in presuming. The prayer for those to pray who desire the Almighty to exert an immediate influence on the result of the pending trial at Washington is not that the verdict may be this way or that way—for nobody, not even the Reconstruction Committee, knows or will ever know what verdict will best serve God's purposes—but that He may endue the Senate with grace, wisdom, and understanding, open their minds to the truth, quicken their love of justice, and strengthen their consciences to resist clamor, clap-trap, and enthusiasm.

MR. J. S. MILL ON THE IRISH DIFFICULTY.

Two members of the Liberal party in England have entered the field, in advance of any movement in the House of Commons, with pamphlets on the Irish question. One is Lord Russell and the other Mr. J. S. Mill. Lord Russell's remedy may be briefly described as a proposal for the endowment of the Catholic equally with the Protestant clergy, and the concession to tenants of a legal right to compensation for their improvements. But he shows on the whole such a great ignorance of Ireland, and such a very imperfect appreciation of the nature of the difficulty with which he is dealing, that it is only the author's position which gives the pamphlet any claim to notice.

Mr. Mill's essay is, on the other hand, one of those singularly powerful and courageous attempts to bring philosophical principles within the reach of the practical politician, for which he is now famous, and which have undoubtedly contributed more than any other single cause to the extremely rapid progress of political radicalism in England within the last ten years. There have been men who took up positions as advanced as he, and who brought to the defence of them courage and mental resources just as great, but they wanted what has made him a political power, and that is the faculty of bringing his forces down on the open ground, and fighting the hosts of conservatism with their own weapons and own tactics. Bentham, for instance, bombarded English society with an arsenal far better furnished than Mill's, but from such a distance that his projectiles all sunk into the earth, and, in spite of Dumont's excavations, produced little or no direct impression. Most of the other radical chiefs have found their philosophy deprived of most of its weight by the fact that they were politicians before becoming philosophers, and were never able thoroughly to persuade the public that their philosophy was not based on their politics rather than their politics on their philosophy. Moreover, no man ever passed his prime in the political arena without infusing more or less passion either into his thought or his style. Mr. Mill has enjoyed the advantage of having formed both his mental habits and his style in the fields of abstract thought, and of having entered political life with a reputation already built up. More luckily still, his style, instead of being subtle or ornate or vivid, is a perfect match for his thinking—clear, cold, thoroughly intellectual, almost incapable of any strong display of feeling—in fact, the style of all others to cow an adversary whose education, like that of the governing classes in England, has prepared him not only to distrust rhetoric, but to treat it as a sure sign of weakness. Mr. Mill not only has enlisted under his flag, therefore, a great number of the younger men of the kind who, in the last generation, became promising Whigs like Macaulay, but he has caused Tories to turn and draw who would have gone on for many a day without heeding Mr. Bright's sonorous challenges or even Goldwin Smith's keener, bitterer, and more polished invective. He is, in fact, doing for the radicals what Cromwell did for the Roundheads, and his appearance in the field at important junctures such as the American war, and now the discussion of the Irish question, gives a turn to the fortunes of the day which, though the result may be remote, makes its character certain; and this, not through courage or impetuosity so much as through arms and discipline. There are thousands of Englishmen whose tendencies and sympathies are all radical, but who hang back, through intellectual timidity, in exciting crises, whom Mr. Mill's arrival on the ground causes to throw doubts and hesitations aside and plunge into the fray in the full assurance of victory.

His utterance on the Irish question is, therefore, exceedingly important, as it gives to the most radical of all remedies—so radical that people claiming the character of "thinkers" have hitherto only spoken of it in undertones, and that, when produced by Mr. Bright in a much milder form, it was treated as another piece of his demagogism—the rank and honors of a real specific sanctioned by reason and experience. We mean, of course, the surrender of the land to the actual occupiers. Mr. Mill is of opinion, and preaches it with his accustomed vigor and clearness, that landlordism is the curse of Ireland—that the system of land tenure which prevails there can only work well where it rests on feudal traditions firmly rooted and generally accepted, or on free contract. Where feudal traditions are still firmly rooted, as they are in England and parts of Germany, the landlord is not simply the landowner; he is a political superior, whose superiority the tenants treat as part of the natural order of society, and whom they look up to with affection as well as with reverence. In England this feeling exists to a considerable extent, and there, although the powers of the landlord are very much the same as they are in Ireland, complaints of the oppressive use of them are hardly ever heard. Whenever, too, the feudal relation has disappeared, pure contract has been substituted for it. In other words, whenever the land is not farmed by what may be called vassals of the landlord, it is farmed by capitalists who leave him as little power to deal harshly with them as they leave any other man from whom they buy or to whom they sell.

The history of the Irish land tenures, on the other hand, is the history of one long and completely unsuccessful effort to establish the feudal relation between the owner and the tenant. The landlord has always been to the tenant a foreigner and usurper, to whom he owed no duty, from whom he neither expected nor received protection, who was a member of an alien Church imposed on the country by force, and whose position was that of a foreign garrison. In fact, the state of affairs is very much that which De Tocqueville describes as having existed in France before the Revolution, in which the noblesse, having largely lost their land and entirely lost their political influence and political use, were, as landlords, detestable in the eyes of the peasantry. There is no case on record in which the position of owner of a large quantity of land let to and tilled by other men has been accepted by the tenantry as just and reasonable, in which the landlord did not as landlord, and by being a landlord, discharge either in reality or in the tenant's imagination some important duties to the community at large. Landlords on a great scale whose sole raison d'être has been their own comfort and enjoyment are something to which no people submit longer than they can help. This feeling, Conservatives say, is hostile to the institution of property itself; but to this Mr. Mill replies, that whether hostile or not it is a feeling which is found everywhere and in all ages, and which therefore renders it impossible for the philosophical legislator to treat property in land as if it were precisely like other property —the fruits of a man's industry or of that of his ancestors.

In Ireland, to this failureof the landlords to fulfil the conditions required to justify their existence must be added, in the list of complications, the survival in our day of the traditions, not so much in common speech as in the popular code of morality, of the old Celtic tenure by which the clan held in common, the chief having no more property in the soil than anybody else. This feeling has resisted two centuries of the common law, has bid defiance to all the efforts of John Doe and Richard Roe to extirpate it, and makes the evicted tenant still regard the landlord who evicts him, no matter for what reason, as a "moral robber." Moreover, in Ireland, contract, in the strict sense of the term, has not been to any great extent applied, as in England, to the cultivation of the soil. There are few capitalist farmers; and, to call the arrangement by which nine-tenths of the tenants hold their farms a contract, would be an abuse of language. Mr. Mill says, therefore, that, having tried to substitute the English tenure for the Celtic one, and having utterly failed, and, through the attempt, converted Ireland into a hostile country, England must relinquish the attempt and abolish landlordism, and surrender the soil to the cultivators.

In most of the discussions which have been raging on the question for the last twelve months in England, it has been alleged, and with some show of reason, that the result of this, or even of giving anything like fixity of tenure, must be either the indefinite multiplication of holdings, and the reduction of the occupiers to the lowest state of misery, or else the utter extinction of high or scientific farming. The answer to this we take to be, that if it be thought that there is any peculiarity in the Irish character which tends to produce this result, or if, contrary to the experience of France, peasant proprietorship tends everywhere to produce it, and some check or supervision is needed, the state ought to supply it. It ought not to be left to the arbitrary will of individuals, and particularly when they are armed with the fearful power of eviction. If indefinite subdivision be improper and against public policy, it ought to be restrained and regulated by law, as entails are, and the power of bequests generally are, and not by landlords. Moreover—and this is very remarkable—those who predict indefinite subdivision as the sure consequence of peasant proprietorship, and point to France as an example, maintain in the same breath and against the same adversaries that the accumulation of land in a few hands, as in England, is due to the working of an economical law which is more or less active in every country in our day, and is not due to laws of entail or primogeniture. In this we believe they are right. In point of fact, and contrary to the generally received idea, particularly in this country, there is no such thing as a strict entail in England; land can only be settled on persons in being and their unborn issue, and such settlements are made without any reference to the law of entail, and, what is perhaps still newer to most people, you can make no settlement of real estate in England which you cannot also make of personal estate. The power of settlement possessed by the great proprietors, too, is just the same as that possessed by a working-man owning a house and lot. The law of primogeniture, only operating in cases of intestacy and in the absence of marriage settlements, has scarcely any appreciable effect either on the accumulation or transmission of landed property. The accumulation of land in England is, in fact, due mainly to the fact that the possession of land brings with it social position and political influence, and the enormous growth of capital in trade has forced it up to fancy prices which the small holders cannot or will not refuse, just as a Dutch farmer does not feel that he can afford to retain his old homestead on New York island when he can sell it for building lots at four or five hundred dollars a foot. Greater democratizing of the government would, however, destroy or greatly injure the first of these sources of appreciation in the value of land.

The tendency of land to accumulate in the hands of large farmers for high culture under machinery is one which it would be undesirable even if possible to check; but there can be no question that it is desirable in every modern state—and we have little doubt that the necessity will be plainly seen before long at the South—to prohibit or make very burdensome the possession of more land by one person than he can cultivate. Of course, legislation on such a subject would be delicate work, but we have little doubt it will have to be tried.

Mr. Mill's pamphlet is criticised even by the radical portion of the English press with some hostility, on the ground that his remedy is one which is sure not to be tried, and which a Government composed so largely of landowners will not even discuss. But it remains to be seen whether the reformed Parliament will prove equally impervious; and one thing is certain that, inasmuch as what has been said cannot be unsaid, the deliberate proposal of such a scheme by a man of Mr. Mill's character and standing renders it improbable—we might even say impossible—that the Irish difficulty will now ever be settled on any other terms. In these days, if the doors of the future are once thrown open to what are called "the masses," and they catch even one glimpse of the splendid possibilities which lie within it, it is in vain to close them again. The vision never leaves their minds.

PRESENCE.

O NAMELESS thing! which art and art not; spell
Whose bond can bind the powers of the air,
Compelling them thy face to hide or bear.
O voice! which, bringing not the faintest swell
Of sound, canst in the air so crowd and dwell
That all sounds die. O sight! which needst no share
Of sun, which sav'st blind eyes from their despair;
O touch! which dost not touch, and yet canst tell
To waiting flesh, by thy caress complete,
The whole of love, till veins grow red with heat;
O life of life! to which graves are not girt
With terror, and all death can bring no hurt.
O mystery of blessing! never lift
Thy veil! our one inalienable gift!

H. H.

THE "HIGH-TONED GENTLEMAN."

WHEN the Romans destroyed a hostile city, they carried away its pictures and statues for their own good. We, the legionaries of modern democracy, have overthrown the city of patricianism which slavery had begun to build in our Southern States, and it becomes us to save from the ruins of what can never be refashioned every idea or sentiment which may add value to our own social edifice. Enshrined in the fallen acropolis, the object of vast and honest adoration, stood the "high-toned gentleman." Doubtless it is difficult for us to approach him kindly, we have so often been forced to meet him in quite another spirit! Because he first governed us and then fought us, because he was a ruler hard to shake off and an opponent hard to overcome, because he held an old-fashioned creed as to the best form of labor and would not be reasoned out of it against his will, because he could not be insulted or overmuch contradicted without making manual remonstrance, because he was narrow-minded enough to think himself far better than his adversaries, because he has cost us much temper, blood, and treasure—because of these and such like things we are disposed to handle him harshly. Perhaps it was well for us to shut our eyes upon his better traits in order that we might harden ourselves to the great task of beating him out of his pro-slavery error. But now that the fight is over, now that this threatening figure has become history, let us judge it dispassionately.

The image has the majesty of antiquity, for it has been reproduced through many ages. Whenever slavery has been united with civilization it has given birth to a being more or less like that "chivalrous Southron," who scorned work, loved authority, preferred death to shame, fought heroically for his own rights and ignored those of others. The unpaid industry of nameless myriads went to furnish the leisure which enabled the patrician Athenian to become a great soldier, statesman, orator, historian, dramatist, and artist. A "democracy" which consisted of 25,000 citizens, 50,000 despised foreign residents (Yankees?), and 400 000 bondsmen, was even more positively a slaveholding aristocracy than South Carolina. In Sparta, Rome, and every other ancient state, you find the same trinity of the ruling caste, the subject caste, and the serf caste. On the apex of society in all classic regions stood the high-toned gentleman of slaveocracy.

What the world owes to him it is in no danger of forgetting. Spartan heroism, Attic art and eloquence, Roman discipline, statesmanship, and law are gifts from his hand to the present and the future. In the Middle Ages he invented feudalism and constructed modern European society. In America, from the days of Washington to those of Lee, he has exhibited some of the most brilliant examples in history of moral energy, whether well directed or misdirected. He has always been brave—bear witness, Thermopylæ, Warsaw, and Richmond; yes, the world has been helped and hindered by his courage. But it has been more helped than hindered, and, on the whole, it owes him vast gratitude.

A character which is daily held up to hatred and derision soon loses all its influence. The general mind, not given to drawing fine distinctions, rapidly learns to scoff at the entire object pilloried, plastering its missiles on what is good as well as what is evil. But can we as yet spare the whole of the "high-toned gentleman?" Is his probable successor, the "gentleman of democracy," in a sufficiently forward state to take his place, without leaving us in an interregnum of vulgarity? For surely we must have some social model. Let us glance at a few of the better peculiarities of that chivalrous Southron who was once our pride and is now our aversion.

It was a fine thing in him that, like his predecessors of Greek, Roman, and feudal days, he demanded a high place in public affairs, caring little for the stealings of office, but much for its honor and power. He knew that he was the best man in his district, and he had energy enough to make his district know it. Unlike the shy scholars of New England and the fastidious millionaires of New York, he did not mutter that politics are too low for a gentleman and pass over his claims for Congress to showmen and pugilists. What, low to govern millions! ungentlemanly to shape the destinies of a great nation! He no more conceived the idea than did Miltiades or Quintus Fabius or Kosciusko. And the republic was all the stronger and grander for this large ambition of his until cotton turned his brain and blinded him to the necessities of the age.

He was an honest office-holder; he might condescend to bribe others, but he could not be bribed himself; he was the stumbling-block of the lobby. Full of self-respect, family pride, and pride of caste, amply supported by his acres and serfs, he considered himself under another law than the penniless shyster who had crawled through ward caucuses to the Capitol; and it was very seldom that he would dirty his patrician hands with "considerations," even though tendered in the delicate form of "complimentary shares." Fancy anybody offering a douceur to Washington, Jefferson, Madison, or Calhoun! If the lobby might be sworn, and if its oath were worth anything, we believe that we could prove the pecuniary honor of the "high-toned" legislator. When dishonest, it was for his caste and not for himself.

Yes, there was a fine self-respect draped in antique folds about this now overthrown image. In the elder days of our country the Southerners of the ruling tribe had a physical, moral, and mental bearing which put Englishmen in mind of a peer of the realm. "They are dukes, you can't touch 'em," admitted a veteran John Bull of the sturdy middle class. Beautiful in his eyes was a man whom he dared not slap on the shoulder; and beautiful also in the eyes of that respectable generation which stood around Washington.

The civility which this old figure exacted towards himself he accorded to his equals, and in carefully graded measure to his inferiors. He was a school of politeness, and many of his scholars still live. Enter the office of a Southern lawyer or merchant on an affair which is not to his profit. Although busy, he rises, invites you to sit, and remains standing until you are seated; then, so long as you please to stay, he will talk as well as he knows, without a sign of impatience; and when you leave, he urges you to remain longer and to call again. This is partly a habit of leisure, but it is partly a habit of urbanity. The people who meet you in the street of a South Carolina village pause for friendly enquiries and compliments, or pass you with a salutation which is sufficiently marked and formal to make you appreciate yourself. The conductor on the railroad car has never been out of his state, but, barring certain provincialisms, he has the bearing of a travelled gentleman. He will give you full and polite answers to your questions, and do it in a manner which will lead you to thank him civilly. We admit that he has few passengers and is not often troubled with enquiries. Leisure again, but also courtesy. It is true that there are exceptions to what we describe, but we will not ill-naturedly stop to note them. It is true also that these urbane men have implacable prejudices, and—but the war ended at Appomattox Court House, and we are now treading among the wounded.

It is a poor charge against suavity to say that blacklegs are notorious for it, or to quote the lines about "the gentlest mannered man that ever scuttled ship or cut a throat." Suppose you are a gambler or a pirate, is it not an additional crime to be a brute about it? So far as our influence may go with those classes of society, we recommend them to preserve their suavity as being their only virtue, and not the less a virtue because they possess it. A stronger charge against this ingratiating manner is, that both the acquisition and the exercise of it cost time. It is admitted the boy must begin to learn it young; the man must lose by it several minutes a day. Yes, that precious purchase-money must be paid, and the only question is whether the merchandise is worth it. Let us not leave it to Brown, who has just roared out, "You lie!" Let us leave it to the insulted Robinson, who, with his feelings bruised by the assault of vulgarity, can see the charms of suavity.

But the most serious charge against this Southern grace of manner is that it costs blood. It is undeniable that one weighty reason why gentlemen born below Mason and Dixon's line do not pass each other without a civil greeting, is that they are amenable to the laws of the duel and even of the rencontre. Is the virtue worth this price? "No," answer Puritanism, the democracy of our Northern States, respectable, commercial England, half-oriental Russia, and the Turks. "Yes," insists aristocracy, whether feudal or sabretache, throughout Germany, France, Italy, Spain, all lands of civilization and claimed as Christian.

It is a noticeable fact that the high-toned gentleman of two thousand years ago knew no more of the duel than of Christianity. He was a model fighting man, yet he answered epithet with epithet. If Alcibiades and Crito had repaired to some olive grove and speared each other because one of them had called the other a liar, we may be pretty sure that Athenian society would have set them down for a couple of barbarians, and that Aristophanes would have lampooned them dreadfully. Two Roman youths caught in such an eccentricity would probably have received some ignominious punishment from the censor. The classic ancient had little consciousness of the sacredness of individuality. He was a citizen; he was a mere particle of the patria; if he lived for anything less than his country, it was for his caste. It was not till superstition discovered the "trial by battle," and castellated, isolated feudalism invented individuality, that we had the duel.

What is the rationale of the duel, now that the faith in a divine decision has dropped away from it? "It is the consciousness," answers Count Sabretache, "that the blood of the soul is more precious than that of the body; it is the belief, in other words, that it is better to leap out of the world than to remain in it with a stain upon honor. Revenge is not the foundation idea any more than in hari-kari, although, practically, a desire for vengeance may have produced many a challenge. The central notion of the duel is simply to put an end to intolerable spiritual suffering by destroying either the person who endures it or the person who inflicts it. And one of the benefits of this codified tragedy, probably by far the greatest benefit that has flowed from it, is that bystanders learn to be cautious how they impose such suffering. The question how much decorum society has acquired from the duel, is worthy of meditation," concludes the count, with a firm countenance.

So much for fair play; now for practical wisdom. Shall Robinson let Brown alone, as advised by Quakers; or give him back his evil names, after the Athenian fashion; or "hit him on the smeller," under the direction of the "young man John;" or call him out and shoot him according to the prescription of the high-toned gentleman? We find all these options so unpleasant that we scarcely know which to recommend. We believe that Browns are still too numerous for us to get along comfortably under the Quaker doctrine. The classic method is objectionable as being no cure for vulgar insolence, but rather a continuation of it. As for "knocking him down and going along," as our young man sometimes puts it, the foe may pick himself up and knock you down; whereupon you not only do not go along, but have a rough-and-tumble fight on your hands, which is undignified, attracts a crowd, and gets one carried to the station-house. Duelling, also, is contrary to the laws of the land, and, moreover, savors of breaking the Decalogue on one's own responsibility, for which reasons we decide against it. On the whole, it seems that we are puzzled.

But as Robinson is importunate, we will nerve ourselves to a decision, and will refer him to our friend John. Yes, hit Brown on the smeller. Never mind the possible consequences. Hit him as soon as he has uttered his epithet. The blow is a coarse argument against low insolence, but it is quite fine enough for his brutish nature. Anything finer would be wasted. We believe that too much impudence is borne with in the Northern States. We are too patient a people. We smile under the affronts and extortions of hackmen when we should give them in charge of a police officer. We endure conductors and other small officials whom we ought to sue. We allow Bridget to plunder us, break her bargains with us, and sauce us, without so much as mentioning the house of correction. Instead of incontinently chastising the vulgar ass who chances to call us evil names, we sidle away from him, perhaps smile upon him with a placating air; in our severest mood seek to despise him, and always despise ourselves. There is no end to the impertinences which decent people receive because they will not resent them. It is the paradise of bad manners; it is the purgatory of good manners.

What does it all mean? It means cowardice, lack of self-respect, lack of individuality. The single American is humble before society; he is humble before that fraction of society, the corporation; he is humble before that representative of the corporation, the conductor. He has got into the habit of being humble, so that when a bold voice rises near him he crouches before that, no matter though it be the utterance of a wind-bag; and when a steady eye looks into his, his own eye falters and takes refuge in corners. He has been bullied by Mrs. Grundy until he believes that every one who speaks a loud, firm opinion represents the power of Mrs. Grundy, and must not be opposed. It is a curious experiment to contradict one of these millions of Uriah Heeps and see him fall silent. Do not suppose that you have convinced him because he makes no answer, and presently gets out of your way. He will look up one of his own belief, and to him argue against you.

It is better than it was once. A grand exhibition of national heroism has in part atoned for the days when we thought it brave to say, "The honorable gentleman from Mississippi must not crack his plantation whip over me," and for the still viler days when even that timorous defiance could not get itself uttered by Yankee lips. But the individual of society is still almost as mean and sneaking as was then the average "household gentleman" from north of Mason and Dixon's line. He is continually dodging and ducking to evade all sorts of plantation whips. He is all the while "catching it" from public opinion and corporations and conductors and porters; he is flagellated by Patrick and Bridget and every other species of strong-willed, firm-eyed, muscular Christians; he is afraid of everybody who fights and swears, or who even scowls. One cannot help smiling with satisfaction to imagine merely how the sensitive, fiery, quick, striking, "chivalrous Southron" would at least change the nature of our troubles if he should appear in force among us. The most pugnacious Irish hackman or truckman who did business in Charleston before the war soon learned not to drive over pedestrians and to be very cautious about splashing them.

On the whole, the "high-toned gentleman" must not be forgotten. Of course, he cannot as a unity be preserved, much less re-created, in a democracy of labor. It is impossible to put the entire stamp of a Roman, feudal, or Carolinian oligarch upon a man who lives by his own work, who has beneath him neither plebeian nor slave, who belongs to no caste, and whose sympathies logically comprehend all his countrymen, if not all the human race. But as we desire to fashion a worthy gentleman of democracy, let us keep the nobler lineaments of slaveocracy. Let us learn from him that politics deserve the care of the best and wisest; that social courtesy is a necessity of the highest civilization; that respectable humanity claims its own respect.

THE VOLUNTEERS OF 1867.

In the Nuova Antologia for January, 1868, is an article entitled "Volunteers and Regulars," in which the merits and demerits of these rival or, as some will have it, parallel forces are compared. Signor Fambri, the author of the article, is decidedly hostile to the volunteers in all countries—in Italy, Spain, America; under any given circumstances, in every conceivable condition, he regards their existence as a national calamity; affirms that, as far as Italy is concerned, nine-tenths of those who enlist under Garibaldi's banner do it as a trade; that these volontari d'industria, who "never return to the occupations which they quitted for the campaign, are more numerous than the stars of the heaven or the sands of the sea, and that, when we have ascertained the number of these, we shall know the name of the disease which afflicts Italy more severely even than her deficit." I will not quote all the hard, bitter, scornful accusations brought against the red shirts; they are but repetitions of Fambri's own speech in Parliament, of the speeches from the ministerial benches, of M. Rouher's speeches, of the Pope's allocution—are, in short, but the outpourings of the treasured-up hate and envy of years, the natural, innate ingratitude of those who reap for those who have sown. In 1849, four thousand volunteers fell on the Roman soil fighting against the foreign invaders. Up to the present moment successive governments have pertinaciously refused to grant pensions or any aid whatsoever to the mutilated or disabled, to the widows or orphans of the dead. "In 1859," as Garibaldi told Cavour during their last encounter, "the lame and hunchback were sent to him; all the able-bodied men were drafted off into the regular army." In 1860, the one great battle of the campaign—the battle of the Volturno—four times lost and five times won, was, and is still persistently attributed to the regular army, though not a single Piedmontese soldier was on the field throughout the day; and, after the campaign, insult, contumely, and hardship were the portion of the liberators of Sicily and Naples. True, they had their "six months' pay," and when that was expended, five of the three hundred who answered the roll-call when the names of the Thousand of Marsala were called over committed suicide from starvation before the tardy pension, coupled with humiliating conditions, was doled out to them. In 1866, the shame of Lissa and Custozza placed the volunteers more on a level with the regulars than on any former occasion; they had been regularly enrolled; they were regularly disbanded and with their six months' pay; and the fact that they had left their former employments to serve under the Government induced their old employers, for the most part, to readmit them. They suffered less than on any former occasion. But the volunteers of 1867, the nine-tenths of the twenty thousand who furnish the theme of Signor Fambri's diatribes, what of them? "Would I had died at Mentana, or lost a leg, at least!" said one poor fellow to me the other day, when I was obliged to refuse him relief from the funds of the Committee on the Wounded; and many hundreds echo his terrible desire. Be it remembered that when Garibaldi promised to the Romans the help of their Italian brethren, he told those brethren what would be the accompaniments of the help he promised in their names—"Hunger, hardship, forced marches, and no pay." They were not deceived; neither were they daunted. They were willing to risk this and more for "Rome." All the funds that could be collected under one pretext or another by the "committees of aid" went in the purchase of arms and ammunition. Not one farthing was given to any single volunteer on enlistment. A very few, towards the end of October, received gratis railway tickets to Terni; the rest made their way there—each alone knows how. Young men of good families, whose friends objected to their departure, "borrowed" or pawned watches, rings, etc., but many a working-man pawned the tools which were all his capital, the solitary mattress, the threadbare Sunday coat. In companies of tens and twenties they reached the frontier, mostly on foot. If on their arrival there the committees happened to have supplies on hand, they got a red shirt, a pair of shoes, and trowsers, most of them improvidently leaving their old clothes behind them. Throughout the campaign no pay, and often no food for four-and-twenty hours. Monte Rotondo was taken by men who had fasted eighteen hours and marched ten miles during the night. Even the wounded lay on straw, and until evening boiled corn was all that passed their lips. Yet they did their duty as cheerfully and well as though they had their daily rations, and looked forward to their six months' pay and their pensions at the end. One officer narrates that as he was marching his men from one mountain to another they came up with two wagons of blankets, bread, and shoes. His men were famished, drenched with rain, many barefooted. They rushed on the wagons to help themselves. "If you will have them, you must," said the men in charge; "but they are for Menotte, and his men have been roughing it for a fortnight before you came." Nothing was touched. Under fire the soldiers themselves organized litters and bore off their wounded comrades to the improvised ambulances, cooking for them such food as they could find, watching by them throughout the night, such few as had cloaks or blankets depriving themselves to cover the sufferers.

When Garibaldi marched onwards within two miles of Rome all his men were with him; only when orders were given for a countermarch on Monte Rotondo discouragement fell on the ranks and desertions commenced. I have read in English and in Italian papers of excesses committed by the volunteers. None have been proved; but some of the officers told me that the famished and victorious troops did break into more than one cellar, and took their bread where they found it. But what is this to the excesses committed by the Bersaglieri in Genoa, after La Marmora's successful bombardment in 1849? Of the prowess of the volunteers at Mentana I need not speak. The world knows now how four thousand held their own against fifteen thousand French and Papal soldiers from twelve o'clock on Sunday night until the dawn of the morning. Vanquished, two hundred wounded were carried into Rome with some thousand prisoners, there crowded into the filthy hospitals and prisons—the former to die of hospital gangrene, the latter to rot in filth and hunger for days, and some for weeks. The remainder, disarmed at the frontier and penned into cattle-wagons, were "sent to their homes," ordered at once to divest themselves of the hated red shirt, and warned that the police had their eyes upon them. "But," remonstrated many, "we left our old clothes at the frontier; we have no other shirt." "Find one," was the invariable reply. Against these wretched delinquents the worst crime that Signor Fambri can bring is "that nine-tenths do not return to their old employment;" he does not seem to have taken into account that their old employers won't receive them, and that the Government itself has set the example by not allowing any of its servants to return to the posts they quitted to follow Garibaldi. I have been for the last three months a frequent visitor to the "Committee on the Wounded," founded by some American, English, and Italian ladies, under the auspices of that gentlest, most modest and benevolent of ladies, Mrs. G. P. Marsh. After ascertaining that the sole and single object of the committee was to alleviate the sufferings of the destitute volunteers, that the sick and wounded of all nationalities, of all religions and political creeds, were to be assisted, your minister's wife consented to be treasurer and to interest her friends in the scheme. What your American women have done for the wounded in the Roman hospitals only those whom they have tended, fed, and clothed will ever fully know. I will not name them, because they would not thank me; I only hope that, if ever sickness or suffering should assail any of their sons, their tenderness and generosity will be paid back in kind. Here, in Florence, the same work, under fewer difficulties, has been carried on. The Countess M——, wife of an Italian senator, opens her rooms daily from twelve to three, and by her and her nieces and one lady visitor the wants of each sufferer are examined and temporary relief afforded. All who need it are clothed, dinner-tickets given to such as have no families, or money to those who can get their food cooked at home. I think the statistics of this committee would surprise many. Looking through the books the other day I was myself astonished to see how few, comparatively, now avail themselves of the proffered aid. "Did you send all these away?" I asked, running over the closed accounts. "Oh no; either they found work or we found work for them; they look in every now and then to tell us how they are getting on, but they do n't ask for anything." "And do n't you ever get cheated?" "Oh yes; sometimes. Dr. C—— says that we are too tender-hearted. One man came with a dead comrade's certificates and got ten francs; another sold his clothes; a third offered the restaurant-keeper six dinner-tickets, value one franc each, for five francs; some of them are cunning and watch for the days of some of the most tender-hearted ladies to get something extra, but, on the whole, they are grateful, honest, and most anxious to get work." So much for the wounded; but I confess that in frequenting this and other committees my heart has bled less for them than for those who are sent empty away because they did not come under that head. Hundreds and hundreds apply daily either to these committees or to individual benevolence, and the lament invariably is: "I was in the telegraph office; on the railway; porter in a warehouse; clerk at a banker's; type setter at such a printing-office; our places are filled up, and the masters say that if they were n't they would n't take us back." I have examined scores of such cases and found the truth of the statements. One man, with wife and four children, had had his bed and all his worldly possessions seized by his landlord. Another, with wife and new-born child, had no roof to call his own; this was a Roman exile who had been waiter at a hotel in Leghorn, had been a good soldier during the campaign, and from the 26th had watched day and night beside his wounded captain, who was nearly as poor as himself. Again, two brothers had left the service of two English families, where one earned 45f. the other 40f. (high wages for Italy). After fighting hard all day, they were ordered by Dr. Bertani to search the field for wounded; these lads were well dressed, and their knapsacks and cloaks were left on the ambulance carts. As they were picking up their dying comrades, the Zouaves picked them up and carried them prisoners to Rome; their baggage was lost on the carts, the small sums they had with them were spent for food in the wretched Roman prisons, they returned haggard and penniless, the English families had departed, taking other servants; they are still both of them out of employment. Before me lies a statement for the truth of which General Fabrizi, head of Garibaldi's staff, pledges his word: "I was a volunteer in 1848 in the University battalion throughout the Lombard campaign, a soldier in '59, ensign in '60, lieutenant in '66, captain in '67. I lost my regular employment in '60 and have never since been able to recover my situation. In 1867 I entered Salamone's column, and after the battle was over I was reported dead. My wife was nearly distracted; my return saved her mind, but fever took possession of her, and she has not yet left her bed. Rheumatism has kept me almost a prisoner to the house; first I pawned everything, then I sold the things to fetch more, now nothing remains—but to die. It is twenty-four hours since we tasted food; the landlord threatens to eject us, as our rent is unpaid. Can you give us temporary aid? I am ashamed to write, to come; for myself I would not, but my wife!"

I could multiply these cases; but will not. Americans will ask, Do the Italians care so little for their unity and independence as to neglect their champions? The question is difficult to answer. It must be borne in mind that the entire expenses of the expedition have come out of private purses; that taxes are heavy, the winter intensely bitter, and, what is strangely true, the Government sets its face dead against any attempt to assist the poor wretches. Here is a document that will convince more than my words.

Contessa M——, anxious to increase the funds of the committee, had induced some of her friends to give a "benefit" in the Alfieri Theatre, and applied to the prefect of Florence for the necessary permission. Here is his reply:

"As soon as I received the demand of your illustrious signoria for permission to give a dramatic representation in the Alfieri Theatre for the benefit of the wounded of the late battles on the Roman territory, I communicated it to the Minister of the Interior in order to ascertain his pleasure. The aforesaid minister now replies, and, while thanking your illustrious signoria for the generous offer, charges me to inform you that sufficient funds exist for the succor of the wounded volunteers, and that the proceeds of the representation might be devoted to the benefit of the victims of the cholera or to some charitable institution.

"With esteem and consideration, THE PREFECT.

"29th Jan., 1868."

The funds voted by Parliament were 50,000 francs: not ten dollars for every wounded man, and how and by whom these have been distributed no one knows. W. M.

FLORENCE, Feb. 20.

Correspondence.

NATIONAL REPUDIATION.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

DEAR SIR: In noticing the singular observations of the Times, you say very justly that every United States bondholder whose property is threatened with confiscation ought, in the interest of public morality, to "cry out against the iniquity." Will you then allow one of these menaced individuals to utter his cry through the medium of your paper?

That Democratic leaders, Pendletons and Seymours, should advocate partial or total repudiation, need not surprise any one. It is a legitimate deduction from such principles, or apology for principles, as they have always professed. If a war to preserve the national existence was "unconstitutional," it is no violent inference that all measures necessary or auxiliary to the war were tainted with the same unconstitutionality, and the contraction of loans was certainly among these. If the Democrats assume the reins of government again, they may assert with some pretence of justice that they, or some of them, were opposed to contracting war-loans, and they may fortify themselves with the analogy of Miramon repudiating Juarez's debts, or Juarez repudiating Miramon's.

But it is the other party—the party which contracted the debt—that is now most eager to repudiate it. Every one asserts (and no one, so far as I know, has contradicted the assertion) that the Western Republicans are all but unanimous for taxation of Government bonds, or payment of them in greenbacks, or some other thinly disguised form of repudiation. Influential M.C.s from various constituencies berate us as privileged aristocrats; one Eastern governor has followed suit; and now the Times, overcome apparently by this gubernatorial example, tells us that we had better be wise in time, and compromise while we can at a loss of 20 or 30 per cent., lest a worse thing befall us.

At all which I must confess to some degree of astonishment. While naturally resigning the first place to those who "paid with their person," as the French say, and risked their lives on the battle-field, I did think, in my innocence, that we bondholders were entitled to some little credit for patriotism. When the United States first asked for money there prevailed a very general doubt as to the existence of any United States Government or any United States. European authorities, with scarcely a dissenting voice, proclaimed that the model republic had given up the ghost at Bull Run. Of course, the Southern secessionists were of the same opinion, and many of their Northern friends hinted as much, more or less plainly. Nevertheless we, believing that the United States Government did and ought to exist, lent it money; and I may say here, parenthetically, that in no succeeding year has the market value of our bonds in gold exceeded what we then paid for them. We furnished the Government with the sinews of war, and of course all the Government's enemies cried out against us. Renegade vermin on foreign shores threatened us with confiscation of our property. Copperheads at home suggested the same thing in more guarded terms. English and French journalists sneeringly observed that it was no matter what interest the Federal States promised to pay, since both interest and principal were sure to be repudiated. The Southern leaders, so long as they hoped to get the better of the nation by the help of France, England, and the Democrats, proclaimed that repudiation would be one of their conditions of peace. (And it may be observed, though this is anticipating somewhat, that the disaffected at the South have always since the war cherished the hope of national bankruptcy when they had no other consolation left them.) We didn't give up the ship. We were not frightened out of our purpose. As the war went on and the result seemed more and more doubtful, and more and more money was wanted, we kept lending to the Government all we could disengage. The Government triumphed, the national existence was triumphantly established, and what was our great reward? I think you will agree with me that I am putting it in a form too favorable for us when I say that we were guaranteed 9 per cent. for 16 years. And this in a country where manufacturers sometimes treble their capital in a year, and railroads and other corporations make so much that they are positively afraid to let the amount be known!

And then this Eastern governor (I forget his name), inspired with a Swinburnian alliteration and a euphonic jingle that would have delighted Mr. Pecksniff, rounds off his pretty little period about "privileged persons and privileged property." How is our property "privileged?" Exactly as a lease or a charter or any other contract is privileged. And so far is the term privilege applied to property from involving any injustice or impropriety that the very word is continually used in contracts. E. g., I hire a house for a year, "with privilege" to retain it another year, if I choose, at the same rent. The governor improves on Jefferson, who held that a Government contract was only binding for twenty-two years; he would have it binding only so long as the Government pleases. Machiavelli says that a prince is not bound to keep his word if it be against his interest to do so. Such morality might answer for princes in Machiavelli's day, but if we can have no better in a republic of the nineteenth century, it certainly does not become us to boast of our ethical progress.

Thus far I have proceeded on the implied supposition that the bondholders are generally persons of some means, who, though seriously inconvenienced, would not be reduced to actual distress by the total or partial confiscation of their securities. And this for obvious reasons is the impression which the repudiators are desirous of producing. We hear it constantly asserted, with that recklessness about truth which supplies a large class of our politicians with the bulk of their political capital, that the Government bonds are concentrated in a few hands. I can see no reason for believing this statement, but several for believing the contrary. Not only were there many poor men and women patriotic enough to invest their savings in Government securities during the war, but after its close there was a natural tendency among several classes of persons with small means at their disposal to seek the same investment. Single women, invalids, and superannuated men, trustees of orphans, all those who have little business experience or opportunity, and with whom it is a great object to avoid risk and responsibility—the great recommendation of an investment to all these is its security, and therefore they preferred Government bonds. Nor do we stop here in our pecuniary descent. It will not be necessary to advertise in the papers or employ a detective in order to find poor women and boys who have scraped together from their earnings just enough to buy the lowest denomination of United States stock. The savings-bank statistics which you have quoted are to the point here.

About the foreign bondholders even greater rubbish, if possible, is asserted. The wealthy bankers hostile to us speculated in Confederate bonds and blockade-runners. Those Europeans who bought our bonds were, as a general rule, friendly to us. Why were so many of our bonds sent to Germany and sold there? Because we had more friends in Germany than in England and France.

Of course, if all the bondholders were foreigners or millionaires that would not absolve the nation from its plighted troth, but it is worth while showing that even the wretched palliations urged for public dishonesty have no real existence.

But, after all, it may be asked, ought not the United States Government to be able to borrow money at a less rate than it now pays? That is a different question, which, if it had been approached in a right spirit, might before now have been answered in a manner satisfactory to all parties. If, two years ago, the bondholders had been offered a perfectly free option of exchanging their bonds for a forty-years five per cent. stock, it is highly probable (to say the least) that a large majority of them would have consented. But all depends on the perfect freedom of option, because on that depends the security which is the bondholder's principal object and inducement. If we were to consent to such a conversion now, under threat of a greater loss, what assurance have we that the process of reduction may not be repeated in two or four years, or whenever any political party may think it expedient to pander to dishonesty? Should we not encourage the repetition by acquiescing in the precedent?

Perhaps you may think some of the expressions which I have used too strong. I, on the contrary, only regret that I do not possess sufficient command of language to make them stronger, and express my feelings more adequately. In reference to Byng's execution, Voltaire said (in his "Candide") that the English had shot one of their admirals to encourage the rest. Our Western Republicans are now preparing to execute the loyal bondholders as an encouragement to future patriots.

There still remains another view of the subject which I am ashamed to do more than suggest after so long a communication. According to the Western moralists and their apologists, honesty is an "abstraction" and faith a chimera. Suppose we do violence to our better instincts, and follow them on their own ground; suppose we confine ourselves to the question, Will repudiation pay? I think it can be easily and conclusively shown that it will not pay; that it will not be profitable either to the nation at large or to that portion of it known as the Republican party. And this, with your permission, I will do in another letter.

C. A. Bristed.

February 24, 1868.

Notes.

LITERARY.

Leypoldt & Holt announce a work, by Mr. D. G. Brinton, A.M., M.D., entitled "The Myths of the New World: An Essay on the Symbolism and Mythology of the Red Race of America." Mr. Brinton is known as a student of American archæology by his previously published work on the antiquities of the Floridian peninsula. The same house have in press a translation of Heribert Rau's musical novel of "Mozart;" a translation of Taine's "Italy," made by Mr. J. Durand, the translator of the same author's "Philosophy of Art;" a new edition of Fritz Reuter's amusing, indeed delightful, story, "In the Year '13," and translations of "Faustina Hasse," a German art-novel, by Elise Polko, "Problematic Characters," by F. Spielhagen, and "The Hohensteins," by the same author, who ranks very high among German novelists.——Messrs. J. B. Lippincott & Co. announce republications of "Travels in the Interior of South Africa," by James Chapman, F.R.G.S.; Professor Pearson's "History of England;" "Silver Lake, or Lost in the Snow," by R. M. Ballantyne; and "Memoirs of Alexander Campbell," by Robert Richardson. Other works announced by the same house are, "American Masonic Biography and Cyclopædia of Freemasonry," by Aug. Row, K.T., and the third volume of Mr. Kirk's "History of Charles the Bold."——A. D. F. Randolph will republish Francis Turner Palgrave's "Original Hymns," and "Saint Paul," by F. W. H. Myers.——J. C. Garrigues & Co., of Philadelphia, announce "The Sabbath-school Index," by R. G. Pardee, whose work is at once a history of Sunday-schools and a manual for the instruction of teachers.——G. W. Carleton & Co. will soon issue a new comic book by "Josh Billings," a new romance by Mayne Reid, and a new work—a novel, we suppose—called "The Artist's Dream," by Miss Olive Logan.——W. A. Townsend & Adams will republish "A Practical Treatise on Metallurgy," elaborated after the last German edition of Kerl's "Metallurgy," by Wm. Crookes, F.R.S., and Ernst Rohrig.——E. P. Dutton & Co. announce the Rev. Mr. H. P. Liddon's "Sermons Preached before the University of Oxford."

—The total population of Rhode Island is, in round numbers, about 180,000, of whom the number under fifteen years of age is given as 57,110, and those between six and fifteen may be estimated at 45,610. By good rights all these last should be at school, but, in fact, in the winter of the year ending April 30, 1867, the public schools showed an attendance, of boys and girls together, of only 28,280, and the average attendance during the whole year was only 19,972. It appears, therefore, that 17,330, or more than a third of the children of proper age, were entirely lost to the educational influences of the State. In Prussia, with a total population of 19,226,270 (in 1864), and an infant population (from five to fourteen years of age) of 3,457,301, only 16,000 were unaccounted for in the official returns of that year. Make a liberal allowance in the Rhode Island deficit for children put to private schools—probably not more than 1,000—and this little State, with a population inferior to that of the city of Boston, has a bad advantage over Prussia in the actual number of children who do not learn the alphabet. There are, however, 2,500 pupils in Rhode Island who are past fifteen, but they are only 2,500, while there are 15,000 persons also past fifteen who cannot write their own names—nor ten thousand of them read at all—and 15,000 others but little better off. We gather these statistics partly from the "Twenty-third Annual Report of Public Schools in Rhode Island," delivered to the Legislature last month, and partly from "An Appeal to Rhode Islanders" in the Rhode Island Schoolmaster for February. This appeal, in view of the alarming facts just stated, proposes a remedy in the shape of evening schools, free libraries, reading-rooms, lectures, and other enlightening instrumentalities. There is nothing novel in this, but it appears to be taken in hand by persons who are brought in contact with the ignorance which they seek to dispel—that is to say, the manufacturers whose mills have attracted to Rhode Island and concentrated in a few of its thirty-four towns a large and increasing foreign population, under whose incubus it is no wonder the State shows badly. The new organization is to be known as the "Rhode Island Educational Union," and Mr. Samuel Austin is to be to it what Dr. Barnas Sears is to the Peabody fund for educating the South.

—A deplorable loss to students of theology and history is recorded by the newspapers in the destruction by fire of the establishment of the Abbé Migne, at Montrouge, Paris. In all the annals of typography no man has done so much to place within the reach of the private reader the materials which had previously been accessible only in great public libraries, or in the collections of those whose command of space and of money was unlimited. It must be nearly twenty-five years since he first commenced to put into execution the gigantic project of reproducing, in uniform style and at an extremely moderate price, the whole body of Christian theology and tradition, accompanied with all the apparatus necessary for their elucidation—to form, in short, a complete library for the Catholic clergy. This appalling labor he has steadily pursued with unflagging energy; and from the most slender beginnings, and, amid many discouragements, he had gradually built up, in the Ateliers Catholiques of Montrouge, a stupendous establishment where stereotyping, printing, binding, painting, sculpture, and the manufacture of organs, harmoniums, and church ornaments were carried on upon a vast scale. He used to boast that his stereotype plates alone had cost more than five millions of francs, and that the whole concern, clear of debt, represented a capital of nearly four millions, while during his whole career he had never allowed a note to lie over, even in the worst revolutionary crisis.

Perhaps the most valuable of his publications is the "Patrologia Latina," a collection of all the Christian Latin writers from the pseudo-Clement to Innocent III. With the exception of jurisprudence, it thus embraces all the sources of European history up to the commencement of the thirteenth century, and the student will vainly look elsewhere for the material thus gathered together and placed within his reach. Like all the rest of the Abbé's publications it is in imperial octavo (equivalent to the smaller folios of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries), closely printed in double columns, the volumes generally containing from 600 to 1,000 pages. Of these there are 217 in the series, followed by five or six similar volumes of indexes, of which we believe one or two have not yet appeared. It was at one time the intention of the Abbé to continue with a second series, embracing all writers down to the fifteenth century, and also to supplement it with a complete collection of Councils in about 80 volumes, but both of these vast projects we believe he had been compelled to abandon on account of his advanced age—for he is upwards of eighty years old.

On a similar scale is his "Patrologia Græco-Latina," comprehending all the Greek Christian writers from the earliest period to the Council of Florence, with translations in Latin. This collection is embraced in 167 volumes. Then there is a series of Christian orators of which about 100 volumes had appeared, and three series of theological encyclopædias contained in 170 volumes, together with numberless dictionaries, histories, and editions of prominent writers amounting to about 260 volumes more. In all, the Abbé had issued nearly a thousand huge volumes, the whole of which were stereotyped except the Latin texts of the Greek fathers; and if, as we presume is the case from the accounts which have reached us, the whole of these plates have been destroyed, the loss is no common one.

In a recent circular, written in his customary florid style, the good Abbé alluded to the "plus de 30 ans d'une effrayante tension de nos facultés intellectuelles et physiques, mais à laquelle résiste la solidité herculienne de notre constitution"—but we fear that even his marvellous vigor will scarcely, in the face of a calamity so stunning, enable him to build up again the vast amount of material which he had placed, as he hoped, in an enduring form. If so, the loss is one not easily to be repaired, for though in point of typographical execution and editorial accuracy his editions left much to be desired, yet they presented in a cheap form an immense amount of material which was in no other way accessible to the ordinary student. In his misfortune the Abbé deserves and will receive the sympathy of all, without distinction of creeds, who can appreciate his exhaustless vigor and the services which he has rendered to the cause of learning.

—Napoleon's friendship with the Saint Simonians is very well known; the favor shown the house of Pereire is an instance of it in what is probably not its most disinterested phase. For the matter of that, it is perhaps not unfair to suspect that his apparent sympathy with the doctrines as well as the bankers of the Saint Simonian community—once of greater weight in French politics than now—may have been quite as much the child of his ambition as of his earnest desire for truth and for social reform. At all events, there was friendship between President, and future Emperor, Louis Napoleon and Père Enfantin, and the late debates in the Corps Législatif on the new Press bill afforded a proof of it, which we notice as belonging to the contemporary history of the literary censorship in France. M. Jules Simon, in the course of his speech the other day, said that a few years ago Bon Père Enfantin, who was then near the end of his life, wrote a book which he called "Dieu et l'Homme." It was published by M. Victor Masson, who was at once summoned before the law officers and informed that proceedings were about to be brought against him. He endeavored to dissuade the procureur from prosecution, but for a long time without effect; until at last he informed him that he had in his possession a letter in which Napoleon had given the author leave to dedicate the book to him. The book which was criminal in the eye of the public prosecutor, M. Simon said, was held innocent at the Tuileries. A thousand such stories might be related, and a good many of the strangest of them would have for their moral pretty much the same already familiar lesson—the smaller the official, the greater the officiousness. An amusing case in point is that of the zealous functionary who, a month or two since, caused an actor to be admonished that the Empire must not be brought into contempt by the public use of a handkerchief ornamented with a portrait of Napoleon the Great. Pocket-handkerchiefs are not, we suppose, literature "within the meaning of the act," but the censorship does things as absurd as any other department of the police is responsible for. A far larger number of stories than those chiefly comic would teach us that the Second Empire finds it for its interest to debauch the morals of the people; that while it has only severity for free speech, it willingly permits loose language; that, like most "paternal governments," it gets its maxims of paternal duty from a very pseudo-Solomon, and spoils the child without at all sparing the rod.

—It surprised most people to be told a little while ago by a laborious student of the Scriptures that he had found contemporary Dutch literature a great help to him in his labors. For the literature of the Netherlands makes no European figure whatever, and nobody is ashamed to confess his almost complete ignorance of authors like Cats, Helders, Van Kampen, and Van Lennep—who have long been popular among their own countrymen—and his total ignorance of the Dutch writers of our own day. One of these latter has, however, recently made his name known abroad by a novel which is described as the "Uncle Tom's Cabin" of Holland. It has recently been translated into English under the title of "Max Havelaar," and is spoken of as a very remarkable book, but is pronounced not so remarkable as a novel as it is powerful as a political pamphlet against the Conservatives and in favor of the Liberals. For in the kingdom of Holland also, although educated Englishmen ask "the name of the present Stadtholder," and appear to think the country has been in a political swoon for half a century, there is no lack of political activity and even of severe party strife. At present Clericals and Liberals are contending in the legislature on a question first raised by the novel of which we have spoken, whose author, Mr. Dowes Dekker, is a Liberal. In this work it was first made known to the mass of Mr. Dekker's countrymen that they are responsible for a cruel system of slavery. He gave a direct contradiction to all official reports in regard to the Dutch East India possessions. In the Indian Archipelago the Dutch have under their control all of Java, and all or parts of Borneo, Sumatra, Celebes, Timor, Banca, the Banda Isles, Bencoolen, and many other islands and provinces which together have a population of almost 17,000,000 souls —chiefly aboriginal inhabitants, Malays, and Chinese. The form of government under which not all but most of these people live may be described with some approach to accuracy as being this: there are native chiefs, called Regents, who get salaries from the Dutch and a percentage on all products raised in their district. These the natives acknowledge as lawfully their masters. But over the Regents are Dutchmen called Residents, and over the Residents is the Home Government. The Home Government, when a man is sent out as a Resident, administers to him an oath to protect the native population against "extortion and tyranny." But whenever he makes an official report he is expected to use this phrase, now become stereotyped, "tranquillity remains tranquil." It is not often he can keep his oath and use the traditional formula truthfully. For it appears that in Java, at any rate—we do not know if Mr. Dekker talks of any colony but Java—an island of ten millions of inhabitants, the native laborer must raise whatever crop the regents order; the regent orders what the Dutch resident orders, and he what the Home Government has decided shall be produced. Rice is what the Javanese cultivates when left to himself; it is the most profitable of the crops to the tiller, and, so to speak, the most natural; from the name of this grain the name of the island itself is derived. But if the Government decides on indigo or sugar or coffee as temporarily the crop most profitable to itself, the laborer must raise that and leave his breadstuff crop uncultivated. We have here undisguised slavery. As might be expected, famines are of not infrequent occurrence; a few years ago mothers offered to sell their children for food; mothers ate their own children; there was depopulation of whole districts. The governor was forced to proclaim that the extension of the European market, as it is called, should not be pushed to the extremity of famine. Of course, "Max Havelaar" made the Liberals justly indignant with the system it described—and, it is maintained, described with under-statement of the dreadful facts. No contradiction has been attempted. The Conservatives, with the King at their head, reply to the Liberal denunciation with arguments like some which we in this country once heard so often—"the Javanese will not work," "vested interests are not to be disturbed," and the others; but a speedy triumph is predicted for the party of emancipation. The novel can hardly fail to be an interesting one. The human interest must surely be powerful; and if the author's Dutch realism has not been staggered by the strange and tremendous forms of animal and vegetable life with which he might deal, his book might well be worth reading for their sake alone.

—Fanny Kemble is the writer of an essay on Lady Macbeth's character which appears in a late number of Macmillan. It is very well worth reading for its analysis of certain parts of the play and for the light which her long and careful study of Shakespeare enables her to throw upon many other points of interest besides the one with which she is more particularly dealing. For example, her estimate of Macbeth's nature; her theory of the reasons why the poet brought influences from the other world to bear upon him while he did not so move the woman; her explanation of the fact that Macbeth never wholly loses his dignity in our eyes though we see him subservient to his wife; her argument on the question whether or not Lady Macbeth also sees the ghost that terrifies the king in the banquet hall, present considerations not all wholly new to be sure, and not, of course, wholly adequate—for one writer in one essay leaves much unsaid in talking about principal points in far less works of Shakespeare's than this great tragedy—but which are valuable in suggestion. But as regards the chief question treated of, not many people, we should say, will come to the writer's conclusion. It is briefly this: Lady Macbeth was destitute of the moral sense; it is wrong to say she died of remorse, for "consciousness of guilt she never had;" she is haunted by blood much as a butcher might be in a nightmare. "The unrecognized pressure of her great guilt," Mrs. Kemble says, "killed her;" but "intruding a moral element of which she is conscious into Lady Macbeth's punishment is a capital error, because her punishment consists in her infinite distance from all such influences." And again: "She died of wickedness," for "the body can sin but so much and survive, and other deadly passions besides those of violence and sensuality can wear away its fine tissues." All this seems to us nearly meaningless. Surely infinite distance from God is a punishment from which Lady Macbeth, on Mrs. Kemble's theory of her character, could not have escaped had she remained innocent of all her particular acts of murder. And how does the body succumb under the soul's overwhelming consciousness of sin if the soul is incapable of a sense of guilt? Many passages in the play, as we read it, would have to be expunged before this theory could be accepted. It is a woman resolved on that which she knows is a crime, but which she thinks will be a profitable one, who says to herself these words:

> . . . . . "Come, come you spirits
> That tend on mortal thoughts, unsex me here.
> Stop up the access and passage to remorse."

And these to her accomplice:

> . . . . . "These deeds must not be thought
> After these ways; so, it will make us mad."

And it is a woman—we do not know that we ought not to italicize woman—oppressed by the memory of a crime, which, by the way, has been unprofitable, who loses the balance of her mind, and who says, "Here's the smell of the blood still. All the perfumes of Arabia will not sweeten this little hand;" and then sighs, "Oh, oh, oh!" so that the physician says, "What a sigh is there! The heart is sorely charged." Much more might be said to controvert this theory of Mrs. Kemble's, but we have not space. And indeed there seems to us nothing to be said in support of it.

—Those who are interested in the military operations of the English in Abyssinia, or who desire to obtain accurate information concerning the present character and condition of a country which seems destined to be forced into more intimate relations with European civilization than it has hitherto maintained, will welcome the octavo volume of Th. Von Heuglin, recently issued by Costenoble in Jena. This work is a record of the author's travels during the years 1861 and 1862 as a member of Die deutsche Expedition, and, in connection with Werner Munzinger's "Oest-afrikanische Studien," may be regarded as among the most valuable fruits of that enterprise. His account of a visit to the Emperor Theodore and to the fortress of Magdala, in the dungeons of which British subjects are now awaiting their deliverance, is especially interesting. The description of the king's personal character; his qualities as a ruler and a warrior; the number, equipment, organization, and discipline of his army; the disposition of his vassals, etc., are the most clear and satisfactory of any that we have yet seen. The same is true also of the geographical and historical portions of the book. The physical configuration of Abyssinia is of such a nature that nearly all the climates of the earth are represented there; so that within an area extending over only five degrees of latitude the products of every zone could be successfully cultivated. Herr Heuglin furnishes also considerable curious and interesting information as to the religious character of the people. The great majority of the inhabitants are Christian; many of the Mohammedan Galla, after having been forced to acknowlege the government of the present sovereign, were compelled to come into the fold by a summary baptism. Two-thirds of the days in the calendar are feast or fast days, and the country is cursed and impoverished by thousands of monks, nuns, and other ecclesiastical drones. The popular mind is overgrown with the rankest superstitions; belief in witchcraft is universal, and some districts are wholly devoted to devil-worship. The picture of his Satanic majesty is always drawn in profile. Abyssinia, too, is the only country which has canonized Pontius Pilate. The Roman governor is there put into the category of the saints.

—A very valuable contribution to archæology is Overbeck's recently published volume, entitled "Die antiken Schriftquellen zur Geschichte der bildenden Künste bei den Griechen." Within the compass of less than five hundred pages we have the literary sources of all our knowledge of Grecian art carefully arranged according to periods, and following in this respect the author's well-known "Geschichte der griechischen Plastik." An alphabetical index of artists' names renders it easy for the reader to turn to any passage in the book, and thus greatly enhances its practical worth. Those who have not a complete classic library within their reach, and who wish to consult the original authorities on the subject of Grecian art, will find in this work an admirable aid. Overbeck does for this interesting department of study what Preller and Ritter have done for Grecian philosophy.

—"Die Fortschritte des Unterrichtswesens in den Culturstaaten Europas," by Beer and Hochegger, the first volume of which has recently appeared, is an historical and statistical account of the various systems of public instruction in Europe, from the primary school to the university. The nucleus of the work is a series of articles on public instruction in Austria, France, and Russia which the authors published originally in the Zeitschrift für die östreichischen Gymnasien (Journal for Austrian Gymnasia). The plan embraces three volumes: the first treats of education in France and Austria; the second will deal in like manner with Russia, Poland, Belgium, Holland, and Italy; the third, Germany, Denmark, Sweden, England, and Switzerland. Spain seems to be entirely ignored, probably because she offers very little material. The curse of Austria in this respect is its isolation and immobility. This work is regarded by European educators as an exceedingly important contribution to pedagogy, and we hope that it will be soon brought to its completion.

SPIRITUAL WIVES.*

We have recently heard of two sound criticisms on Mr. Hepworth Dixon. While he was over here picking up the materials for his "New America"—new enough most of his monstrosities were to most Americans—an English gentleman, a member of Parliament, happened to be also among us taking a look at democracy. Mr. Dixon's name coming up in conversation, his countryman laughed and made this remark: "A precious lot of nonsense he 'll write when he gets home." This anticipative criticism turned out to be, in a general way, a pretty correct one. The other utterance to which we refer is that of Mr. Matthew Arnold, who, in a recent essay, pays his respects to Mr. Dixon in his very best easy-insolent manner: "That able and interesting work of Mr. Hepworth Dixon's," he says, "which we were all reading last year—the 'Mormons, by one of Themselves.' Here again I am not quite sure that my memory serves me as to the exact title," etc. Both of these remarks pleased us very well. As for the first of them, the book was certainly far enough from being a precious lot of sense; the six or seven editions of it that have been published have no doubt misled the mind of a great many people in England; and we should say that they have probably helped to taint the morals of a certain number. As Mr. Arnold rather more than insinuates, it seemed to furnish reason for believing that Mr. Dixon is more or less warmly in sympathy with the peculiar sects and communities that he came over here to describe. This may be so only in appearance. For our own part, we presume him to be rather indifferent as to the subjects of his books. It is not necessary—perhaps it is not proper, though Mr. Arnold seems to think it so—to suppose that Mr. Dixon does not fully approve of that happy mean to which the most of mankind has attained, between the Mormon life, which he does, to be sure, describe with spirit, and the Shaker life, which also he describes with spirit. It is far more charitable to say that he cares little what he writes about so that he makes a selling book. Perhaps if Messrs. Hurst & Blackett could have assured him of the equally heavy sale of another book on "The Holy Land," he would quite as soon have written that as have written this "Spiritual Wives."

"Spiritual Wives," however, certainly does tend to confirm the judgment of him which Mr. Arnold has expressed with such witty severity. It is one more book in the line of the worse parts of "New America." Still, it confirms our own judgment too, for it is a book likely to sell largely. Yet it is, comparatively to "New America" even, a book of small value. It fails to satisfy either of two demands—one at least of which may properly be made of any writer who undertakes such subjects as those of which this book treats. It deals with certain phenomena of diseased spiritual life. They are phenomena which may properly engage the attention of students, but which, for more reasons than one, are not to be talked of commonly. Now, students of morbid psychology, like other students, want of their fellow-students or instructors a full and accurate record of facts, unmixed with "lively writing," unornamented, plain, and distinct—data for the man of science—or they want the results which spiritual insight and the power of philosophic thinking have enabled some abler man than the mere observer to reach. Both together they want, if both can be had; but certainly they want one, and other things than these they do not want. It is only to a very small extent indeed that "Spiritual Wives" answers either of these requirements. It was written for the average subscriber to the circulating libraries, and no one need go to it for more than this—a mere passing reference to some of the sects which have held the doctrine which gives it a name; a pretty full account, of the pictorial-historical kind, of the Königsberg Ebelians; a newspaper correspondent's account of Prince's Agapemone; a rather poor newspaper correspondent's account of certain half-crazed and certain hypocritical persons who figured in one or two old revivals in this country; some desultory insufficient talk about several other people and several sects who have put in practice the theory of free love; and some talk about a number of irrelevant matters of various kinds. In no part of the book is there a satisfactory examination of the doctrine itself, or a scientifically full, orderly, and intelligible collection and collocation of the facts revealed by any of its phases. The first half of the volume, which relates to Ebel and Prince, gives evidence of carefulness in the preparation; but the second half was apparently put into print for little else than to swell the size of the volume. It is a rather confused jumble of indefinite writing about many people and things; about the church of the Apostles, about the Pauline church, about the church of our own day—in which "all the High Church movements run into some form of spiritual mysticism and social innovation;" about the Gothic and Phœnician spirits as regards woman; about Robert Dale Owen, who was "the soul of the Democratic party while that party had a life of its own," on whose departure from it, and because of his departure, the party splintered off into a dozen fragments, who now "is the Privy Councillor of the Republic," and somehow, to-day, a vast power in our politics! about Mr. Raymond—"afterwards so famous as the confidential friend of Abraham Lincoln;" about Mr. Greeley, who allowed the Fourierites to use the columns of the Tribune; about Andrew Jackson Davis and "The Great Harmonia;" about Plato and Goethe, whose "Banquet" and "Elective Affinities" are given in brief synopses; and about a hundred other matters of which none is treated with exhaustiveness, some are treated with the inexactness of vagueness, and some with the inexactness of downright error.

Mr. Dixon has already been complained of because, in his chapters on the Agapemone, he has drawn once more into public notice persons connected with families which are, of course, injured by his exposure of the now half-forgotten crimes and follies of some of their members. We complain of him as guilty of another similar breach of good manners in dragging into his very miscellaneous assemblage of imbecile and immoral visionaries the men of Brook Farm. The objects of those men in trying their experiment, their minds and their characters, were so utterly different from the objects and minds and characters of most of the men and women into whose company he, Mr. Dixon, has seen fit to bring them, that to lead or to help his ill-informed readers to class them together is a piece of gross injustice. The mention of them strengthens the "Gothic spirit" argument about as much as the mention of the omitted Saint Simonians would have done.

It is hardly worth while to say much about a book of this kind. On the whole, looked at from whatever point of view, "Spiritual Wives" will do Mr. Dixon's reputation nothing but harm.

NEWPORT AS IT WAS.*

To the writing called history the historical novel is as the enlargement and development and high coloring of a small corner or patch of the main canvass. Mr. Channing's "Recollections" furnishes each, but especially the novel, with materials, and affords the most important aid to the imagination, without some small endowment of which history is neither to be read nor written. The venerable author could scarcely have bequeathed a more grateful or useful legacy than this simple record of the generation which was the immediate ancestor of the nineteenth century in America. For the usages of Newport were in large measure those of the time, and not peculiar, and were owned in common by our grandfathers of Massachusetts and our grandfathers of Pennsylvania. Among them was the house-furnishing, which we all know, and the costumes, also familiar—in the days when the table was set with pewter, and there were silk-looms and spinning-wheels, but no matches, no coals, and no gas; when women went without hoops, and rode behind their husbands on pillions instead of side-saddles, and boys wore ruffled shirts, but no drawers, and very soluble felt hats, and men wore pointed shoes and small clothes, or trousers without suspenders; when there were no sunshades and no silk umbrellas; when the schoolmaster was an awful being, and everybody flogged children, and ministers seldom brought politics into their pulpits, but talked mostly of eternal punishment; when there was but one school in medicine, and domestic practice was confined to a few carefully dried herbs; when there were no dentists; when the insane and idiotic were either allowed to go at large or suffered from the most cruel restraint and neglect; when there was a rage for poplar trees and a great affection for the sideboard, and the host first asked his visitor, "How are you?" and then, "What will you take?" and gave wine dinners which made wives wonder at night what had become of their husbands, and sent the husbands to bed till they were fit to be got home next morning. These, as we have said, were traits not of Newport or New England solely—probably neither

* "Spiritual Wives. By William Hepworth Dixon, author of 'New America,' 'The Holy Land,' 'William Penn,' etc." London: Hurst & Blackett. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co.

* "Early Recollections of Newport, R. I., from the Year 1793 to 1811. By George G. Channing." Newport: A. J. Ward; Charles E. Hammett, Jr.; Boston: Nichols & Noyes. 1868. Pp. xii., 284.

were those solemn tea-parties, which might be described as Quaker meetings tempered with refreshments; and certainly the reading of the islanders was not more nor less provincial than that of States which earlier put aside their royal charters—in light literature, the novels of Miss Burney, Richardson, Fielding, Smollett, Le Sage, De Foe, etc.

It is hard to realize, notwithstanding Mr. Channing's data, the social and commercial importance of Newport less than sixty years ago, and to think of it as at one time the rival of New York and Boston. The author's namesake and employer, for example, "transacted the greater part of the wholesale business in his native State, in Connecticut, and in a good part of Massachusetts." His trade was to India, to Africa, to Guiana, the West Indies, and all parts of Europe, and employed thirteen vessels of one sort and another. The town kept a dozen vessels plying between it and Cuba and Surinam, bringing molasses to be distilled into New England rum, that again to be casked and sent to Africa in exchange for slaves. The Gulf Stream and a special packet brought great numbers of Southerners to Newport, attracted by its genial climate, its sea-bathing, and the best private school in the States. Newport also sustained a line of stages connecting with a line of sloops from Boston to New York, the sloops with a fair wind reaching Peck Slip in sixteen or seventeen hours. But at the height of its commerce accounts were kept by single entry, there were no sidewalks in its streets, and only two public carriages, so that it took two hours to transport the persons who attended one of the "subscription assemblies" in the winter. At these balls, however—where there were no waltzes nor polkas, and cotillons were hardly in vogue—the equitable spirit of the counting-room also prevailed, partners for the first two dances being drawn by lot, to the great comfort of the homelier ones.

Politics in Newport presented the usual divisions of Republicans and Federalists, with their train of bitternesses which affected all the relations of life. The governor of Rhode Island got a salary of $400 per annum, at a time when wages ruled at five to six shillings a day. The votes of the several towns were brought up to the capital by the senators and representatives to be counted. When the legislature sat for business, the attorney-general attended to prepare or revise the bills offered for adoption—a prudent arrangement, worthy of preservation and of imitation. Voters endorsed their names upon their ballots—another safeguard. Authorized punishments, besides execution, were the whipping of men at the cart's tail, of women in the jail yard, and the pillory.

Some of the incidents of the author's boyhood are to be found in the first volume of the memoir of his brother, the late Dr. W. E. Channing. That the large and remarkable family of which they were members were "raised" pure in a town which, as we have seen, was not favorable to youthful morality, was due to the discipline of their excellent mother. She had a standing and invariable injunction for the children not to go into the water; but as she was quite sure it was frequently disregarded, she merely felt the hair of the supposed delinquent and flogged him if she found any wet ends. Whether they could swim or not, made no difference. To her is attributed the old Joe of ordering a gun to be let alone because it might go off although it had no lock on it; and the anecdote well illustrates her constitutional anxiety. Upon the author, who was not a robust infant, she tried the hydropathic treatment with eminent success, feeding him at the same time on "whitpot"—the white Indian meal peculiar to Rhode Island, mixed with milk and molasses. She clothed him in the frocks which descended from his older sisters, and sent him to a primary school where the boys and girls were dressed alike, and sat, or rather rotated, on round blocks of wood, furnished by their parents, there being no desks and no chairs other than the dame's. Sunday was for him the least agreeable day of the week, and if it was winter he sat shivering in the chilled meeting-house, perhaps with his hair just cropped by the barber, while the minister was muffled to the chin, and the women alone were furnished with foot-stoves. There were no rubbers then, and boots were a luxury. Shoes were poorly made, a cheap shoemaker from Bristol making an annual visit to get the length of the children's feet. For good living they did not want, with their "journey-cake"—the making of which is a "lost art"—their still approved Rhode Island poultry, turtle from Nassau, and, for fruit, the famous Rhode Island greening and superb quinces.

Mr. Channing's recollections of prominent men who either resided in Newport or visited it professionally are full of interest. Of Dr. Samuel Hopkins, whose congregation was composed mostly of laboring men, he gives the following picture (p. 90):

"He was ungainly in gait and dress; wore, when on horseback, a robe of stuff called at the time calamanco, a glossy, woollen material, of green color, which was secured round the waist by a silk girdle. His head-gear was a red cap, over a wig. He rode with his arms a-kimbo."

He thinks Mrs. Stowe had no foundation for the story of his wooing. A air and minute appreciation of the doctor is given by Dr. Channing in the memoir already alluded to, and his opposition to slavery is, happily, not apocryphal. In the same town was the Episcopal Trinity church, which permitted colored people to worship only when posted behind a screen that concealed them from the rest of the congregation. Father Thurston bore testimony against intemperance. He was obliged to work on week-days, and, being a cooper, might have made casks for rum, but would not, so made pails with a good conscience.

Of the "Friends" Mr. Channing has many anecdotes, and says that they were "anti-slavery in word and act." His father probably remembered when they were neither. John Woolman visited the island in May, 1760, and understood that a large number of slaves were imported from Africa into Newport, and were then on sale by a member of the Society. "Some leading active members about Newport" were in the practice of slave-keeping, and these he exhorted privately to discontinue it. At the Yearly Meeting he read a form of petition to the legislature to discourage future importations, and it was recommended "to be signed out of meeting by such who were free." Friends were then also implicated in lotteries, and otherwise shared the faults of the "world's people." Benjamin Lundy attended Yearly Meeting at Newport in 1828, and he wrote in his diary: "Sectarianism nearly closes up my way here, I being but a moderate Quaker."

What the Hessians spared of the prosperity of Newport, the embargo destroyed, and the town has remained for half a century more like a fossil than any other on the New England seaboard, not even Salem excepted. Latterly, a new life has been breathed into it owing to its increasing reputation as a watering-place, and Mr. Channing comes like a good bookkeeper to close the old account. We wish him plenty of readers.

MR. MOSS'S "CHRISTIAN COMMISSION."*

About four months after the war was begun by the attack on Sumter Mr. Vincent Colyer, of this city, formed the idea of bringing religious influences to bear upon the men in the field. But the Christians of the country were rather backward, and it was some time before he could get the Young Men's Christian Associations together in convention. They did, however, meet in the autumn of 1861, and formed the Christian Commission. Mr. Charles Demond, of Boston, was the framer of the resolutions then adopted, and he speaks of them as follows:

"In looking at the resolutions of the convention which formed the Commission I am more firmly convinced that the Lord was guiding us. I drew those resolutions with no definite idea, and yet God so directed me that all the main features of our work were there, or entirely in harmony with them. How small were our thoughts then, and how dark the way for a long time in our early meetings in New York! Blessed be the Lord for the way in which he has led us. It is his doing, and marvellous in our eyes."

It was some time after this that anything of consequence was accomplished by the new organization for "the spiritual and temporal welfare" of the soldiers. For a good many months—seven or eight—the work languished, and at times it seemed as if it would never be even well begun. The religious newspapers did very little indeed to forward it; several of the officers resigned their places; the Commission had no office, and, indeed, hardly deskroom that it could call its own, and for some cause which we have not learned it fell out with the Young Men's Christian Association of this city. In July, 1863, Mr. Morrison, in charge of the central office, says, in a letter full of suppressed yet lively dissatisfaction, that the property on hand consists of a mahogany table with two drawers, two oak chairs, some books and stationery in a desk—the desk apparently a borrowed one—a lot of pamphlets, miscellaneous books, newspapers, and magazines; a coal-scuttle, coal-scoop, hammer, box-opener, and marking-pot; some paper, nails, and twine; eighty-four three-cent stamps and fifty blue ones in a buff envelope, and a less number of the same value in a box of pens in the back part of a drawer. The only thing, in fact, to which Mr. Morrison was able to look back with pleasure when he afterwards reflected on his administration was that, daily, there was held in his office a pretty united, earnest prayer-meeting of one.

Till 1863 less had been attempted, less by far, than was expected, and less had been done than had been attempted, for the delegates were not looked on with over-much favor by the authorities, and the people had been brought neither to a perception of the importance of the work proposed nor a knowledge of the Commission's existence. In the beginning of 1863, however, affairs took a better turn. During the first year the Commission, badly managed, experienced a series of rebuffs from the Washington officials, but these became less frequent as time passed by. Mr. Lincoln was always well inclined, General McClellan seems to have never failed to respond courteously to the requests of the delegates, Provost-Marshal-General Patrick was a very warm friend of the Commission, and when application was made to Grant for leave to work within the limits of his command he at once made such answer as might have been expected. His general order on the subject is entirely in harmony with all that has since been learned of his character—a character which, the more that is learned of it, the more appears to have for its basis what Western men call "horse-sense." He displayed his usual obliviousness of the red-tape chains which harnessed and hampered many others of our commanders, and appears to have perceived that the distribution of newspapers and books among his fellow-citizens in arms; the presence among them of men and women who revived in their minds the best ideas connected with home; who supplied them with reading matter that called them away from euchre and bluff and corrupting conversation; who set them singing hymns and hearing sermons when they might otherwise have been breaking guard or smuggling whiskey into camp; who nursed and fed men for whose death too often the hospital stewards were waiting with a natural but discouraging impatience; who wrote thousands of letters that brought back to sick men thousands of comforting letters; who, in short, made able-bodied soldiers less disorderly and able-bodied and disabled soldiers more happy and comfortable—such persons, he perceived, were persons that might properly be used by the general of a volunteer army, although no authority for their transportation and subsistence is discoverable in the West Point traditions of the Commissary's and Quartermaster's Departments.

* "Annals of the United States Christian Commission. By Rev. Lemuel Moss, Home Secretary to the Commission." Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. 1868.

It is not necessary for us—the public is already so familiar with the literature of similar labors—to follow the thread of these annals through the four years of the Commission's existence. The stores distributed during that time amounted in value to more than three and a half millions of dollars; the publications distributed and the preaching done turned out in the end to have cost much less than that other part of the Commission's work—not distinctly intended at first—which was precisely identical with the work of the Sanitary Commission. Speaking with exactness, the proportionate cost of the several departments of the Commission's labor is as follows:—The cost of stores distributed and of services rendered in diet kitchens was sixty-seven and one-fifth per cent. of the whole expenditure; the cost of publications, of incidental aid given to delegates, of tents, chapels, and chapel furniture was only twenty-seven and three-tenths per cent. But it must be remembered, in estimating the relative proportions of what may be called the legitimate and the illegitimate work of the Commission, that of its army of five thousand delegates few received any pay, and, further, that although a delegate distributed in a year stores worth $5,536, while the worth of the tracts and books he gave away was less than $1,500, still he was rendering the additional service—essentially similar to the distribution of tracts—of preaching, on an average, eighty-nine sermons a year, attending one hundred and eighteen prayer-meetings, and saying pious words beside sick-beds an indefinite number of times. It is true enough, as Mr. Moss says, after giving elaborate tables of expenditures, receipts, and so on, that figures cannot tell the whole story; the delegates must have been of great sanitary service by the performance of the work specially their own, to say nothing of the effect that their instructions may have had on the spiritual welfare of the men with whom they came in contact. However, there is no necessary end to considerations of this kind, and there is a necessary limit to these remarks.

It remains to say a word of the book. It begins with a long and useless essay entitled "A Glance Backwards," which talks about the Roman, Greek, and mediæval methods of treating prisoners and caring for the sick, and which brings its account down through the Crimean war and the Franco-Italian war and the Schleswig-Holstein war, but says not a word about the Sanitary Commission of our American rebellion. Then follows an essay entitled "Preliminary Movements," which contains facts in regard to the formation of the earliest societies for the relief of soldiers—germs of both the Christian and the Sanitary Commissions. In this essay also the Sanitary Commission is conspicuous by its almost total absence, and Mr. Moss would have done wisely but not too well—only well enough—if he had saved his book from the charge of illiberality which with color, at least, of truth can be brought against it. Suppressions of truth are mostly suggestions of falsehoods; but faith in the Sanitary Commission is to-day part of the furniture of the general American mind—a fixture, rather, of the American mind—and to omit mention of it, or give but the slightest mention of it, in an account of the agencies that have latterly ameliorated war, is of disadvantage only to the man who makes the omission. So much for one thing that struck us unpleasantly in reading Mr. Moss's work. After the two preparatory essays we have as the remainder of the book the annals of the Christian Commission. They are truly annals in confining the reader to the chronological sequence of events, and their author unnecessarily fails of making a book, and makes a confused collection of facts and names. He however does to some extent atone for his artistic failure by giving, in his last pages, an exhaustive index, the order of which, to use a distinction that Coleridge used to insist on, enables us to dispense, after a fashion, with the lack of method with which the work was composed.

Life of Maximilian I., late Emperor of Mexico. With a Sketch of the Empress Carlotta. By Frederic Hall, one of his Majesty's Legal Advisers. "Fiat Justitia ruat cœlum." (New York: James Miller. 1868.)—It may be assumed that no legal talent, however great, could have rescued Maximilian from the fate which finally overtook him; and if it could, it is safe to say that Maximilian stood in need of abler counsel than Mr. Hall. His narrative is characterized by the most preposterous rhetoric and the utter absence of sympathy or imagination. We should never have done if we attempted to give examples of either of these defects; but we pledge our word that they exist, together with turgid amplifications, frequent platitudes, and occasional puerility of thought. In his desire to be faithful, the author descends to the smallest details without regard to the propriety of introducing them where he does, and sometimes with such ludicrous effect as when, wishing to describe the charitable activity of the Empress, he says (p. 42): "She has often been observed walking through the mud, holding up her skirts, in order to visit the poor in the hospitals," etc. His translations from original documents share the peculiarities of his style, and we have the inhabitants of Trieste promising to "continue their peregrinations around Miramar."

These things would not be worth mentioning if they did not contribute so largely to the bulk of the book, and fill the plodding reader with despair of ever reaching the scene of Mr. Hall's début. This does not take place till the two hundredth page, the volume containing but three hundred and seventeen pages. For about a dozen pages we read of a visit to the captive Emperor and sundry conversations with him on the part of his "legal adviser"—how appointed, we do not learn—in which Maximilian is reported to have said of the accusations against him: "When they were read to me, I had to put my hand over my mouth to keep from laughing, they were so silly." He also admitted—and we consider it the most valuable revelation that Mr. Hall makes—that since his imprisonment he had warned his betrayer, Lopez, of an attempt to assassinate him. Mr. Hall also asserts that Maximilian signed the October decree most reluctantly, and only under the importunities of Marshal Bazaine, who represented to him that Juarez had fled the country; that he annulled it when fairly rid of the French a year later (Oct., 1866), and that in the meantime he did his utmost to relieve it of any but a moral effect upon his opponents, by forbidding executions under it in every case that came to his knowledge—ordering for that purpose, as he informed Mr. Hall, the telegraph office to be kept open night and day, and word of the capture of prisoners to be brought him at all hours.

Such glimpses of the Emperor as we get through this personal intercourse, and through the uniformly elevated and manifestly sincere utterances of his speeches, letters, and proclamations, confirm that high opinion of him which prevailed in Lombardo-Venetia during his rule there, and which no unbiassed act of the man himself seems ever to have impeached. His goodness and his chivalric notions of the duties of a sovereign in this age shone in Italy but were wholly lost in Mexico, not only because of the different characters of the two peoples, but because of the different circumstances in which he assumed authority. On the one hand, he was inexcusable for consenting to reap the fruits of an infamous invasion, of which the withdrawal of England and Spain might have aroused suspicions; on the other, Mexico, if not excusable for the execution of Maximilian, is not to be judged as Lombardy would have been for a similar protest against foreign rule. These distinctions, however, Mr. Hall is unwilling to allow, and he argues laboriously the unconstitutionality of the court-martial, sentence, and shooting at Queretaro. In Mexico, of all countries, this is love's labor lost. If Mexican constitutions were as yet anything more than paper, the Church party would not have revolted, nor Jecker have made his loan, nor France adopted it, nor Maximilian been called in. And if Maximilian had abdicated when the withdrawal of the French left him in the grip of Escobedo on the north and Diaz on the south, and showed him how insignificant a territory remained as his "empire," and to what a minority his "subjects" were reduced, Mexico would have been less cruel, and the world happier for Maximilian's bloodless but salutary experience. For the sake of its documents and a few strokes as from an eye-witness, we place Mr. Hall's book upon the shelf, remembering that we do not yet know half the secrets of the Mexican expedition, and that others besides the Count de Kératry are to take up the shameful tale.

Randolph Honor. By the author of "Ingemisco." (New York: Richardson & Co. 1868.)—Miss Evans, of Mobile, has at various times offered to the novel-reading public a good deal of information concerning the personal and mental peculiarities of the "chivalry;" but we had always supposed that her testimony was not altogether impartial, and could only be accepted with certain reservations. Such encyclopædic knowledge, such commendably familiar and quotable acquaintance with the poetry and philosophy of all nations as her characters exhibited, seemed hardly a thing to be predicated of an entire community. The author of "Randolph Honor," however, between whom and Miss Evans there apparently exists no complicity, offers us further evidence on the same point, and we confess to finding the cumulative force of the testimony serious. The members of the Southern aristocracy, with their "white hands and easy manners"—two things which this writer's observation convinces her occupy to each other the invariable relation of cause and effect—are then really in the habit of carrying on their flirtations, their serious talks, their downright love-making, in quotations. The fact—if indeed it be one—is suggestive. It lessens the actual guilt of the rebellion, and makes its moral history a fitting subject for philosophers of the congenital school. Dr. Holmes might do it justice. The vice of appropriation is plainly in the Southern blood; and from a line of poetry to an arsenal, from a stale bit of moralizing to a human soul and body, they take by instinct. Unfortunately, their intellectual importance dwindles along with their moral responsibility. Their literature becomes a "thing of shreds and patches," in which there is nothing Southern but a certain strange perversion of the moral sentiment.

MOZART. A Biographical Novel, from the German of Heribert Rau, by Edward Rowland Sill. 12mo, cloth, $1 75.

This work combines the qualities that have made our musical publications so successful with those which have made the position of Mühlbach and the other German historical novelists. It gives an account of Mozart's appearance as an infant phenomenon at the Austrian Court—how he clambered into Maria Theresa's lap, and told the emperor that he considered as "the greatest musician of past times the man who blew down the walls of Jericho with his horn." It also describes his appearance at the French Court and his contretemps with Madame Pompadour. Then it follows him into the Court of Joseph II., and brings upon the scene the great characters who figured there. His strange love affairs with Giuditta and Constanze Weber are given more graphically than is possible in any formal biography. The volume closes with a most skilful delineation of the strange circumstances—which some people will insist on believing supernatural—that led to the composition of the "Requiem" and seemed to have hastened the composer's death.

IN THE YEAR '13. By Fritz Reuter. Translated from the Platt-Deutsch by Charles Lee Lewes (son of G. H. Lewes). 16mo, flexible cloth, $1.

A story of the French occupation of Germany, under Napoleon, which contains a wealth of sentiment and humor. It has been translated into all the principal European languages. Its English translation is, in the opinion of publishers who make translations a specialty, one of the happiest which has ever come under their notice.

ITALY. (Rome and Naples.) By H. Taine. Translated by John Durand. 8vo, cloth. A new work by the Author and Translator of "The Philosophy of Art," characterized by the same appreciation of the beautiful, philosophic insight, and felicity of style which made that volume appeal to all cultivated tastes, but devoted to a range of topics vastly wider and more in sympathy with the general reader.

NATHAN THE WISE. By Lessing. Second edition, revised, with numerous amendments, $1 75.

LEYPOLDT & HOLT, Publishers,
451 Broome Street, New York.

L. W. SCHMIDT,
GERMAN BOOKSELLER,
24 Barclay Street, New York,

Imports regularly all the leading Foreign Publications, including Periodicals.

Foreign works noticed in The Nation kept constantly on hand or procured to order.

NEW AND ELEGANTLY ILLUSTRATED EDITION OF

THACKERAY'S WORKS,

TO BE COMPRISED IN ABOUT TWENTY LARGE CROWN 8vo VOLUMES, printed on superfine tinted paper from large type, and handsomely bound in fine cloth, gilt extra, bevelled boards. Price $3 50 per volume.

Now Ready:

I.

VANITY FAIR.

In two volumes. With 40 Steel Engravings and 150 Wood-cuts.

II.

PENDENNIS.

In two volumes. With 46 Steel Engravings and over 120 Wood-cuts.

A NEW BOOK:

OUR CHILDREN IN HEAVEN. By W. H. Holcombe, M.D. 12mo, tinted paper, cloth extra, $1 75.

NEARLY READY:

TRAVELS IN THE INTERIOR OF SOUTH AFRICA. By James Chapman, F.R.G.S.

HISTORY OF ENGLAND DURING THE EARLY AND MIDDLE AGES. By Professor Pearson.

THE PUPILS OF ST. JOHN THE DIVINE. By the author of the "Heir of Redclyffe."

 For sale by all Booksellers.

Published by
J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO.,
Philadelphia.

ALLEN EBBS,

183 Broadway (Up-stairs), New York,

IMPORTER OF

Fine Standard and Illustrated Books.

DAVID C. FRANCIS

(Formerly C. S. Francis & Co.),

DEALER IN NEW AND OLD BOOKS,

506 BROADWAY (up stairs).

Priced catalogues of books in stock issued from time to time, and will be forwarded free to any address.
Orders for any obtainable books promptly filled.
Binding executed in any style.

Angell on Carriers—New Edition.

LITTLE, BROWN & CO.,
Boston,

Publish this day:

A TREATISE ON THE LAW CONCERNING THE LIABILITIES AND RIGHTS OF COMMON CARRIERS. By Joseph K. Angell. Fourth edition. Revised and enlarged by John Lathrop.

"Since the third edition of this work was published, in 1857, the law of Carriers has been so much considered by the Courts, that I have found it necessary, in order to bring the work down to the present time, to add sixty pages of new matter, containing over one thousand cases not cited in the previous edition. By adopting a uniform system of abbreviating the names of the reports, I have been able to add this large amount of new matter without increasing the size of the work."—Editor's Preface.

Recently Published:

THE BANKRUPT ACT OF 1867; compared with the Act of 1841, the English Bankrupt Law, and the Insolvency Law of Massachusetts. With a Digest of Decisions of the Courts of the United States, the several States, and of England, and with Forms of Proceeding. By Edward Avery and George M. Hobbs. 8vo, law sheep, $4 50.

In Press—Nearly Ready:

UNITED STATES STATUTES AT LARGE. Vol. XIV.

UNITED STATES DIGEST. Vol. XXIV.

UNITED STATES COMMERCIAL DIGEST.

ALSO:

BRAZIL AND THE BRAZILIANS. By Rev. J. C. Fletcher and Rev. S. P. Kidder. Eighth edition, revised and brought down to date. With 150 illustrations on steel, stone, and wood.

THE SPIRIT OF SEVENTY-SIX; or, The Coming Woman. A Prophetic Drama. II. A Change of Base. III. Dr. Mondschein.

[These little comediettas were originally written only or presentation in private theatricals; but the interest with which the first has been received by the audiences before which it has been recently performed, has induced their publication in the present form.]

EVERETT'S ORATIONS. Vol. IV.

THE DIVINE PROVIDENCE.

By EMANUEL SWEDENBORG.

1 vol. 12mo, extra cloth, bevelled boards, gilt top, $1 25.

The object of this work is to unfold the laws of order according to which the Lord's moral government is regulated. It shows that the Divine Providence works according to certain invariable laws; that it is universal, extending to the least things as well as to the greatest; that it has respect to what is eternal with man, and to things temporary only for the sake of what is eternal.

All the writings of Swedenborg and collateral works constantly on hand.

Publishing House of the New Jerusalem Church, 20 Cooper Union, New York.

JOS. R. PUTNAM, Manager.

 SEND FOR A CATALOGUE.

The Nation.

VOL. VI.—NO. 142. THURSDAY, MARCH 19, 1868. {FIVE DOLLARS PER ANNUM. TWELVE CENTS PER COPY.

CONTENTS.

THE WEEK 201

EDITORIAL ARTICLES:

The Situation since the New Hampshire Election 224

West and East—Debtor and Creditor 225

The Proposed Constitution of New York 227

England 230

CORRESPONDENCE:

The West and Greenbacks 231

Supreme Court Decisions 231

"The Nation's" Conservatism 231

"The Nation's" Radicalism 232

NOTES:

Literary 232

Scientific 233

Variation of Animals and Plants under Domestication 234

Five Dollars per annum, in advance; Six months, Three Dollars; Forty Dollars to Clubs of Ten; Clergymen, Four Dollars.

THE NATION is sent till positively ordered discontinued, and all arrears have been paid. Subscribers are particularly requested to note the expiration of their subscriptions, and to forward what is due for the ensuing year, with or without further reminder from this office.

GEORGE STREET, 30 CORNHILL, LONDON, E. C., AGENT FOR THE RECEIPT OF SUBSCRIPTIONS AND ADVERTISEMENTS.

E. L. GODKIN & CO., PUBLISHERS, Box 6732, NEW YORK CITY.

The Week.

ON Tuesday the House, by 122 to 2, passed a bill which at one stroke cuts off $84,000,000 of revenue. It removes the five per cent. tax from manufactures generally, and retains it upon only five or six articles—distilled spirits, fermented liquors and certain kinds of wine, oils distilled from coal, illuminating gas, and manufactured tobacco in all its forms. It is expected, however, that the loss to the Government from this measure of needed relief will not be more than some $60,000,000, as the committee will propose an increase of certain special taxes on different manufactures, and a tax of one-twentieth of one per cent. on sales of manufactured articles when amounting to more than a given sum—say $5,000. On Wednesday, in the Senate, Mr. Dixon delivered a speech, apropos of Mr. Sherman's Funding Bill, on the reconstruction policy of the Republican party and its financial schemes. An amendment to the Judiciary act was passed, permitting writs of error in internal revenue cases to be taken to the Supreme Court. The House, on the same day, occupied itself with Mr. Eliot's Freedmen's Bureau bill, which continues the Bureau for another year and re-establishes it wherever it has been discontinued; and with Mr. Stevens's bill for the admission of Alabama without a new election. Mr. Farnsworth defended the bill as well as he was able, and Mr. Brooks attacked it in a set speech; he appealed to Congress to profit by the example of the Amphictyonic Council, who refused to permit the erection of a monument after the war between Thrace and Lacedæmon. The general bill, by the way, which directs that in future elections in the South a majority of votes cast shall be sufficient to ratify the constitutions proposed, has become a law, the President having refrained from vetoing it in the ten days allowed him. Arkansas will vote under it—indeed, is now voting. On this same day the falsity of Mr. Logan's story about the $18,640,000 undestroyed bonds was plainly shown by a report from the Retrenchment Committee. Mr. Logan had no answer except general but very violent denunciations of the Treasury Department as reeking with corruption. The same subject came up on Thursday, but there was nothing developed that changes the character of it. Afterwards Mr. Schenck brought in a bill which he wished the House to pass, saying that there could be no objection to it from either side of the House, as it merely amended the Judiciary act so as to place officers of Internal Revenue on the same footing as Customs officers, so far as regards appeals from the Circuit Courts to the Supreme Court. While he was talking, Mr. Wilson, of Iowa, asked him to suffer the bill to be amended by a section repealing so much of the Judiciary act of February, 1867, as authorizes an appeal in habeas corpus cases from the Circuit Courts to the Supreme Court. So amended, the bill was passed. Mr. Schenck, who had had a word or two said to him, perceiving that its effect would be to remove the McCardle case out of the Supreme Court, did not modify the language he had just used in speaking of the bill. The Democratic members suffered it to pass, partly because they did not see its bearing, and partly, we should say, because they had a little more faith in Mr. Schenck's sense of honor than they will have again. It was a piece of sharp practice which no other Republican in the House could perhaps be much blamed for participating in, but which Mr. Schenck, as having been the means of lulling the Democrats to security by words true when he introduced the bill, but false when it was passed, ought certainly to have prevented. On Saturday, however, when he was attacked for his share in the business, he showed not the least compunction, and could not see, apparently, that any fraud had been committed. On Friday the President's trial took up the day. After hearing Mr. Stanbery, who was unexpectedly bitter, and Mr. Butler, who was bitter as was expected, and Mr. Bingham, who was on the whole unexpectedly calm and cool, the Senate refused to allow Mr. Johnson forty days in which to prepare his answer, refused, on the other hand, to order the trial to proceed at once, and finally settled on Monday next as the day for the filing of the answer. On Monday the Senate did nothing of general interest. The House refused to second the previous question on Mr. Ingersoll's resolution to issue greenbacks to the amount of such notes withdrawn from circulation by Mr. McCulloch when he was contracting the currency—an encouraging sign. On Tuesday the House discussed the removal of disabilities from Mr. W. W. Holden, Mr. James L. Orr, General Longstreet, and others. The House, on motion of Mr. Schenck, decided to wait a few weeks before taking action. Mr. Stevens asked for the recommittal of his bill for the admission of Alabama, and we shall hear no more of it.

The result of the New Hampshire election has not been officially promulgated, but it is certain that Harriman is Governor by a majority that will hardly vary by a score of votes from 2,530. This in a total vote of about 77,000, or, to be exact, of 76,868. The Republican Committee were laughed at by the Democratic press for expecting a vote of 76,531, which, indeed, is about 5,000 more votes than New Hampshire ever cast before this election. Their prediction was, however, verified, as it often has been before, with an exactness that is really astonishing, and which shows that the organization of the party in that State is well worth study and imitation. It is generally understood that for the excellence of this organization credit is to be given to the Hon. E. H. Rollins, who has seen several years of service as head of the State Committee. As regards the relative loss and gain of the two parties, it appears that the Republicans cast 3,803 more votes than last year; that the Democrats cast 4,493 more; and that there is, therefore, on the new vote a gain for the Democrats. The actual Republican majority is diminished by something like 600 or 650. On the whole, the Republicans have every reason to be very well satisfied with the result of as well-fought a political battle as has ever taken place in this country, and may properly fire guns of rejoicing over the defeat of a very confident enemy. Their adversaries, too, would be more than human not to be a little disheartened, for since 1862 they have never seemed to have so fair a chance of success. The Mobile Tribune, however, takes almost too melancholy a view of the situation. It receives the news with this welcome:

"There is a sulphurous volcanic cloud rising over the northern land; and by the lurid light that gleams along its borders we can see houses in flames, and fields desolated, and outraged women flying with dishevelled hair to hide their shame, and mastless hulks with blood-stained decks drifting rudderless on seas whitened no more for ever with the canvas-wings of commerce, and cities of the dead whose mouldering ruins would topple over and fall with the jar upon the air of a single footstep upon their sidewalks, but the footstep is not there."

It should remember that the Democrats have made gains in Biddeford, Maine, and other towns.

We have on several occasions during the past year drawn attention to the injury to the country which Chief-Justice Chase was doing by going about the country haranguing negroes, by lobbying for the freedmen in Congress, and by going out, in a patriotic glow, to Ohio to vote the Republican ticket, and deliver harangues from his window to crowds in the street. We said that in doing thus, no matter how pure his own motives were, he was destroying the popular respect for his office, and diminishing the popular confidence in his judicial integrity. We said, moreover, that his being talked of even, with his own permission or connivance, as a candidate for the Presidency, was a great scandal and a great injury to the very class he was trying to serve. But some of our Radical contemporaries were highly delighted with his performances, thought it a very fine thing that the Chief-Justice should stump the country in a good cause, and that "our most distinguished jurist" should be a candidate for "the highest office, etc., etc." Well, our prognostications as to the result already begin to be verified. He has to preside now at a most important political trial, and his very first ruling or opinion, simply because it happens to be opposed to that of the majority, is ascribed to base motives. Nay, the very people who were most delighted by his political tours have now begun to hold him up to odium, and throw doubts on his fidelity. The last Anti-Slavery Standard, which is filled every week with the writhings or rejoicings of this far-sighted class, denounces the Chief-Justice as "the ally of the President;" says that he, "mad with the Presidential fever, desperate in the consciousness of baffled plans, and, meanly jealous of Wade, perhaps cherishing the forlorn hope of a Democratic nomination, joins forces with the enemy." More horrible still, it calls attention to the disgusting fact that on Wednesday week, in the evening, "the doors of the Chief-Justice's drawing-room were flung open, and the usher" (the abandoned wretch) "announced in a loud voice: 'The President of the United States and daughter.'" No wonder that, after this, the Standard pronounces him "a serious obstacle, whose evil intentions are only limited by his courage, which, fortunately, is not great." We sincerely hope that the result of this attempt to use the bench of the Supreme Court as a step to the White House will be a warning to all Mr. Chase's successors.

This exposure of what goes on in the Chief-Justice's salons suggests naturally the enquiry whether the judges of the Supreme Court have been watched in their own houses as closely as they ought to have been. We greatly fear that both the Judiciary Committee and the Reconstruction Committee have been remiss on this point. The people are dying to learn, for instance, what it was Judge Field said at Mr. Black's dinner-party, and yet nothing, so far as we have heard, has been done to gratify them. Now, we suggest, respectfully, that more use ought to be made of these gentlemen's waiters, and especially male waiters. A patriotic attendant at table, properly instructed by General Butler, could certainly, if he kept his ears open, pick up a great deal of interesting matter, and perhaps furnish some startling facts about the political opinions of the monsters who now sit on the bench of the Supreme Court. Some people may think this a wild, visionary idea, and practical men may tell us that waiters are too busy to listen to dinner conversation; but we have considered the matter carefully, and are satisfied there is something in our suggestion. Everybody knows that there are always intervals of indeterminate length between the courses, the blame of which, when they are too long, is laid on the cook. Now, what could be easier than for a waiter of the right sort to keep the guests waiting as long as might be necessary to jot down, in the pantry, the traitorous utterances of any "obstacles" who might be round the table in the other room? There has been an amount of negligence about this matter which makes us fear some of our leaders are not up to their work.

We have for some time given up discussing Mr. Thaddeus Stevens's opinions either on reconstruction or political economy, owing to the growth of a conviction in our minds that he did not reach them by ordinary human means—in other words, that he is a prophet or soothsayer, or something of that kind. For instance, when he announced some months ago that the man who, while professing to be a democrat, denied the claim of the negro to the suffrage, must be an atheist, we felt that some of the links in the chain of reasoning by which he reached this conclusion were hidden from mortal eyes. It is well established that you cannot refute a prophet; your remedy is, if he becomes troublesome, to disbelieve him. The New York Times, however, does not seem to be of this opinion, and accordingly assails each of Mr. Stevens's political revelations with as much ardor and enthusiasm as if it were dealing with the product of the common human brain. He has, within a few days, written a letter to Colonel Forney, informing this gentleman that he (Thaddeus Stevens) "has long reflected with such ability as he can command on the subject of the Declaration of Independence," and has come to the conclusion that "universal suffrage was one of the inalienable rights intended to be embraced in that instrument by our fathers at the time of the Declaration;" he therefore gives notice that the Committee on Reconstruction "have finally resolved that no State shall be admitted into the Union unless its constitution provides for universal suffrage." This notice the Times assails with much irreverence and acerbity, but, in our opinion, somewhat foolishly. There is no logical means of driving Mr. Stevens from his position. The way to meet it is the way they meet false witnesses in Hindostan, who occasionally prove trumped-up debts in the courts. The alleged debtor rarely relies on contradictory evidence; he simply produces a greater number of perjurers to swear that they saw the debt paid. So, also, the best mode of meeting Mr. Stevens's doctrines is to get some other elderly gentleman of good political standing to go to sleep with the Declaration of Independence under his pillow after a late dinner, and find out what "the fathers" thought after they had drawn the Declaration. The process would, we admit, be dangerous; for a person with a weak digestion and an active brain might easily be told by "the fathers" that when they spoke of "inalienable rights" they had an eight-hour law and a usury law in their minds, and were in favor of unlimited greenbacks; but the risk must be taken by anybody who wants to demolish Mr. Stevens. When a gentleman gives you, as conclusive, the result of his own "reflections" on a subject like this, there is no use in arguing with him, even if he were willing to argue with you, which Mr. Stevens never is.

A correspondent writes us from Philadelphia that he has no money invested in United States bonds, and that therefore he has to utter no cry of the bondholder awaiting robbery; but he has, he says, a very large investment for himself and his children in the honor and good name of his native country. So he sends us a fact or two which has fallen under his observation, and which tends to confirm the view that we have all along been taking—namely, that if it were possible for Mr. Butler and Mr. Pendleton to commit the country to repudiation, by "strict construction," "letter of law," and so on, the persons from whom the country would be stealing would, in a majority of cases, be, not "a bloated bondocracy," but poor people who are ahead of the world by only a few hundred dollars. Ask any broker, says our correspondent, and he will tell you that bonds of the small denomination—fifties and hundreds—are always from ¼ to ¾ of one per cent. higher than the larger. He gives us an account of a colored man—a servant—whom he met in a hotel. He was a slave in North Carolina when the war broke out, but he made his escape, and in the summer of 1866 had saved from his wages $300, which he had invested in Government bonds. Mr. Pendleton might easily lay hands on him for purposes of experiment, for he lives in Ohio, in Trumbull county.

Our attention has been called by a legal correspondent to a paragraph in the Nation of March 5, in which, in speaking of Mr. J. H. Harris, a colored man in Georgia, who has declined a Congressional nomination for Congress, we say that, "as a matter of fact, under the Constitution, no colored man can go to Congress for some time." This is no doubt too sweeping a statement. What we ought to have said was that no freedman could go to Congress for some time; though we cannot feel sure even of this until we hear from Thaddeus Stevens, who is at present "reflecting on the subject of the Declaration of Independence," and discovering new things in it every week.

It may be remembered that some time ago M. de Kervéguen, a member of the Corps Législatif, in his place in the Chamber, read a letter, published in a Belgian paper, charging the Siècle and Opinion Nationale, the two most widely-circulated Paris papers, and, in fact, the Paris press generally, with having been bribed by the Prussian Government to support its policy during the late complications. The editors of the Siècle and Opinion of course denied the charges, and demanded a "jury of honor" to try their truth, and the "jury" was accordingly chosen by the parties, consisting of M. Berryer, the leader of the French bar, M. Jules Favre, who ranks next to him, M Martel, and the Marquis d'Andelarre. They have sat and examined witnesses and documents at intervals during the last three months, and have now announced their decision, which is that the charges in question had not a particle of foundation. M. de Kervéguen excuses himself for his share in the affair by alleging that, when he read the letter, he expressly disclaimed all responsibility for it; but his reading it had, nevertheless, the effect of raising a howl of delight amongst the Cæsarists in the Chamber, and to lay Messrs. Havin and Guéroult, the two editors, under very odious imputations for nearly four months. The jury, however, refuse to let him off on this plea. They say that, no matter what disclaimer he made, "he rendered himself morally responsible from the more serious authority his personal position, and the greater publicity his reading them in the tribune gave to imputations which are totally devoid of truth." There are some gentlemen in Washington who might learn a useful lesson from this incident—General Logan, for instance. He recently charged the Treasury officials, in his place in the House, with having reported the official destruction of many millions of Government bonds, while what they really destroyed was only blank paper, the inference being of course that they kept the bonds themselves. The charge was proved on investigation to be utterly false; but Mr. Logan, instead of being daunted or ashamed, unblushingly replied that, if they did not cheat about the bond burning, they did cheat, "not only by the sale of bonds, but by giving out dies and by paying counterfeit bonds and duplicate bonds," and that he did not intend to be "driven off or scared off" by "all the committees on earth or heaven." It is hard to know how to deal with a gentleman in this state of mind; but it ought not to be forgotten that General Logan is following the example of cooler men. Mr. Boutwell and General Butler have made no scruple during the past year about throwing out the most monstrous insinuations against the President, for which they have never offered a particle of proof, and for which they have never shown the least sign of shame or repentance.

Mr. Boutwell, by the way, we learn from the correspondent of the New York Times, is "the cold and classical Demosthenes of the House." We have now got amongst the impeachment managers "the Great Commoner," the "Cold and Classical Demosthenes of the House," and the "Apostle John of Salvation by Impeachment." We shall doubtless have names for the others in a few days. We hope something handsome will be done for Messrs. Wilson and Bingham by the correspondents in the next distribution.

The French Press bill progresses slowly. It is contested at every stage by the opposition, but with no success; but it is evident that the ministers are not nearly so fierce in favor of stringency as the partisans of the Empire, or rather its creatures, who form the majority of both Chambers. The great contest of late has been over the right of the press to "analyze" or comment on the debates, which is stoutly refused. But it is admitted, nevertheless, even by so cool an observer as M. Forçade, that the bill is a step in advance, and that under it the liberty of the press is unquestionably increased. A bill has now been introduced regulating the right of meeting. Under the law, as it stands at present, the assembling of twenty persons or more, for purposes of discussion, without the authorization of the police, is illegal, and renders all concerned liable to arrest and imprisonment. The operation of this law was illustrated in a curious way in the evidence before a Commission appointed in 1866, and of which M. Rouher was president, to enquire into the workings of co-operative associations. It was declared by some of the leading friends of the movement that the law prohibiting meetings acted as a great hindrance to it. True, the authorization to meet was never refused, but men hated to ask for it, or undergo the questioning which sometimes preceded the concession, and consequently the difficulties in the way of the formation of large societies, in which frequent meetings would be necessary, were greatly increased. There is little other news of importance from France, but the continued increase of the bullion in the bank, and the continued falling off in the discounts, show that confidence is not returning or business improving.

In Italy there is no change in the situation; but there are signs of returning good feeling between Italy and France. The French Government is gradually showing signs of being ashamed of its late outburst of zeal on behalf of the papacy, and is beginning once more the old work of urging reforms on the Roman Government. But it might as well talk to a millstone. The Pope is so elated by his victory at Mentana that he heeds nobody, and feels grateful to nobody, evidently believing that the overthrow of the Garibaldians was due to divine interposition. A striking illustration of the depth of his infatuation is afforded by the fact that he is allowing Rome to be made a focus of Bourbonist conspiracy and intrigue, the object being the attempt at revolution in Southern Italy, of which we spoke last week. In order, if possible, to mark still more strongly his leaning towards legitimacy, he has presented the "Golden Rose" to Queen Isabella of Spain. The "Golden Rose" is a cluster of roses growing on one stem, of pure gold, and of exquisite workmanship, containing a small receptacle amongst its petals into which the Pope, every time he blesses it, drops a little amber and musk. It is presented by him for life to the Catholic sovereign who has done most to merit his esteem, "as the pledge of the paternal affection of the pontiff who sends it; the emblem of the faith, justice, and charity of the sovereign who receives it; and the happy foretoken of the protection of God, who hallows it."

The only question agitated strongly in Italy is the financial question, and the financial condition of Italy is so like that of this country that it is somewhat interesting to watch the workings of public opinion on this subject there and compare them with what may be witnessed here. For instance, some of the newspapers have, in the interest of stock-jobbers, tried to spread a report that it was the intention of the Government to tax the Government coupons—just what some of our Western financiers propose to do with ours. But to this the Minister of Finance replies that nothing of the kind shall be done so long as he is in office, at least without exempting the foreign bondholders; thus drawing a distinction which must present itself to every high-minded man, but which doubtless must seem ridiculous to the Pennsylvania State Treasurer, between those who lend money to a nation without belonging to it, and those who lend it money because its interests are their own. The general belief amongst our repudiators is the old barbarian one—that the stranger has no rights, and that even if plundering him be a sin, it is only a venial one. A doubt has also been raised in Italy as to whether the foreign bondholders should receive their interest in depreciated Italian paper or in gold. The Pennsylvania State Treasurer will be astonished to hear that the question was discussed in the Italian Parliament, and that the leading men said that the mere discussion of such a point was a disgrace to the country, and the members left the chamber in great numbers, so that there was no quorum. The poor Italians have thus lost an opportunity of playing off a nice trick on the rascally foreign bondholders who were such fools as to lend them money for mere gain.

Greece must be an exciting place for politicians; since October, 1863, there have been sixteen different cabinets and ninety changes of individual members of the various ministries—a fact worth pondering by those who think a fixed executive has no value.

Articles on any of the subjects usually discussed in this journal will be received from any quarter. If used, they will be liberally paid for; if rejected, they will be returned to the writers on the receipt of the requisite amount of postage stamps.

All Communications which pertain to the literary management of THE NATION should be addressed to the Editor.

THE SITUATION SINCE THE NEW HAMPSHIRE ELECTION.

THERE has been the usual amount of discussion during the week as to the meaning of the New Hampshire election, and of course it has been possible to extract from it whatever suited the case of each enquirer. It has been made to mean simply an endorsement of Grant—simply approval of the impeachment—simply approval of the new mode of bringing in Alabama and approval of Congressional reconstruction generally—simply hatred of the Democratic party, and fidelity to the black man, faith in universal suffrage, and so on. In fact, there is no limit to the number of constructions which may be put upon it, and probably there is no construction likely to be put upon it which will not meet the case at least of a certain number of the voters. When 35,000 men go to the polls and vote in one way, they do it, like the same number of men joining in any other act, from various motives. We confess we are not competent to say what motive had in this particular case most force. But it is enough for all practical purposes to know, as we may say we do know for certain, that the result of the election indicates that the Republican party, in spite of its shortcomings, still enjoys the confidence of the public in a greater degree than any other party; that the public is satisfied with its course both on reconstruction and impeachment, and is ready to sustain it on both points to the last extremity, and is not disposed to admit the South to the Union on any other terms than those which are now offered to it; and that the tendency towards Grant as the Republican nominee for the Presidency inspires confidence and satisfaction. Of course, people may differ as to the degree of devotion to the party which the election betokens; but that it betokens the above in a greater or less degree, nobody will deny. In other words, the subjects distinctly before the electors were Grant, impeachment, reconstruction as it stands, and the general character of the Republican party as compared with that of its opponents; and on all these points the verdict has been favorable, highly favorable—much more so, in fact, than sanguine men ventured to hope; and it is the verdict of a jury of more than average intelligence, and taken after a discussion of more than usual thoroughness and correctness.

It is all the more valuable because it will, we sincerely trust, put an end to the nervousness by which the party leaders have of late been so much afflicted, and by which the country at large has been so sorely tried. We have always felt, and have over and over asserted, that the Reconstruction bill and all necessary amendments formed a very good measure, with which the country was abundantly satisfied, and which it would faithfully support Congress in carrying out; that, therefore, all that Congress had to do was to keep quiet and go on with its work. There never has been any need of the pills and nostrums—such as the bills creating dictatorship and rearranging the Supreme Court—to which during the past six months we have been treated so often, and which have done so much to bring discredit on the party. We think, too, that for the same reason we might have been spared a considerable number of the steps in the quarrel with Mr. Johnson. Congress might with perfect safety and with great saving of dignity have let him rave and rant, without moving, till he committed an overt act, and then have pounced upon him as it is now doing. It has had to do this in the end, but then it has on its tables the report of the "original impeachers"—a laughing-stock for most intelligent men and a disgrace to the country.

The reconstruction policy of Congress is not a thing which has been rushed into hastily. It was approached by slow degrees, and maturely weighed; and although the acts in which it has been embodied were drawn with needless haste, the plan as a whole is unassailable, or assailable only by those who have nothing to offer in its place except Andrew Johnson's dictatorship, and their attacks are, and always have been, quite harmless. Moreover, we do not think there has been any general impatience about the prolongation of military government at the South. The country was quite prepared to have it protracted till after the next Presidential election, at least; and few men who have given any attention to the condition of the South, and have not been deluded into the belief that there is something magical in disfranchisement and impartial suffrage, think it at all wise to withdraw the troops before that time. So that the production of "new bills" every week, and the great eagerness which has been of late displayed to get Alabama into the Union, have been quite unnecessary. It has long seemed so to calm lookers-on; it may now be considered proved. We may say the same thing of the attacks on the Supreme Court, and the attempts to convert it into the tool or creature of the majority for the time being. The only defence of them ever offered was that the emergency was a desperate one—that the country must somehow be appeased or hoodwinked. So it was gravely maintained, that although a decision against Congress would crush Congress, yet if Congress only altered and rearranged the Court a little, so as to prepare the decisions in certain cases, the public would be thoroughly imposed on, and the utterances of the puppets on the bench be received as those of independent judges.

One other thing has been proved to be unnecessary—and this, in many respects, the most important of all—we mean the countenance given by the Republican leaders to the attacks on the public credit. The question of cheating the public creditors by any device whatsoever was not brought before the New Hampshire electors; it has not been raised by the Republican party as a party; and yet in so far as the New Hampshire election indicates anything at all, it indicates that nothing of this kind is needed, at least, to secure for Congress the support of the people, and that those who have been engaged in it have the melancholy satisfaction of perceiving that they have been doing some very dirty work, for which there was no sort of occasion. We have not the slightest doubt that if, when the party at the West began to catch the repudiation fever from the Democrats, the principal men of the party in Congress and elsewhere had made a manly and determined stand for honesty, and had laid the matter before the people in its true light—showed the inexpediency of it, as well as the immorality of it; and pointed out, as it was so easy to do, the real lightness and evanescence of the burdens to escape which they were proposing to disgrace themselves—the disease would never have made any progress. Western men are not mad bulls any more than natural-born knaves. They listen to reason; they modify their opinions under discussion; and although the sense of corporate honor may not be so strong amongst them as it is at the East, they are not by any means devoid of it. If, therefore, when the first talk of repudiation was heard amongst them, Republican politicians had faced it boldly instead of running about finding excuses for it and preparing bills to give it legal expression, the party, as well as themselves, would be in a better position than it is to-day. The party has nothing to recommend it to any human being if it shows any lack of principle. It is its devotion to principle, or its indifference to material gain or temporary comfort, which has won it all its fame and given it all the claim it has to public confidence. As soon as it shows unmistakable signs of being merely a machine by which cowards and knaves get their base passions converted into laws, it will perish with the hearty execrations of all good men.

We trust, therefore, the New Hampshire election will revive the confidence of the men at Washington in the popular honesty, and put some check on the tendency so common amongst politicians to feel that they are in constant danger of underestimating the general rascality. How to keep just below what he conceives to be the average standard of morality is the only problem which seriously engages the attention of many a man laying serious claims to be considered a "statesman."

The election, encouraging as it is, too, increases instead of diminishing the responsibility of the party in power. The more power there is given it to wield, the more necessity is there for care in wielding it—which brings us naturally into the presence of the Honorable Benjamin Wade. The chances are, we suppose, forty to one that Mr. Johnson will be "hurled from the chair he has disgraced," to use the awful language of the "original impeachers," and that Mr. Wade will take his place. Mr. Wade was chosen to take his place at a time when Congress was still very timid and doubtful about its capacity of maintaining itself against the President, and when there was a vague and, in view of his language and demeanor, not unnatural fear that if he was fully roused he might do something dreadful—no one knew exactly what. It was feared that if impeached he might even resist, and it was felt that in such an emergency the presiding officer of the Senate should be a man of nerve, and should possess some, at least, of the qualities which were supposed to make Mr. Johnson formidable. This, and possibly some little personal jealousy amongst the dii majores of the Senate, led to the selection of Mr. Wade for the chair—that is, of one of the few men in the body who are peculiarly unfitted for the ordinary duties of a presiding officer. Moreover, although the contingency of his succeeding to the Presidency in case of Mr. Johnson's deposition was clearly foreseen, it seems to have been supposed that his term would be a stormy one, filled with broils and contentions. The possibility of his entering on it after a peaceful trial, and having to deal with complicated questions of finance and international law instead of conveying Andrew Johnson and his adherents to the lock-up, and defending the White House staircase against Adjutant-General Thomas, does not seem to have occurred to them. The near approach of his accession, and the great difference between the actual circumstances and those which were anticipated, of course every day renders his unsuitableness for the place more striking; and we believe we are right in saying that a good many senators would be very glad if Mr. Wade had some other sphere of usefulness than that which now awaits him marked out for him. There is, however, now no help for it. He is there, and must be made the best of. What kind of thing his best will be is an interesting question for the public.

Should he reach the office, he will be the fourth man of his kind who has filled it. Jackson was the first, and although he enjoys, and is entitled to, some credit for his manner of dealing with nullification, he debauched the public service, and thus inflicted on the country the disease which, at this moment, places the Government in greater peril than secession has ever done, and he set an example of high-handed contempt for the legislature which has probably not been without effect on Mr. Johnson. Mr. Lincoln was the second, and he was so clearly an exception to all rules, that we can no more deduce from his career any conclusion favorable to the claims of men of his training and experience to high offices of government, than we can deduce from Napoleon's a conclusion favorable to the military talents of natives of Corsica. Of Mr. Johnson we shall say nothing—or only this: that we could, with a very small amount of trouble, produce evidence that a good many people who were most delighted three years ago with his early ignorance and his want of social experience, have since acknowledged that it is not a good preparation for the highest place in the government of a great country to pass the flower of one's years in the practice of one of the rudest and simplest of the manual arts, and in the company of the most illiterate and coarsest portion of the community. What is more to the purpose, we could easily show that amongst them are some of the most ardent admirers of Mr. Benjamin Wade. Some of the doctrines which have been preached of late years about the value of "self-made men" are, in fact, if there be anything in them whatever, hostile to civilization itself—for they would prove that no generation needs the experience of the generations that have gone before it, and that colleges and libraries and the higher education are simply rich men's luxuries.

We have no desire to prejudge Mr. Wade, but we have a right, in view of what the country has just gone through, to say that the presumption is entirely against his fitness for the place for which the Senate so strangely selected him. He has a large number of Mr. Johnson's faults of temper; his education is not much if any better. He owes all his political distinction to his fidelity and courage in the anti-slavery struggle, and that struggle is probably the only subject which he fairly understands. He is lamentably ignorant with regard to the various economical questions by which the country is beset, and, if he has any opinions on finance at all, they are probably not very favorable to the maintenance of the national credit. In his selection of his cabinet, he is likely to prefer zeal—of which we have already as much as the country can stand—to discretion and knowledge, which the country is dying for want of. What is worse, he will probably, with that blind reverence for party traditions and practices for which men of his stamp are generally remarkable, feel that his first duty in office is to use the Federal patronage to help the Republican party at the Presidential election—which is simply another way of saying that he will do what he can to increase the corruption and debauchery, waste of the public money, and degradation of Government officials, which have made the civil service as great a disgrace as ever befell a Christian country. For the like of it, we have to search the chronicles of the worst European monarchies in the eighteenth century. This is the course which experience and principles of human nature fairly warrant us in expecting him to follow, and those who have put him in his present position have no right to expect that he will not follow it—but then he may disappoint everybody, ourselves included. The scenes in which he is now so prominent an actor, and the trials which he is doubtless receiving, may put him on his guard and thus make him harmless. His integrity and loyalty nobody doubts, and nobody questions his personal claims to esteem; but the world, alas! has not yet been committed to the government of the good-hearted.

WEST AND EAST—DEBTOR AND CREDITOR.

Whatever qualities ex-Governor Seymour may be thought deficient in, no one has ever denied his great ability as a sayer of things well suited to his audience. No one could listen to his address before the Democratic State Convention last Wednesday night, without observing the striking harmony between the speaker and his hearers. No one could carefully follow his argument without becoming convinced that the Democratic mind is completely unsettled on all the great questions of finance, since the speaker, while indignantly exposing all the weak points of Republican policy and Republican rule, most adroitly avoided expressing a single decided opinion of his own on any one of the many vital questions at issue. As far as we can understand the Governor's non-committal utterances, he is in favor of paying the bondholders in paper, but at the same time of "battling to make that paper as good as gold." He evidently wishes to see the bonds paid in gold; but he is evidently uncertain how far the open avowal of that wish would prove acceptable to his hearers. He urges, justly and forcibly, that only a small part of the bonds are held by "the class of men called capitalists, for whom he has little respect, since they have never risen up to a sense of the truth that wealth and power carry with them duties and responsibilities;" but he is not ashamed to plead the foolish plea of the demagogue, "that the bondholder is paid in coin, while honest labor gets a debased paper money." He exposes the unequal distribution of the national banking facilities among the different States, and charges the East with grasping an unfair share of "the spoils of victory"—meaning the national bank currency. With dithyrambic force and truly eloquent concentration, he gives in a few words a most striking statement of one of our greatest financial difficulties, saying: "We were once divided into free States and slave States, and the antagonism filled our land with bloodshed and mourning. Now, the public bonds are mainly held in one corner of our country, and we are divided into debtor States and creditor States. What will be the end of this?" These few words are the key-note of the entire Western chorus of repudiation. The bonds are owned at the East, the banking facilities are owned at the East, the West is taxed to pay the interest on the bonds, and has to pay interest on the currency besides; everything is paid by the West, everything is received by the East; the East is the usurious money-lender who reaps the profit of all Western toil. This is the burden of the Western complaint. As a serious utterance of a thinking man like Governor Seymour, these words, though eloquent, are not deserving of attention; but, as a happy embodiment of the angry thoughts of a large and influential portion of our countrymen, they may fairly be considered the most striking words spoken in public for many a long day. How much of truth do they contain?

No belief is more thoroughly diffused, thanks to our modern hankering after popularizing knowledge, than the belief that increased facilities for communication among different countries or different parts of a country increase our knowledge of those countries, or that increased facilities for intercourse among peoples destroy national differences and make different peoples more alike. But this has to be taken with some qualification. We are in hourly contact with every Western hamlet; but what is it we learn from there? Look at the daily papers: murders, fires, explosions, ice-gorges, railroad accidents, the movements of great men, and the utterances of political conventions, prize-fights, pedestrianism and market reports—columns of all these; but of the private opinions and thoughts of the great masses of men we find nothing. Yet these latter are what concern us most, especially just now, and it will not do to remain ignorant of them, or to disregard them, and to allow men like Governor Seymour to magnify the present differences of opinion between East and West into an antagonism like that between North and South, "which filled the land with bloodshed and mourning."

As if by preconcerted action, but in reality only in obedience to the same impulse, the whole press and people of the East are making light of the so-called erratic tendencies of the West towards inflation and repudiation. The East carries on the correspondence with Europe, the East has sold to Europe the bonds held by European investors, the East is the great market for the bonds held by domestic investors, and thus the East is peculiarly bound up with the national credit, and has, naturally enough, assumed the duty of defending it. But the worst way in the world to set about defeating an able antagonist is to depreciate or to ignore him; and this is precisely what the East is evidently trying to do. We are told, over and over again, that the financial heresies of the West are confined to the ignorant and the lawless, that they have been adopted by party leaders as mere political campaigning weapons, and that, after the November election, no more will be heard of them. There never was a greater mistake. Our private and business advices are unanimously to the effect that these mischievous opinions are held far and wide by all classes of men; that the party leaders are not proclaiming repudiation because they seek to gain the election, but are seeking to gain the election in order to proclaim repudiation; and that the silly half-way talk of leaders like Pendleton is due to their only half comprehending what the masses have already fully decided upon. From extensive enquiry we have come to the conviction that this is no exaggerated statement of the case. To shut our eyes to such things is mere folly. Let us rather thank Governor Seymour for having put the case so clearly before us: "We were once divided into free and slave States, and the antagonism filled our land with bloodshed and mourning. Now, the public bonds are mainly held in one corner of our country, and we are divided into debtor and creditor States." Let us admit the fact which no one attempts to deny, that the West is indebted to the East; but let us also examine how far this relative position is natural and unavoidable—let us see whether it need necessarily produce antagonism—whether all arguments in favor of repudiation based upon it are not utterly erroneous and fallacious.

There is no kind of labor which yields the laborer so direct a return as the labor bestowed upon the tilling of the earth. Agriculture, indeed, is the most direct production by the laborer himself of that which he most absolutely needs—food. All other labor, of whatsoever kind, produces food only indirectly—that is, by producing some article which can be exchanged for food. But a well-arranged farm can be made to produce almost every essential article of food, and even the most essential articles of clothing. Food and clothing are for all classes of men, but especially for all laboring men, the two prime sources of expense; and of the two, food, the most important and most costly, is almost entirely produced by the farmer himself as the result of his own labor. For this reason there is no occupation which can be carried on so readily by the laborer himself for his own account as farming. Nowhere in the world are good, healthy, productive, accessible, and easily cultivated farming lands so abundant and so cheap as at the West. Nowhere, consequently, can farming be so readily commenced and so successfully continued with a very moderate capital. Nothing is more universally admitted or more thoroughly appreciated, in many of the most important parts of the civilized globe, than the fact, that in the western portion of the United States a healthy, industrious, and economical laboring man of twenty can earn and save enough from the wages of his labor, before he is twenty-five, to purchase and cultivate a farm of sufficient acreage to give occupation and support to himself and family during the rest of their lives. This is the essential characteristic of the West—the basis of the entire Western development in whatsoever direction. Now what are the prominent results of this main factor of national existence? The ease with which the laboring man becomes independent of his employer is constantly drafting away a large portion of the individuals working for wages, who are only inadequately replaced by our steady stream of foreign immigration, although the latter far exceeds in magnitude, as it excels in beneficence, the exaggerated and half-fabled invasions of Eastern nations. Hence the demand for men to work for wages almost always exceeds the supply, and wages consequently are high. The high price of labor has stimulated the ingenuity of a people upon whom ingenuity has been forced by every step forward in their national existence, until that ingenuity has culminated in the production of an extraordinary variety of labor-saving machines, that supplement and multiply the busy hands of every Western farmer. The young laboring man, with his few hundreds of dollars, just developed into an independent farmer, soon finds the greatest obstacle to his success and further progress in the very circumstance that first helped him to his present position, namely—the scarcity and high price of labor. If he could only hire a few extra hands at ploughing time or during harvesting, the sun and the rich soil of his own prairie acres would double his crop of corn or treble his yield of wheat. The labor is not to be procured, but the patent ploughs and harrows, the sowing-machines, the mowers, reapers, and threshers can be had, if only the young farmer has the money. Nowhere will a few hundred additional dollars yield so liberal a return as on a new farm one or two years old. It is very evident, therefore, that young farmers, and out West all men are young, are not in the habit of keeping their money idle. Every dollar made from last year's crop is immediately invested in additional yokes of oxen, or improved harrows, or ploughs, or a reaping machine, or may be in clearing and fencing additional acres, which next year will require further oxen and ploughs and other labor-savers. The return which every fresh dollar invested yields to the intelligent farmer is so great, that he not only steadily and eagerly invests every dollar of his own earnings, but he will even borrow from others what he can, at high rates of interest, to invest with his own. He does not borrow because he is obliged to, he does not borrow because he is poor, he does not borrow as a needy man borrows to supply pressing wants; he borrows because it is immensely profitable to him to borrow; he borrows because every additional hundred invested on his farm yields him rich returns, by laying fresh acres of mother earth open to the sun and rain, who labor gratuitously for all of us, but labor for the farmer more than for other men. Need we explain further why money is worth twelve per cent. out West, or why the whole West is in debt? Is it possible to show more strongly the absurdity of making the indebtedness of the West the cause of complaint against the East, or to charge the East with being responsible for Western indebtedness?

How is it that the East is always especially pointed out as the creditor of the West, or better still, admitting the whole charge in all its gravity, how comes it that the East has money to lend to the West?

The soil of the East is generally poor, thousands upon thousands of acres so covered with stones as scarce to allow a glimpse of the soil. The climate is unsuited to profitable agriculture, but in exchange makes, by its sudden and violent fluctuations, the utmost demands upon human ingenuity to provide against its evil effects. The people of the East have consequently become ingenious, inventive, and mechanical. The poverty of New England soil and the variability of New England climate have made New Englanders the most ingenious mechanics since Tyre and Syracuse. This is the essential characteristic of the East in all its development in whatsoever direction, and its most striking result in its influence on social progress is the following:

Success in manufacturing depends, next to general ingenuity in its devices, mainly upon the extent to which the process of division of labor can be carried on. Division of labor means the concentration of each laborer's efforts upon the most perfect production of any one given part of the desired whole. Division of labor in manufacturing is attainable in any degree of perfection only in large establishments. Large establishments, likewise, can alone render the employment of powerful and complicated machinery profitable; and for these two reasons the tendency of all manufactures is to concentrate themselves in large establishments, requiring for their erection and maintenance large capital and great powers of organization and administration.

The average Eastern laboring man, no matter how healthy, how industrious, how economical, cannot expect under ordinary circumstances to develop the ability to manage, or to acquire the means to own, a large manufacturing establishment. There is no manufacturing business, no foundry, machine-shop, or ship-yard, no wholesale trade, scarcely any important retail trade, in which an industrious, intelligent, economical workman can expect to earn and save enough in his early years to enable him in manhood to undertake a similar business on his own account. What change in this respect may yet be accomplished by co-operation lies hidden in the future, but for the present it is probably safe to say that more than nine-tenths of the working-men of the cities and towns of the East must, in the nature of things, continue to work for other men, that is, to be employed at wages by wealthier men than themselves, during by far the greater portion of their lives. The high price of labor at the West has a tendency to sustain similarly high rates of wages at the East. Eastern workmen are not less industrious, less economical than their Western brothers, and they yearly save large amounts out of their earnings from wages. We have seen what opportunities the West offers to the laboring man for the employment of his savings, making him independent of his former employer and changing him into an owner of land, which he farms on his own account. The East, for the reasons above given, offers no similar opportunity, and the laboring man can do no better than place his surplus earnings in the savings-bank. Herein lies the sum total of the antagonism between the East and West.

To make our argument as pointed as possible we have confined our illustrations to the farm laborer at the West and the factory laborer at the East. These two are indeed the representative men of the two sections. There are, of course, many men following other pursuits besides farming at the West, and as many at the East who labor elsewhere besides in factories. But the same laws apply to all. No matter what a man's business at the West, it is comparatively easy for him to become independent on a very small capital of his own, and it immediately becomes profitable for him not only to use every dollar of additional capital that he accumulates, but every dollar that he can borrow. Thus, at the West, almost all men employ every dollar of their own capital, and not only have nothing to lend to their neighbors, but are borrowers themselves. No matter what a man's business at the East, it is comparatively difficult for him to become independent on his savings. He has no opportunity to invest his savings in a business of his own; he consequently has money to lend, and, instead of becoming a borrower in time, each year adds to his ability as a lender.

As Governor Seymour well says, it is a mistake to suppose that the United States bonds are mostly held by capitalists. By far the larger amount is held as an investment of the savings of the hundreds of thousands who have no opportunity of investing their savings in a business of their own. And not only are the United States bonds so held as an investment of small savings, but a large portion of the State bonds, and railroad bonds, and of the stocks of banks, and of life and fire insurance companies, and of corporations of every other kind throughout the country, is similarly held. When the war broke out and the Government needed money, who could lend it? Surely not the West, where every man was a borrower. If the money which the Government raised by loans had been raised by taxes instead, compelling each State to bear its quota, or if the States had been called upon to take their proper share of the loans, thousands, perhaps hundreds of thousands, of farmers out West would have had to sell or mortgage their farms in order to pay their share. But the loans were offered in the open market; the West needed all its savings to improve its farms and make a large percentage on its capital; the East, which did not need its savings as much, lent them to the Government—from selfish motives, if you please, but certainly not to the injury of the West; on the contrary, much to its advantage. The case was precisely similar with regard to the national banking capital. When the applications first began to be received by the Treasury the opportunity was open to all; but the West was making too good an interest on its capital by raising corn and wheat to be tempted by the probable profits of the banking business; again the East, less fortunate than the West in its opportunities for employing its surplus, had the means to spare and invested them largely in the national banks, somewhat, as it now appears, to the injury of the West, but certainly not through any fault of Eastern investors. But not only is the capital of the Government bonds, and of the State bonds, and of the national banks furnished by the savings of the East, but almost every dollar of credit given to Western merchants is in some way or other similarly derived.

THE PROPOSED CONSTITUTION OF NEW YORK.

The work which the Convention has done and submitted to the people for approval not only should be, but will be, examined and disposed of on its merits. Neither political party will make the adoption of the new constitution a special measure of party policy. Since the irresistible logic of events has convinced the Republicans that the question of negro-suffrage must be separately decided, their zeal in the whole proceeding has wonderfully abated; and the Democrats were always inclined to oppose any measures that were not entirely under their own control. We do not regret this condition of affairs. An organic law which simply reflected the views of one political party, which endeavored to perpetuate its power, and which was adopted by the votes of its own members alone, would be a curse to the State. A constitution should establish the government, define its powers in general, place the special limitations which experience has shown to be necessary, and do no more. The moment it proceeds to invade the province of the legislature, it opposes itself to the essential ideas of a representative republican government, and tacitly adopts the principles of Cæsarism. Cæsarism acknowledges the people as the source of all power, but permits them to speak once alone, and then bids them for ever to keep silence. The thought which lies at the bottom of the New York Constitution is—a distrust of the people in the ordinary management of their political concerns through the legislators and executive officers whom they clothe with authority. While a show of confidence is kept up by making almost every office elective, the legislation of the State in respect to a large number of subjects involving mere questions of policy or expediency is withdrawn from the representative law-makers, and is made practically unalterable for twenty years. This is a fault which affects all the State constitutions; but none, probably, so injuriously as our own. The inevitable result is—a result inevitable upon any a priori theory, and confirmed by all experience—absolute destruction of official responsibility, and the establishment of the bureaucratic system, the most inefficient and hateful of all kinds of government.

Prior to the assembling of the late convention there seemed to have been a very general feeling among the thoughtful men of all parties that the constitution should be entirely reformed. The theories which Michael Hoffman and his followers had introduced in 1846 had certainly produced no good results. The Legislature had become debased, intellectually and morally. The Governor had been made a mere figure-head, and not ornamental at that. The admistration of justice had necessarily become a practical denial of justice. The convention itself contained many of the ablest and best men of both parties. It is a most remarkable fact that these men, whatever differences of opinion they might have upon matters of detail, were virtually unanimous in the desire to re-shape the whole organic law, and to establish a strong government, with direct personal responsibility to the people. To this end they labored in the committees and on the floor of the convention; but all their endeavors were met by the dead resistance of the mass of members who represented county interests, and whose ideas could not rise above the politics of the county in which their little personal influence lay. Committee after committee reported, proposing sweeping changes; their reports were supported by a weight of argument absolutely overwhelming; but the voting was all one way. The result is a constitution differing so little from that of 1846 that the convention was a clear waste of time and money.

The following are some of the most important alterations and additions: The proviso in respect to negro voters is stricken out, but may be inserted by the people at the election. The term of office of senators is made four years, and one-half are to be chosen every two years. The Assembly is increased from one hundred and twenty-eight to one hundred and thirty-nine, and the members are to be elected by counties and not by single districts. The Legislature is forbidden to audit or to allow any private claim against the State. A Court of Claims is established, consisting of three judges, to be appointed by the Governor. The Canal Board and the Contracting Board and the offices of Canal Commissioner and Canal Appraiser are abolished. A Superintendent of Public Works is created, to be appointed by the Governor and Senate. The powers of Supervisors of Counties are defined and somewhat enlarged. The powers of Mayors of cities are defined. The changes in the judical department are greater. The Court of Appeals is to consist of a chief-justice and six associates, to be elected and to hold office for fourteen years. A commission of five extra judges is created to sit for three years, and to dispose of causes pending in the present Court of Appeals. The Supreme Court and the Superior Court of New York city are left as now. The Court of Common Pleas of New York city is increased to six judges. The term of office of the justices of all these courts is to be fourteen years. The Legislature are to organize in the Supreme Court four general terms, consisting of one chief and three others to be chosen from all the judges of the court. A general term shall be held in each district. No judge sitting in a general term or in the Court of Appeals shall review a decision made by himself.

It is impossible within the limits of a single article even to glance at these several provisions. We shall, therefore, confine ourselves to the judicial system offered to the people of New York for their adoption. Is it an improvement upon the present one? We answer, No; and make this answer, convinced that the existing judiciary has utterly failed, must utterly fail, and should be completely swept away. At bottom lies the evil of elected judges. We do not intend to discuss the general theory of electing judicial magistrates. We shall simply refer to a few facts. The ability of the convention was arrayed on the side of a judiciary appointed by the Governor. Difference of party did not divide such men as Mr. Evarts and Judge Daly on this question. Their arguments were not answered simply because they could not be answered. But their endeavors produced no effect; the local interests of country politicians were too powerful. The elective judiciary has been in existence in New York for little more than twenty years. What is the result? If the theory of its advocates be correct, the judges during that time should have steadily improved. We will not insist upon such a test; but we have a right to demand that the system should at least have held its own. Here is a fact which should outweigh the most perfect theory. No one whose acquintance and observation extend over the State will deny that the judges of the higher courts have, as a rule, deteriorated in ability, in all those intellectual qualities which go to make an efficient officer. We do not now allude to moral qualities, nor do we wish to point our assertion by examples. It is enough to say that, as a whole, the Bench of 1868 is confessedly inferior to that of 1848. To this statement we challenge contradiction. It is true that there are individual exceptions, and that the falling off is more marked in some portions of the State than in others, and that it is notably so in New York city. Every intelligent lawyer knows that the reported judgments of our tribunals of all grades no longer have the authority throughout the country which once belonged to them. Even the Western courts are inclined to sneer at a modern New York decision. Certainly there is some terrible defect in our method of choosing judges. What shall be thought of a system which makes it possible that, when a judge of an inferior court has made a decision, in a matter attracting great public attention, directly in favor of a large class of persons, everybody should at once say he will be the candidate of that class for a position in a higher tribunal. The correctness of the decision is not now impugned. But a judgment in favor of the liquor interest made Judge Cardozo the inevitable candidate for a place on the Supreme Bench, and it is the possibility of such results which stamps the whole system as radically vicious. There is, however, yet a lower deep. What shall be thought of a system which makes it possible for the brokers of Wall Street to assert that a judge of the highest court in the city is leagued with a combination of stock speculators, and is using his official powers to promote their interests; for the daily newspapers to repeat the accusation and thus spread it over the country; and, finally, for a distinguished counsel to fling it in the face of the magistrate himself as he presides in his own court? It need not be that these charges are true; it is enough that they can be made. It is an evil of sufficient magnitude when the tribunals have so degenerated in learning and ability that business men are afraid to submit their controversies to a legal determination. When imputations upon the integrity of judges can be made, public safety demands an immediate reconstruction of the courts.

The bad results of an elective judiciary were aggravated by an organization of the courts which seemed as though designed for the express purpose of producing the greatest amount of confusion and uncertainty. The new constitution provides no adequate remedy. The extension of the term of office to fourteen years cannot mitigate the evils of the elective system. We may state a paradox, but we are convinced that all increase in the length of the official term will only add to the dangers; and that if judges are to be elected at all they should be chosen every year. A long official term cannot throw any obstacle in the way of placing a bad or an inefficient man on the bench; on the contrary, the inducement will only be the stronger for such persons to reach the secure and comfortable seat. The reorganization of the Court of Appeals by making its members permanent, is undoubtedly a step in the right direction; but the provision for four ambulatory general terms in the Supreme Court, made up of judges selected from the whole thirty-three, would seem to make chaos what was before only confusion. The only true principle of the present system is rejected—that of making the appellate judges also the nisi prius judges. The English courts are organized upon this plan; the old constitution of New York constructed its Supreme Court in the same form; the constitution of 1846 returned to this method; and now the jealousy of the country lawyers, who formed so large a portion of the convention, has caused them to reject all the lessons of experience, and to make the courts of review practically permanent.

We see no reason then why the proposed judicial system should be adopted. It would be better to endure the present one for a few years longer, until the people became so thoroughly disgusted with its inefficiency that they would sweep it away and establish another in accordance with a correct theory and with the teachings of history, with judges appointed and holding office during good behavior, and courts so organized that the business could be done without ruinous delay. This has been accomplished in England, and may be in New York.

THE OBJECT OF POLITICAL CRITICISM.

We publish elsewhere a letter from a valued correspondent, suggesting to us that we criticise the Republican party a little too much, and do not sufficiently call attention to the low moral condition of the Democratic party. This affords us an opportunity which we have long desired, of pointing out what we conceive to be a very widespread misconception of the kind of work that a newspaper which sets up to be independent undertakes to do. The division of newspapers into partisan and not-partisan is, if not perfectly correct, at all events correct enough for practical purposes; and by partisan papers people usually mean papers which stand by their party through thick and thin, defend all its measures, make much of its victories, little of its defeats, and paint its opponents in colors as black as a decent attention to probability will allow. The non-partisan paper, on the other hand, is supposed to be a paper which does not adhere to any party in particular, and is not guided in its criticisms of measures by a regard to the persons who proposed them. The public has, in general, a proper respect for this last-named species of journal as soon as it is convinced that the article is genuine, but then it takes a good deal of both time and trouble to convince it of this in any particular case. The popular presumption is always against the sincerity of any paper which lays claim to independence in the formation of political judgments, and nothing but lengthened observation of it is, in general, sufficient to convince people that its apparent want of loyalty, which all independence involves, is not either the sign or result of great baseness or great weakness. But even after they have conceded that a journal is independent, they insist still that if it be not devoted to any party in particular, it shall at least treat all parties alike, if not in the bestowal of its praise, at least in the bestowal of its censure. For instance they will allow it to denounce the Republicans if it will denounce the Democrats at least as often and at as great length. It may speak irreverently of Horace Greeley if the next time it speaks irreverently of a prominent editor it selects James Brooks. It may comment on the shortcomings of Mr. Stevens, if it at the same time, or as soon after as convenient, takes an opportunity of saying something unhandsome about Senator Doolittle. It may oppose the proneness of the Republicans to sumptuary or repressive legislation if it, on an early day thereafter, calls attention to the Democratic indulgence for tippling and fornication. This is the popular idea of the fairness which ought to accompany independence, and without which independence is not genuine. That it is, however, a mistaken idea both of the nature of independence and of the relations of independent journals to the two great political parties, we think not difficult to show.

There has been so much mysterious matter written about "criticism," and "schools of criticism," and "canons of criticism," and the "critic's function" and his "office" and its value, and criticism has been so often written with a large C, that the simpler portion of the community has almost ceased to think of it as a thing comprehensible to anybody but poets or metaphysicians, and have come to look on the critic as a person who pretends to be wiser than his fellows, but whose claims to superior wisdom the common run of people are totally unable to dispute. The fact is, however, that criticism is after all only judging, and everybody who forms opinions on any subject necessarily judges either persons or arguments or evidence. In fact, in order not to be a critic, one has to become a brute. About politics, in particular, everybody is a critic, and a newspaper is simply a receptacle for the criticism of several people whose opinions run in the same general direction. Whether the criticism is worth anything, or how much it is worth, depends on a great variety of circumstances. Critics have to be weighed, and not counted like voters, and the proceeding in which aggrieved authors and publishers sometimes indulge, of printing a string of favorable and unfavorable critiques side by side and then asking the public to laugh at them all, is, therefore, a foolish proceeding. Matthew Arnold in one of his recent papers illustrated its folly rather forcibly by the case of the gentleman who, disliking something he had found in the Saturday Review, consoled himself with the reflection that the British Banner was of a contrary opinion.

Unless political criticism is engaged in merely as a mental exercise, its object is to affect legislation by exerting an influence either on the legislature or on the public which elects the legislature. The critic is not a dispenser of rewards and punishments. It is not his business to watch public men, and call attention to their good or bad acts, holding the one up to admiration and the other up to reprobation merely for the promotion of virtue. He is not ex vi termini a superior being. He is simply a man who, having opinions, makes a business of printing them and circulating them amongst those who care to know what they are, and his aim in printing them is to get enough people to agree with him to make them felt in the government of the country. It follows from this that the main business of political journals is to criticise those who are carrying on the government of the country—that is, the party in power. It is the party in power which legislates or refrains from legislating, which commits or omits, which carries out the national will, administers the national finances, makes peace or war. It is, in fact, for the time being, to all intents and purposes, the nation itself. It is of it, and at it, therefore, that it is the main business of a newspaper to talk if it wants to affect public policy, and as the party is generally led or represented by a small number of prominent men, the critic has of course always a great deal to say about these men. The party paper, properly so-called, assumes their impeccability. Every measure they propose is exactly what was wanted to save the country; their speeches are the essence of wisdom, their motives the loftiest and purest. But then there are not many people who believe this, and nobody who makes any profession of criticising ever comes near believing it. Politicians are but men; they may be excellent men, and their aims may be admirable, but they may make mistakes in the choice of means—unless they are inspired—and it is the duty of every citizen who thinks they are making mistakes to say so, if he can get anybody to listen to him voluntarily and comfortably.

We are occasionally asked, for instance, why we so often find fault with Mr. Stevens and Mr. Boutwell and Mr. Sumner, and so on, and we occasionally light upon a paragraph in the columns of some of our radical contemporaries pointing to this tendency of ours as an indication of some great folly or malignity on the part of the Nation. But if the sages who raise points of this kind had ever seriously reflected on their own raison d'être, they would have avoided making an observation which does so little credit to their understanding.

The reason why we have a great deal to say about the Butlers and Boutwells and Stevenses and Sumners is that the Butlers and Boutwells and Stevenses and Sumners have a great deal to say about the government of the country. Till they let the nation alone, no newspaper is justified in letting them alone. As long as they are in fact though not in form charged with the government of the country, take a leading part in originating and passing the most important legislative measures, and are listened to with great reverence by a very large and very respectable portion of the community, it is our business to talk about them and about their sayings and doings within the limits prescribed by respect for personal character, week by week, day by day, and to talk more about them than about anybody else. To devote the same amount of space, or even one-tenth of the same amount, to the discussion of the sayings and doings of ex-Governor Seymour or Mr. Pendleton would be trifling with our readers. Neither these gentlemen nor any other Democrats now possess political power. They have undoubtedly influence, but the occasions on which they exert it are rare. Half-a-dozen speeches in the course of the year represent all their visible efforts in the political field, and, therefore, to comment on them week by week one would have to follow them where no journalist has a right to follow any man as long as he is silent—to the retirement of his home. Much the same thing may be said of the party to which they belong. We have frequently expressed our opinion in these columns of its moral condition and moral aims, of the principles it professes, and the practices in which it indulges; but as long as it is a mere opposition—that is, a mere voice, or growl—constant disquisition on its enormities would be a profitless and repulsive work. One might nearly as well devote one's self to denunciations of abstract evil. Of course, if the Democratic party got into power it would, in our opinion, do great mischief. But it is not in power, and the Republican party is; and the business of the hour, therefore, is not to excite moral indignation against the Democrats, but to get the Republicans to do their duty. There is no latent virtue in any party to make its wrong-doing less hurtful than other people's wrong-doing. If the Republicans were to repudiate, for instance, we might safely defy anybody to detect the smallest difference between their repudiation and that of the Democrats. They have got no divine right to govern wrong. When General Butler sneers at the idea of a national conscience, as he did the other day in the Boston Advertiser, the devil gets at least as much satisfaction out of his sneer as he would out of a similar one from Fernando Wood or John Morrissey. There are people who flatter themselves that being a "friend of the black man" entitles a person to a plenary indulgence on all questions not touching the negro's welfare; but this is a doctrine which is sure to disorder the moral stomach sooner or later, because God has so ordered the universe that neither the negro race nor any other race shall derive permanent benefit from wrong-doing. Lying, cheating, misrepresenting, tricking, making the worse appear the better reason, will not help him in the long run.

What we say of the relations of the press to parties and politicians may be said, mutatis mutandis, of the relations of the press to every man who places himself prominently before the public, and who, in his own name, makes constant proffers to society of opinions for its adoption on all sorts of subjects. When a man conceives it to be his duty to preach constantly, neither he nor his friends have any right to complain if constant attempts are made to dispute his doctrines, expose his fallacies, or hold his weaknesses up to ridicule. It would be very silly, for instance, of Mr. Ruskin or John Stuart Mill or Professor Fawcett or John Bright to complain that the newspapers were always attacking them or criticising them. The newspapers are not always attacking or criticising the men: they are criticising certain influences which, if they conceive them to be good, they are bound to recommend and promote; if they conceive them to be bad, they are bound to combat by every means in their power. There are few men here, outside the field of politics properly so called, who occupy the same kind of position. Wendell Phillips and Horace Greeley present, perhaps, the nearest approach to it. There is hardly a day in which Wendell Phillips is not in some place or other promulgating somewhat peculiar opinions on society and government. There is hardly a periodical one opens in which one does not find a contribution from Horace Greeley on one of a great variety of subjects. Under these circumstances there is something almost comical in the enquiry we sometimes receive, why we so often criticise Wendell Phillips and Horace Greeley; and here, as in many other cases, some of the deeper intellects amongst those who find fault with us account for the strange phenomenon by the hypothesis of profound personal enmity. We shall never have an end of this narrow way of looking at newspaper functions until people give up considering all persons whose aims are good as of equal value to society, and therefore equally entitled to immunity from criticism or fault-finding. The business of a newspaper critic is not with a man's goodness, but with his way of showing it; good men differ infinitely in their way of showing it, and are, therefore, of widely different degrees of value to society. If the best man who ever breathed were to set about improving his kind by the delivery of shallow lectures or writing weak essays or publishing bad poems, it would be the duty of the critic to use all fair means to get the public to stay away from the lectures, not to read the essays or buy the poems. The critic might err in his estimate of them, but then his duty would be none the less clear, and those who are shocked by his boldness would have the consolation of knowing that, whether he was right or wrong, it is by incessant discussion of persons, of ideas, and of measures that the world progresses, that civilization is promoted, and truth decided. It might be a pleasanter world if every man thought all his neighbors Solomons, and said so; but then the world was clearly not made to be wholly pleasant.

ENGLAND.

LONDON, February 28, 1868.

JUST as Parliament was settling down to the piece of work which will occupy to all appearance a large part of its time this session, namely, the settlement of Irish affairs, its labors were arrested. We are at the present moment under an interregnum. Lord Derby has resigned office under the increasing pressure of age and the gout, and Mr. Disraeli steps into his place. The change will be of very trifling importance, resembling at the outside the substitution of the mayor of the palace for a fainéant king. Lord Derby has for some time discharged the ornamental rather than the useful functions of a minister, and it may be added that he has discharged them exceedingly well. He had precisely those qualities which the English people delight to honor. He is the representative of one of our oldest families, fourteenth earl of his name, and with an estate of I know not how many thousands a year. He translated Homer and kept race-horses; and, if I may judge from novels of the "Guy Livingstone" order, a considerable number of my countrymen hold that distinction on the turf and a familiarity with the classics are as desirable as the Christian graces, and perhaps at times a very fair substitute for them. Not that this is the case with Lord Derby. He is really a high-spirited and vivacious gentleman, who might stand for the ideal worshipped in our great public schools such as Eton or Harrow. He is a man of really generous sympathies, as was shown in his early advocacy of anti-slavery principles; yet he has no real claims to statesmanlike intellect, and possesses a mind rather graceful than powerful. He has that indolence which it must be so difficult to shake off when you have fifty thousand a year and a historic title, and rather condescended to take office, from a sense of loyalty, than sought for it as a distinction. "My father," as Lord Stanley said, or rather is said to have said, "would be a very able man, if he knew anything;" to which it may be added that Lord Derby is reported with the same degree of probability to have declared that Lord Stanley was waiting to read his father's translation of Homer, when it should be published in the form of a blue-book. In short, Lord Derby is a brilliant but not a useful statesman, and we may hope is one of the last representatives of the old school who condescended to govern the country so long as it does not give them too much trouble. His absence will make little or no difference in our politics, but it will be regretted by many people upon whom his popular qualities have made a strong impression.

Those who will really regret him most sincerely are the class who look with some jealousy upon the rise of his successor. Most people, indeed, whether liberal or conservative, have seen Mr. Disraeli's success with a good deal of satisfaction. In the first place, whatever may be our opinion of his sincerity, he is undoubtedly the man with the most brains among our present ministers. Moreover, his success has been won, in spite of every obstacle, by sheer talent and courage. It is a curious thing that the man in whom the qualities of the English aristocracy received their fullest embodiment should be succeeded by an adventurer of alien blood, without one of the advantages upon which political success is generally founded in this country. Mr. Disraeli has always acknowledged, and he deserves credit for making the acknowledgment a cause of pride, that he was originally "a gentleman of the press." No one starting from such a position as the author of "Vivian Grey" and "Coningsby" has ever before succeeded in becoming Prime Minister of England. Beginning as a radical agitator under the patronage of O'Connell, he has gradually fought his way upwards, and, by sheer force of ability, has compelled his party to obey him even when they secretly hated him. Indeed, Mr. Disraeli has always been the object of a more bitter dislike from his supporters than from his opponents. The Conservatives have bitterly grudged the superiority of one who had entered the political arena with none of the acknowledged and usual advantages. He has never maintained his supremacy by the arts common to most men whose position is held, so to speak, on sufferance. On the contrary, he has always treated his followers with a haughtiness and a reserve which have caused them to dislike him almost as much as they distrusted him. So remarkable is the repulsion between Mr. Disraeli and his party that one of our ablest writers declared not three years ago that he was "a foreign body in that tepid organization," and that "some day soon" he would be ejected from it as a needle that has been swallowed will work out from some part of our bodily frame.

This prophecy, though made by an acute observer, has been signally falsified. Mr. Disraeli's hold upon his party is firmer than ever—so firm that they would be at least as unable to dispense with him as he would with them. Their dislike has been partly swallowed up in admiration, and, though they can never be cordially fond of him, there is far less chance of a rebellion against his leadership than of a rebellion of the Liberals against Mr. Gladstone. I have already had many opportunities of speaking upon the nature of the process by which this result has been effected. Mr. Disraeli has not reached his present position as the representative of any great principle, nor as leading on his party to the effectual carrying into practice of any of the measures which they had at heart. On the contrary, he has given effect to principles which he condemned and ridiculed, and has enabled his party to get the credit of measures identical with those which they had most bitterly opposed. Yet there is something about the brilliant display of talent by which this has been accomplished which has dazzled even his opponents in the House of Commons. Whatever else may be said about him, no one can deny that he is the cleverest political tactician extant. And if this is not a sufficient ground for falling down and worshipping him, or even for hailing him as a heaven-born minister, it is not a bad reason for supporting him. To use a metaphor which Mr. Lowe employed last session, he treated the Conservative party as a groom treats a skittish horse; he brought them up to the object of their aversion, allowed them to look at it and smell at it till at last they were brought insensibly to pass an obstacle at which they formerly shied. Now, Liberals cannot but hope that the same trick may be repeated this session. No one can do so much to help on reform as a Conservative minister; the House of Lords is compelled to accept the measures which he dictates; and if Mr. Disraeli shows himself as squeezable this session as he did the last, we may hope that he will force upon that assembly of bigoted land-owners a fair instalment of reform in regard to Irish land laws, and even induce the bishops to consent to the decent education of the people. It is a great thing to have as leader in the Conservative camp a man who has a head upon his shoulders and is willing to see the importance of reasonable concessions. If some of his followers cry out that he is a traitor, that does n't much matter to his opponents.

The other changes in the ministry will be insignificant. Mr. Ward Hunt, it is said, will take Mr. Disraeli's place as Chancellor of the Exchequer. I presume that Mr. Ward Hunt's reputation is pretty nearly confined to England; and I confess that I had never heard of him till he became prominent for his exertions, during the cattle plague, in persuading the House of Commons that the country ought to compensate the land-owners. The House of Commons naturally wanted little persuasion to put its hand in the pockets of the country for the good of its own class. He is a good, steady, and, I should guess, rather wooden country gentleman, who will, doubtless, make a passable subordinate; but the work of the House of Commons will, of course, rest principally upon Mr. Disraeli's shoulders. Lord Stanley, it is said, will be sent to the comparative obscurity of the House of Lords. As he is not much of an orator, though a sound and able statesman, he will probably not regret a premature elevation to the dignity which cannot in any case be long delayed. And so we shall soon have the Parliamentary machinery set to work upon questions of greater importance than any with which it has dealt for years. Lord Russell, Mr. Mill, and Mr. Bright have already produced schemes for Irish reform; and the extraordinary variety of opinion on the subject speaks more for the attention devoted to the question than for any hopes of a satisfactory result. There is, for example, a section of Liberals represented by the Pall Mall Gazette which declares emphatically that the one thing wanted for Ireland is repose. The condition of the Irish people, they assert, has been steadily, if slowly, improving. The Fenian outbreak is really less formidable than those to which we have been accustomed in former years. It is confined to a smaller class of the population, and is more exclusively due to foreign agitators. I mention these opinions not as approving them, but because I am certain that they are held in good faith by a considerable section of the Liberals. They represent the old laissez-faire school, and, whilst perfectly willing to upset the Irish Church Establishment, their only policy with regard to the land is to stand still and let things settle themselves. At the opposite pole comes Mr. Mill, who says in so many words—and Mr. Mill can use very plain words when he chooses—that Ireland is in a state to justify revolutionary measures. They could not, as he argues with much power, become independent without so great a danger of anarchy and disorder as justifies us in refusing to relax our hold. But, if we keep them, we are bound to do the best we can for their improvement, and, in his opinion, nothing will be satisfactory short of a measure which will place the ownership of the land in the hands of the actual cultivators. The difficulties urged against such a measure as this are, of course, considerable; but whatever may be the value of Mr. Mill's ideas, it is plain that they will be utterly rejected by our present rulers. A revolution will not be made by us in Ireland until we are getting ripe for a revolution in England; and indeed it is a very important result of these Irish discussions that they are gradually bringing on debates as to the merits of our landed system in England. In any case, no speedy settlement can be anticipated. Between the position occupied by Mr. Mill and that taken up by the Pall Mall Gazette, every possible state of opinion is represented. When the struggle begins in the House of Commons parties will doubtless become more organized, the hostile armies will take up their position, and we shall see what are the chances which are at present obscured in the chaotic whirl of conflicting sentiments. Just now we are at the day before the battle, and no man can clearly distinguish the outlines of the forces which are gathering for the conflict. If I may venture an illustration from your own politics, I should say that the Irish question is as much more perplexing than that of reconstruction as it is older in date. You may form some estimate by a rule of three as to the time it will be satisfactorily settled.

In my last letter I noticed the disappearance of Mr. Speke. Mr. Speke has reappeared, and, to use a bit of school-boy slang, his whole performance has been in the nature of a "sell." Whilst his friends were offering enormous rewards for his discovery, whilst every newspaper was speculating on the strange story, and ingenious theories were being spun as to the existence of an organized system of murder in London, Mr. Speke was quietly enjoying himself at Plymouth. He was visiting the beautiful scenery of Devon and Cornwall, going to church, reading his Bible, and studying the articles about himself in the newspapers. He is said to be sane, and the only explanations given of his escapade are either that he meant to go quietly to America to preach the Gospel (I don't know why he should conceal such a laudable intention), or that he wished to avoid being married. It gives a pleasant impression of the position of an English country parson that his only way of avoiding forcible marriage is by disappearing entirely from society. But I don't quite think that Mr. Speke was sane.

Correspondence.

THE WEST AND GREENBACKS.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Do you quite understand the feeling at the West about the national finances? We are not, I think, much tainted with the repudiation contagion, however much appearances may be against us. Of course we have a small party of repudiators who transfer to the bonds their opposition to the war, but the resolutions of our Chicago Common Council seem to me to express the prevailing opinion west of Lake Michigan.

There is, however, some confusion in the popular mind on the matter of public credit, and some opposition to the plans of Mr. McCulloch and specie-payment men, which spring from perfect confidence in the national money, not from distrust of it. It is this faith in greenbacks which I fear you do not comprehend.

West of Lake Michigan we never had a paper dollar that was worth exactly as much as a gold dollar. We have been swindled by bankers ever since we were a people. "Red dog" and "stump-tail" were the descriptive terms applied by us to our currency before the war. I think nine men in ten among us rejoiced over the war as a great blessing when the greenbacks came. Here, at least, was a national bank-bill, an American paper dollar. The faith and wealth of the nation were represented in the words "The United States promise to pay." We never had specie dollars. To get a paper one that could not break seemed to be the beginning of the millennium. We have not changed our minds about this; we believe with all our might in the national paper dollar, and we do n't want it paid. That is what is the matter.

Our farmers have realized no serious evils from inflation. They received good prices for their produce, and their dollars were at last just as good as anybody's—dollars to lock up and keep without a scruple of doubt about breaking of the bank. Just now inflation seems to benefit them wonderfully. The wheat sells at a good round price, while dry-goods are down to the prices of 1860.

The first consequence of this confidence in the national money was that the "national bank-bills" were an offense to our sight. The farmers said, "The bankers are at their old tricks. These dollars are an entering wedge to drive out Uncle Sam's dollars. Red dog and stump-tail are on beyond." Why the Government should pay the bankers for using its credit, or pay them hush-money or show them any mercy, the prairie farmer says he cannot see; and he is not convinced that the unsophisticated direct promise of the nation needs any propping by bankers. He wants the greenbacks rendered perpetual by act of Congress.

The national bank bill prepared the mind of our farmer for distrust. "They are at their old tricks," is the feeling with which he hears of any scheme that can benefit the bankers or open a prospect of losing the greenbacks. When he was told that the Secretary of the Treasury was burning up greenbacks he felt as indignant as when the rebels fired on Sumter. In short, our farmer believes in greenbacks, and has had no experience of the evils of inflation. Give him credit for an unfaltering confidence in a dollar which bears the great national name; remember that to him it is small matter whether that national name be stamped on coin or printed on paper, and then enlighten him.

David Hilton Wheeler.

Evanston, March 5, 1868.

SUPREME COURT DECISIONS.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Your excellent article of Feb. 20, entitled "The Use of the Supreme Court to the Union," contains this sentence: "The three additional instances in which the court has pronounced against the validity of United States statutes are the Dred Scott case, the Test Oath case, and the case of Milligan."

It appears to me, from a careful reading of the decisions (Ex parte Milligan, 4 Wallace, p. 2), that the case of Milligan ought not to be included among those "in which the court has pronounced against the validity of United States statutes." What statute is invalidated by that decision? The only statute much discussed in it is one entitled "An act relating to habeas corpus and regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases," approved March 3, 1863; under which Milligan asked to be, and was, in fact, discharged from military custody. The controlling question in the case, as the court say, was whether the military commission which tried and sentenced Milligan had jurisdiction, legally, to try and sentence him; and a leading reason given for answering the question negatively was, that the military commission was not a court ordained and established by Congress. The decision does, indeed, go farther, and declares in effect that Congress could not have made Milligan's trial valid by any previous legislation. On this point four members of the court differed from the other five, and filed a dissenting opinion. The opinion of the five is, of course, the opinion of the court; but is it not one thing to say that Congress cannot make a law of a certain purport, and a quite different thing to pronounce against the validity of a United States statute? S. C.

Peoria, Ill., March 9, 1868.

"THE NATION'S" CONSERVATISM.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: There is scarcely an utterance of yours which would be commonly described as "conservative" with which I do not fully agree; yet I cannot forbear from saying that your paper is, as a whole, a little too conservative. I ask you, and those who, like you and me, are impatient with the recklessness, imprudence, and general unwisdom of some leading men in the Republican party, to watch with at least equal attention, and to give equal prominence to, the same faults, and worse ones, among Democratic leaders.

It is true that in the Republican party conscience has acquired a weight disproportioned to its intellect, but it is equally true that in the Democratic party sheer wickedness occupies the place which conscience holds among Republicans. The intellect of the Democratic party to-day is full as weak as that of its opponent, and is as much controlled by the evil passions of its members as that of the Republican party is by its members' consciences.

I fully admit that it is a bad thing for intellect to be blinded by a morbid conscience; but surely it is far worse that it should be blinded by morbid passions.

There never was a party more utterly incompetent to serve the country than the Democratic party as it is to-day. It is worthless in opposition—a sphere in which the Republican party was relatively magnificent. It will be frightful in its excesses if once restored to national power. A party which has shown such amazing lack of brains in managing its own interests will certainly put no more brains (and a bad heart) into the service of the country. T. G. S.

Brooklyn, March 13, 1868.

"THE NATION'S" RADICALISM.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: Your three Boston correspondents must be conservative indeed if they are so easily alarmed by the radicalism of the Nation. For my part, I saw no difficulty in the sentence to which they took so much objection: viz., that in which you justify Congress in refusing to allow Mr. Johnson to test the validity of its acts by legal process, where it is a prerequisite to such legal process that he should first violate a statute.

If an act should be passed in Massachusetts inflicting upon larceny a punishment which was of dubious constitutionality, and one of your correspondents should detect a man picking his pocket, who, being seized, should declare that his sole purpose was to test the constitutionality of the law, I imagine it would make a good deal of difference in your correspondent's treatment of the plea whether the law-tester was a man of known probity and wealth or a notorious pickpocket.

Mr. Johnson cannot test the validity of the law (he claims) without violating it. Very good. If it is void, let him pass free; but if it is valid, then his excuse, which might be sufficient for a man of good character, ought not to avail one who notoriously is not such a man. Reader.

New York, March 12, 1868.

Notes.

LITERARY.

Murray Hoffman, Esquire, has prepared a work, to be published in May next by Messrs. Pott & Amery, entitled "A Treatise upon the Ecclesiastical Law in the State of New York." It will contain the law as to the mode of organization and incorporation applicable to different denominations; a view of the legal relations subsisting between clergymen and their congregations; and a presentation of the law as regards pews, vaults, and cemeteries—the tenure and sale of church property, the interposition of civil tribunals, and other topics. Although dealing particularly with the State of New York, it is intended to make the work valuable for churches in all parts of the country.——Messrs. Wynkoop & Sherwood announce the republication of "Grandpapa's Arithmetic," in which M. Jean Macé, combining instruction with entertainment, unfolds the mysteries of addition, subtraction, multiplication, and division in what he calls a "fairy tale." "Liliput Levee" is another book announced by Wynkoop & Sherwood—a book very different from those of M. Macé, and full of pleasure for children. The same house will publish "The Bride of the Wind," a fairy story, by Marie Hagenstein, and "The Merchant of Venice," as produced at the Winter Garden Theatre, New York, 1867, by Edwin Booth. It will contain illustrations of all the principal scenes, an analysis of the play, explanatory notes, and articles on costume. The editor is Mr. H. L. Hinton. ——Sheldon & Co. announce "Steven Lawrence, Yeoman," Mrs. Edwards's best novel, which has been running through the Galaxy——It is proper to say here that Messrs. G. W. Carleton & Co. now own all the works of Captain Mayne Reid—some fifteen volumes—formerly published by R. M. Dewitt, and that they wait for the opening of the Spring trade in order to publish a number of novels and other works, the titles of which will be duly announced.——The Catholic Publication Society have in press: "Tales from the Diary of a Sister of Mercy;" "The Life of St. Columba, Apostle of Caledonia," by Count Montalembert; "Nellie Netterville: A Tale of the Cromwellian Wars in Ireland," by Miss Caddell; "Problems of the Age: with Essays of St. Augustine on Kindred Subjects," by Rev. A. F. Hewit; "The Story of a Sister" (Le Récit d'une Sœur): translated from the French; and a new illustrated series of books for a Sunday-school library.

—The trustees of the Peabody Museum of American Archæology and Ethnology, established in connection with Harvard College in October, 1867, have made their first annual report, of which the most interesting feature is naturally the report of the curator, Professor Jeffries Wyman. In twelve months the collection of specimens has not, of course, reached a very high number, but several societies were ready to contribute to the outfit of the young institution, and Messrs. Caleb Cushing and E. G. Squier were especially generous in presenting Mexican and Peruvian antiquities of great value. In human crania the museum may almost be said to be rich already, while its collection of stone implements, both European and American, is pretty extensive. More than in actual possession, the museum is fortunate in having for its directors men thoroughly acquainted with the progress of modern discovery and the best scientific methods, and who are a guarantee that no effort and no money will be wasted in unsystematic or random researches. The library is least forward of any department, but here the intention is to procure only such works as are not contained in the public libraries. An interesting chapter of the report relates to the curator's explorations among the shell-heaps on the Atlantic coast, and also on the St. John's River, in East Florida. For those in Maine and Massachusetts reference is made to the detailed account contained in the American Naturalist for January, to which we called attention at the time; and of those in Florida a sketch is given, with a promise of a full description hereafter. The mounds opened along the St. John appear to be much older than those of New England; certainly not less than three hundred years old, or antecedent to the discovery of America. Similar explorations are planning for the coming season, and the museum is securing agents in all parts of the world. One of these ought to be Mr. George Catlin; and his museum of Indian curiosities, which the Congress of a less enlightened day refused to purchase for retention in this country, ought to be, if possible, recovered from England. We sincerely hope that as the Peabody foundation becomes better known, the many who can doubtless add objects of value to its cabinets will do so cheerfully and liberally. The West especially may be looked to to furnish relics of the aborigines, both of what it has and of what it may easily find by searching.

—Wherever English is spoken Macaulay is at present read, and wherever Macaulay is read Barère is known as an unbounded and fathomless liar. De Quincey, almost more of an Englishman than Macaulay—though not so exclusively English, for he possessed and often exercised the power of philosophic as well as imaginative detachment—used to grow almost abusive, if our memory serves us, over one of his most impudent achievements in falsehood, one not mentioned by Macaulay—the famous one which has furnished the subject of at least one French "historical" picture and been the theme of nobody knows how many bursts of eloquence. It represents the French line-of-battle ship Vengeur refusing to surrender to the British on the victory of June 1, 1794, but going down firing her last tier of guns, the tricolor proudly waving, and the crew shouting as one man "Vive la République," and declining to be picked up by the boats of Albion. This veracious tale of M. Barère's used to trouble Thackeray also, and Mr. Hamerton in his last work takes pains to denounce it. Perhaps not even that other fable about Cambronne's waving his sword at Waterloo, and crying that "the Guard dies," etc., has been so efficacious in stirring British bile. It is not so well known, however, that at the same time when Barère invented so much glory for the men of the Vengeur, who, in fact, showed considerable alacrity in climbing into the English boats, he invented a celebrated phrase which has ever since been commonly attributed to Napoleon I. When Barère reported the fate of the heroic vessel to the Convention, he added, "Let Pitt tell that to his nation of shopkeepers." Anything he really said that contains any truth at all it is as well to allow him the credit of, and this nickname must be admitted to be of his manufacture.

—Mr. Henry Kingsley is the ostensible editor of a new "Robinson Crusoe." Really, he is not the editor, but only was hired by the publisher to write a preface, and he has seen fit to send a note to the papers saying so, for the critics have shown that the editorial task was not performed with great care or success. It was intended that the new edition should follow the text of the first edition, and this it did except that the original title-page was not, as it well might have been, exactly copied. Indeed, it followed the first edition so closely, and with so little discrimination, that it reproduced the errors which Defoe, in an appended table of errata, took pains to correct. Upon the discovery of this fact came Mr. Kingsley's explanation, which, while it relieves him from the charge of blundering, would seem, if we know all the circumstances, to leave him open to the heavier charge of what must be considered a piece of deception—and one not the less, but rather the more, to be reprehended in that it is common. We speak of the new edition, however, not so much on this account as because Mr. Kingsley, first among commentators on "Robinson Crusoe," points out the truth that the famous novel which children in Oregon and children in America are to-day reading as a romance, which is a part of the fictitious literature of every European tongue and of more than one of the languages of the East, is, in truth, not a romance at all. It is "merely an allegorical account of Defoe's own life." Defoe, in the preface to a little known work of his, entitled "Serious Reflections during the Life and Surprising Adventures of Robinson Crusoe," declares that "the story, though allegorical, is also historical;" and again, "that there is a man alive, and well known too, the actions of whose life are the first subject of these volumes, and to whom all or most part of the story most directly alludes." Mr. Kingsley entertaining no doubt—as indeed none can be entertained—that the "life of unexampled misfortunes" portrayed in the work is the life of Defoe himself, endeavors to make the allegory fit the political events and public characters in which Defoe was engaged and with whom he was brought in contact. He acknowledges difficulties in the way of this interpretation; cannot, for example, see how the shipwreck can be very easily made to stand for the revolution of 1688, or the parrot for the Earl of Oxford, or Doctor Sacheverell for the first savage killed by Crusoe. A critic in the Pall Mall Gazette thinks that it is not at all in this way that the allegory is to be read. To him it seems to deal with Defoe's personal history—his solitary struggles—and no English writer was more of a solitary—his philosophy, and his religious feelings. It is true that his moral reflections and his autobiography he chose to set off by a fictitious dress, and that he let his imagination run away with him, so that the setting has obscured the gem; and it is true even that, in the second part of his book, he became purely a romancer; but there is good reason to suppose that, really, it was for the sake of the third part—the "Serious Reflections"—that the other two were written, and it seems susceptible of proof, from Defoe's own words on various occasions, that in the first part the fiction was employed to secure a hearing for the moralizings of a solitary thinker, and, further, that the various feigned events and personages of that portion of "Robinson Crusoe" had their antitype in the realm of actual fact. It is not strange, then, to find in the title of Gildon's squib aimed at Defoe what seems a direct allusion to the autobiographical character of the work. Gildon says: "The Life and Surprising Adventures of Mr. D—— De F——, of London, Hosier, who has lived fifty years by himself in the Kingdom of North and South Britain." And Defoe himself, in the preface above mentioned, assures his readers that without going into too exact an explanation of "the original by the emblem," he can tell them that there is not a circumstance in the imaginary story which has not its precise allusion to the conduct or life of a man known to the public, whose whole existence has been full of unhappiness and loneliness. Perhaps Defoe is hardly a subject for a long biography, but certainly it would be no more than just to so great a writer, and it could not fail to be interesting, if the view of his writings here mentioned were to receive full treatment in a biographical memoir prefatory of his immortal work.

—English lawyers are more fortunate than our own in that they have possession of Tenison Edwards, Esquire. He is a barrister who, having observed the great amount of labor imposed on the profession by the necessity of "noting up" text-books, conceived the idea of himself doing it for all of them. Tedious labor was not the only thing from which to save them; the work was one in which an inaccuracy or an omission might lead to the ruin of clients as well as to the injury of the lawyer's reputation. Mr. Edwards's plan was to compile notes of the effect of each new judicial decision or each new act of Parliament, and to print with the note a reference to the page of the text-books upon which it might bear. He at first used paper gummed on one side, and the lawyer or his clerk had no further trouble than to cut up the slip and paste each note on the margin of the proper text-book. Afterwards, he printed on both sides of the slip, numbering each note, and binding the slips into a volume. All the labor then necessary was to pencil the number of the note on the margin of the book. Still later he added a synoptical index, published half-yearly, embodying the contents of the old volumes of "The Notanda Digest"—which is what he calls his work—and including, also, references to the decisions and acts of the six months immediately preceding. The benefit he has thus conferred upon lawyers is very great, and the law is now to a less extent than before a mighty maze without a plan. It is a pity that Mr. Edwards's ingenuity has not been emulated on this side of the water; we should soon have a digest of the common law as existing here as satisfactory as our digests of statutes.

—The German statesman, Friedrich von Gentz, has been an attractive subject to writers of a later generation. His life and works were the careful study of Haym; R. von Mohl and Dr. Bluntschli have treated of his political activity; and Dr. H. Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, with the aid of material in the Imperial archives at Vienna, has given, in his "Contribution to the History of Austria in the Nineteenth Century," of which we have already once spoken, what he calls a Seelengemälde, or psychological analysis of Gentz's character, endeavoring to trace the course of its development, or perhaps we should say retrogression, from liberal to anti-liberal opinions, from virtue to sensuality. One secret of the attention he has thus received from posterity is undoubtedly due to his devotion to German unity in the days when the feeling for unity was less self-asserting and less courageous, and therefore far less powerful than it has since become. It seems that we have not yet done with Gentz. The Prince Metternich, whose most intimate adviser and valued assistant he was, left on his decease four great chests of papers, with the injunction that nothing should be published for twenty years—that is to say, till 1879. They have but just been brought from the castle of Königswart to Vienna and opened. On examination, the correspondence with Gentz proves to be unexpectedly large, and mixed up with papers of all kinds, so as to render the work of assorting sufficiently tedious. It has been concluded to sort first with reference to Gentz, and to recommend the papers thus collected first for publication to the young Prince Metternich, now ambassador at Paris.

"—That portion of Bunsen's "Vollständiges Bibelwerk für die Gemeinde" which contains the translation of the New Testament, has been published by Brockhaus at Leipsic, omitting the exegetical notes which originally accompanied it. Professor Holtzmann, who, with Professor Kamphausen, has taken up and continued the great work of the lamented scholar, furnishes an introduction to the translation—words of high praise to Bunsen for having conceived the plan of his "Bible-Work for the People." The present publication of the text alone is for the sake of those who would be unable to procure the fuller work and of those who would like to read the New Testament in other than the strong and antiquated speech of Luther. It is on this account likely to mark an era in the popular faith of Germany.

—Dr. Hugo Meyer recently read an essay before the historical department of the Bremen Künstlerverein, on the legends and statues of the historical Roland (or Hroudland), who perished fighting the Saracens at Roncesvalles. The attempt was made to trace the connection between the traditions (which so abounded in Southern France) in relation to this hero and the old German mythology. The adventures, qualities, and symbols assigned to Roland were clearly taken directly from those which belonged to Balder, the old northern sun-god (known also among the various German tribes as Tyr, Heimdall, Freyr, etc.); and not only did the borrowed raiment fit him as a warrior against pagan darkness, but even his name had a divine origin. In certain districts mostly still inhabited by German races, as all were formerly, there appeared a god Hruodo, identical on the one hand with the god of light, and on the other hand closely resembling the god Irmin, and the war-god Tîu or Ziu—the oldest and most widely-spread of the names of this divinity, and connected by philologists with the Greek Zeus, Latin Jupiter, Indian Dyâus, etc. The day consecrated to him was Thursday (Dienstag), the ancient judgment-day, variously known as Zistag among the Suevi, Ertag Irminstag in Bavaria, Roytag-Rolandstag in Flanders. He was originally worshipped in the form of a pole or pillar, surmounted by a huge ball in token of the sun, called an "Irmin-pillar;" and the Roland-pillars or statues had a similar beginning, along with the scutcheon poles (Schildbäume), and the Tîodute or Jodutenbäume erected as monuments of victory and at the seats of justice. The subject is an interesting one, and promises to reward further investigations.

SCIENTIFIC.

The Transfusion of Blood.—Those who, like ourselves, have read the story of "Griffith Gaunt, or Jealousy," will remember the exciting scene depicted in the closing chapter. Four doctors in attendance—one young and enthusiastic. Patient dying of sudden hemorrhage, breathing hard, and with a pulse that hardly moved. A tube and a lancet. The young doctor "fixed his apparatus and performed an operation, which then, as now, was impossible in theory; only he did it. He sent some of Griffith Gaunt's bright red blood smoking hot into Kate Gaunt's veins."

Had Mr. Reade cared less for producing a sensation, and more for presenting the actual state of science in regard to this matter, he would not have made the above statement. We have been induced to look up the history of the transfusion of blood, since it is again attracting considerable attention abroad, and a Swiss physician has introduced a new instrument for the purpose, from which valuable results are expected. We do not find that any attempts were made for the renewal of life or the cure of disease by this practice earlier than the seventeenth century; though as long ago as the time of King David the constant external application, in old age, of young blood was believed to prolong life.

Harvey's great discovery of the circulation of the blood must not only first be made, but defended, before it could be accepted, for thirty years or more, amidst the envy and hatred of contemporary physicians and the jeers of the vulgar. This accomplished, a sort of delirium seized the people, for they believed that, as all diseases were attributable to the blood, they had only to replace bad blood by good to keep off all maladies and become immortal.

The first experiments were performed by Dr. Lower, in 1666, at Oxford, England, by transfusing the blood of one animal into another; and in the diary of Samuel Pepys, F.R.S., for the same year, it is recorded that "at a meeting of Gresham College, there was an experiment of the blood of one dog let out, till he died, into the body of another on one side. The first died upon the place, and the other very well, and likely to do well. This did give occasion to many pretty wishes, as of the blood of a Quaker to be let into an archbishop, and such like." It was thought possible that the exchange of blood might alter the nature or disposition of the animals, for the operation seemed to be like that of grafting, where the scion imparts its own nature to the sap of the stock grafted upon; hence we find, in the "Philosophical Transactions of the Royal Society" for 1666 a list of queries to be answered by subsequent experiments, two of which are: "Whether a fierce dog may not become more tame by the transfusing of the blood of a cowardly dog? Whether a small, young dog, by being often fresh stocked with the blood of a young dog of a larger kind, will grow bigger than the ordinary size of his own kind?" The author of the story which we have mentioned, struck with the same idea, makes Mrs. Gaunt say, "Once she told Father Francis, quite seriously, that she had never been quite the same woman since she lived by Griffith's blood; she was turned jealous."

The French savans were also at the same time busy experimenting. "M. Gayant put the blood of a young dog into the veins of an old one, who, two hours after, did leap and frisk, whereas he was almost blind with age, and could hardly stir before." Similar results attended the experiments on horses.

The next step was to try transfusion on man, and, as we might expect, the French were the first to attempt it. Dr. Denis, at Paris, in 1667, cured, as he thought, a lunatic, by introducing in two operations nearly a pound and a half of the blood of a calf into one of the veins of his arm. The wife of the man concluded transfusion had done him good, because, as she said, "at the season we are now in, her husband should be outrageous and very mad against herself, and that, instead of the kindness he showed to her at this full of the moon, he used to do nothing but swear and beat her." Unfortunately, this patient remained sane for only two months, and died during the third experiment.

A woman was cured of palsy, and a man of leprosy, but a young prince of royal blood fell a victim to the operation. These failures led to the decree that no transfusions should be made but by the approbation of the physicians of the Parisian faculty, which amounted to a total prohibition. In England, there were several cases which resulted favorably, it is said; but in Italy the Pope put a stop to the practice in consequence of the death of two individuals on whom Dr. Riva had operated.

From this time transfusion was considered not only useless but dangerous, till the subject was taken up again by Dr. Blundell, of England, who published a little work in 1824, in which he shows that the experiments of physicians on man in the seventeenth century often failed, because animal was substituted for human blood, as well as on account of the faulty apparatus used. His own experiments are exceedingly interesting. He resuscitated a dog by the transfusion of blood after breathing had stopped five minutes, and for the purpose of showing that, when the system ceases to make blood through disease, life may be prolonged, he nourished a dog for three weeks solely by repeated transfusions from another dog.

He gives some account of six instances in which he injected blood into human veins, in some of which respiration had ceased before the operation was performed. In one case he prolonged life for fifty-six hours. The inferences he makes from the few opportunities which he had for experimenting are, that transfusion may be performed after his method with facility, and that the operation is not attended by any obviously dangerous symptoms, provided the blood be promptly transmitted and the injection of air be precluded.

We come now to notice the instrument for transfusion recently invented by Dr. Roussel, of Geneva, who considers it a great improvement on all those previously in use. The earliest operations, those of the seventeenth century, were performed by introducing one end of a tube, composed either of a succession of quills or of silver, directly into a vein or artery of the animal furnishing the blood, and the other into a vein of the recipient man or beast. The objection to this method is that clots are very sure to form at either end of the tube, where the blood is necessarily for a greater or less length of time exposed to the air, and these introduced into the circulation are apt to produce death. This is a process of immediate transfusion. Dr. Blundell used a syringe, and injected blood previously received in a basin into the veins. The same objection is made to this method as to the former, and, also, that the properties of the whole amount of blood are changed by exposure to the air. Various contrivances have been resorted to to obviate these difficulties, and at last Dr. Roussel thinks he has invented an instrument which fulfils all the ends desired. This is, in brief, composed of a sort of cupping-glass made to adhere to the arm, over the vein to be opened, by working a small piston connected with it, and of a rubber pouch above this, which is filled by the working of another piston with water, that is also at the same time forced into the interior of the vessel beneath. When the instrument is properly adjusted, all the air being driven out by the water introduced, the distended vein is opened by means of a lancet, which penetrates the wall of the glass, and the water is forced out through a glass tube, and its place taken by the blood. The transfusing apparatus is now connected with a silver tube, previously placed in a vein of the patient's arm, and the operation goes on, air being totally excluded. For his invention the doctor claims great results. He asserts that he has repeatedly revived animals that have ceased to breathe; and he gives at length an interesting case of a girl of seventeen years, dying of an excessive hemorrhage, to whom he was called. He found her in a profound syncope, skin cold, respiration and pulse gone, face cadaverous, pupils dilated, and, in fact, appearing dead. His ear placed over the heart detected no pulsation, but only a slight vibration. His proposition to introduce some of her sister's blood into her veins was readily accepted, and the apparatus was soon adjusted. Transfusion commenced, and in less than a minute a beating of the heart was perceptible; later, respiration began; and in twenty minutes, when the operation was discontinued, the patient recovered her lifelike appearance, opened her eyes, and spoke to her sister. This was in December, 1865, and Dr. Roussel states that she is at present married and in good health.

There are but seventy-six recorded cases of transfusion, notwithstanding the thousands of instances where it might have been serviceable; for wherever death threatens through loss of blood, there there is a possibility of saving life by this mode of treatment. This is to be accounted for by the fact that the methods heretofore resorted to have been so faulty, and attended so often by disastrous results, that surgeons generally have not cared to incur the responsibility of operating. The doctor suggests that every army surgeon should be supplied with a transfusing apparatus, for many a poor soldier dies not from the severity of his wounds, but from the loss of blood. There have been some experiments of this kind in this country. Dr. Austin Flint, Jr., performed transfusion on a woman bleeding to death, and has reason to believe that her life was thereby prolonged six or eight hours; and a still better result attended a similar operation in New Orleans.

VARIATION OF ANIMALS AND PLANTS UNDER DOMESTICATION.*

For critical examination in detail, Mr. Darwin's new book must be referred to the scientific journals and to cultivators and breeders. But, whatever audience he may address, a wide circle of general readers is sure to attend the founder of a new ism, and the word Darwinism has become as familiar as Galvanism or Mormonism. Readers from mere curiosity are likely to be somewhat disappointed in the present work. It is replete—some may say heavy—with facts; and facts in science, important as they are in this case both to practical men and philosophical investigators, are seldom half as enticing as speculations. To the "Origin of Species," moreover, there was the added zest of heterodoxy. Everybody hastened to read a book which was widely denounced, even by some scientific authorities, as dangerous or improper. No doubt the present volumes are flavored with the doctrine of their predecessor, which this is intended to support by evidence. But their main interest lies in the vast array of facts which are here collected and discussed, with the characteristic faithfulness and candor of a writer who was never known to tamper with the evidence, or to keep back anything which told against his theory. There is, moreover, plenty of hypothesis in the second volume, and that quite independent of the Darwinian theory.

These volumes are, in the main, a storehouse of facts relative to variation under domestication and kindred topics. The author announces that in a work to follow this he intends to treat of variation in a state of nature; and in yet another (may he live to complete such arduous undertakings!) he proposes to try the principle of natural selection by seeing how far it will serve to explain the geological succession of organic beings, their geographical distribution in past and present times, and their mutual affinities and homologies. He briefly informs us how the foundations of the views which he has lately made so famous were laid during his voyage in the Beagle, many years ago:

"When I visited the Galapagos Archipelago, situated in the Pacific Ocean, about five hundred miles from the shore of South America, I found myself surrounded by peculiar species of birds, reptiles, and plants, existing nowhere else in the world. Yet they all bore an American stamp. In the song of the mocking thrush, in the harsh cry of the carrion hawk, in the great candlestick-like opuntias, I clearly perceived the neighborhood of America, though the islands were separated by so many miles of ocean from the mainland, and differed much from it in their geological constitution and climate. Still more surprising was the fact that most of the inhabitants of each separate island in this small archipelago were specifically different, though most closely related to each other. The archipelago, with its innumerable craters and bare streams of lava, appeared to be of recent origin; and thus I fancied myself brought near to the very act of creation. I often asked myself how these many peculiar animals and plants had been produced: the simplest answer seemed to be that the inhabitants of the several islands had descended from each other, undergoing modification in the course of their descent; and that all the inhabitants of the archipelago had descended from those of the nearest land, namely, America, whence colonists would naturally have been derived. But it long remained to me an inexplicable problem how the necessary degree of modification could have been effected; and it would thus have remained for ever, had I not studied domestic productions, and thus acquired a just idea of the power of selection. As soon as I had fully realized this idea, I saw, on reading Malthus on Population, that natural selection was the inevitable result of the rapid increase of all organic beings; for I was prepared to appreciate the struggle for existence by having long studied the habits of animals."

* "The Variation of Animals and Plants under Domestication. By Charles Darwin, M.A., F.R.S., etc." In 2 volumes, with illustrations, 8vo. London: Murray. 1868

In South America he had already been impressed with the fact of the prevalence of the same types, under different species or genera, throughout the length and breadth of the continent, and under the most diverse possible conditions; while other parts of the world, such as South Africa and Australia, although incomparably more like to parts of South America than the different parts of that continent were to each other, were entirely different in their productions. Exhuming with his own hands the bones and armor of extinct gigantic quadrupeds of the same peculiar type with those which now exist there, and reflecting that the equally peculiar animals of Australia were preceded by forms of the same sort, the idea was forced upon him that, in time as in space, the similarity was to be explained by community of descent, the differences by modification and divergence under natural selection.

We have no intention to discuss the subject of natural selection, nor the theory with which Mr. Darwin has connected it; but we would note, both as an historical incident and a simple although restricted illustration, that anticipation of it which was made, half a century ago, by the distinguished author of the "Essay upon Dew," Doctor Wells, an American by birth, which Mr. Brace recently pointed out to Mr. Darwin, and which the latter, in the preface to the last edition of "The Origin of Species," pronounces to be the first recognition of the principle of natural selection which has been indicated. Dr. Wells, in a paper read before the Royal Society in 1813, after remarking that negroes and mulattoes enjoy immunity from certain tropical diseases, observes, 1st, That all animals tend to vary in some degree; 2d, That agriculturists improve their domesticated animals by selection; and adds that what is thus done "by art seems to be done with equal efficacy, though more slowly, by nature in the formation of the varieties of mankind fitted for the countries which they inhabit. Of the accidental varieties of man, which would occur among the first few and scattered inhabitants of the middle regions of Africa, some one would be better fitted than the others to bear the diseases of the country. This race would consequently multiply, while the others would decrease not only from their inability to sustain the attacks of disease, but from their incapacity of contending with their more vigorous neighbors. The color of this vigorous race, I take for granted, from what has already been said, would be dark; but the same disposition to form varieties still existing, a darker and darker race would in the course of time occur; and, as the darkest would be the best fitted for the climate, this would at length become the most prevalent, if not the only, race in the particular country in which it had originated." And so, conversely, of the white races in colder climates.

This "survival of the fittest" seems to us so inevitable that we are disposed to agree with Mr. Wallace when he declares that there is better evidence of such selecting power in nature than even direct observation would be, viz., the evidence of necessity. It inevitably must be operative, if animals and plants increase by reproduction in a geometrical ratio while their actual numbers remain, on the average, stationary, which is past all denying; if they tend to vary; and if variations are heritable, in other words, if offspring tends to resemble parents and grand-parents, which no breeder doubts and few attentive readers of the present work will be likely to question; and, finally, if the world and the conditions of nature be subject to change, however slow; and the slower the better for natural selection.

How much of what was inexplicable or sterile in natural history and biology is to be explained or fecundated by this principle, or in this way of viewing things, is still under question. But, quite apart from the popular notoriety of Darwinism, it seems certain that these ideas have powerfully, and we suppose healthfully, stimulated scientific enquiry; and that their introduction within the last ten years marks an era in natural science. Most naturalists—perhaps we should rather say most natural philosophers—who have given attention to the subject appear to acknowledge natural selection as a vera causa, although few are convinced of its sufficiency, unaided, for the whole work which Mr. Darwin assigns to it. A greater number believe—indeed, the prevalent philosophical natural history of the day is largely based upon the notion, expressed or oftener implied—that species of the same genus, inhabiting the same or even more widely separated regions, are likely to have had a common origin; and, equally, that the plants and animals by which we are now surrounded are the modified representatives and descendants of those most like them in the last preceding geological age. That these advanced views, however, are attributable only in part to Mr. Darwin, is clear from the fact of their earlier promulgation, more or less distinctly, by such leading paleontologists as Pictet and Heer, and their later maintenance by Owen and De Candolle, quite irrespective of natural selection, which these writers make little of. So that, in fact, ideas of the derivation of present species from preceding ones are equally held by two parties—by those who offer a natural explanation of the process, and by those who have no explanation to offer for what they nevertheless suppose to have been a natural occurrence.

But we are not likely to forget that all such views, under whatever form or qualification maintained, do not pass unchallenged. If the new doctrines really prove to be false and mischievous, there is one naturalist, of highest prominence, whose conscience should never accuse him of having neglected to give due warning; who, upon all occasions, has iterated his ceterum censeo with a persistence worthy of old Cato himself—worthy, coming from such authority, of much consideration. Confident, therefore, that whatever is wrong will be duly set right, we may pass on from these debatable to more practical matters.

Eight chapters of the first volume and 40 of the 43 wood-cuts are given to the illustration of the varieties of dogs and cats; horses and asses; pigs, cattle, sheep, and goats; domestic rabbits; domestic pigeons, fowls, ducks, geese, peacock, turkey, Guinea fowl, etc., and a few pages to gold fish, hive bees, and silk moths. Pigeons receive the fullest consideration, two whole chapters being devoted to them. The 9th and 10th chapters are occupied with the cereal and some of the commonest culinary plants, fruits, and trees; and the 11th, with bud-variation and some connected matters; also with the action of foreign pollen on the fruit, seed-coats, or other organs of the mother plant, and the analogous effects in animals of a first impregnation upon subsequent offspring. In the second volume the interest, both practical and scientific, centers in the three chapters on inheritance, and in the five following upon crossing and its results, the good effects of crossing, the evil effects of close interbreeding, the advantages and disadvantages of changed conditions of life, etc. Two chapters follow upon selection by man and its consequences; then five in which the causes of variability and the laws of variation are laboriously discussed, and one in which the "provisional hypothesis of pangenesis" is propounded and explained.

The object of the hypothesis designated by this new word is, to connect intelligibly in some causal conception a variety of phenomena which, as an attentive consideration shows, must stand in some sort of relation to each other; to correlate the different modes of reproduction with each other and with growth, and also, in the lower animals, with the reproduction of lost parts; to form some notion as to how not only the characters but the peculiarities of parents are transmitted to offspring, and even are transmitted from a male parent through a daughter, in which they do not and cannot appear, to a grandson, in which they do; how certain diseases are heritable and may similarly pass over one generation to be developed in the next; how even remote ancestral characters may sometimes reappear in a descendant; how it is possible that a first impregnation may visibly affect a series of subsequent births; how hybrid plants, when self-fertile, in the succeeding generations are apt to mix, as it were in patchwork, rather than to combine the characters of the two constituent species, or to divide them among the individuals of a generation, some of them thus reverting to one of the parent types and some to the other. To explain these and the like, Mr. Darwin brings forward his "hypothesis of pangenesis, which implies that the whole organization, in the sense of every separate atom or unit, reproduces itself;" that "ovules and pollen-grains, and the fertilized seed or egg, as well as buds, include and consist of a multitude of germs thrown off from each separate atom of the organism," reproducing and multiplying themselves, like visible germs and cells, and aggregating by elective affinity to produce cells or organs like those from which they were derived; so that if each cell of a plant has the actual or potential capacity of reproducing the whole plant, it has it only in virtue of containing antonomous atoms derived from every part. So that "the child, strictly speaking, does not grow into the man, but includes germs which slowly and successively become developed and form the man." "Reversion depends on the transmission from the forefather to his descendants of dormant gemmules, which occasionally become developed." "When we hear it said that a man carries in his constitution the seeds of an inherited disease, there is much literal truth in the expression." "We cannot fathom the marvellous complexity of an organic being; but on the hypothesis here advanced this complexity is much increased. Each living creature must be looked at as a microcosm—a little universe, formed of a host of self-propagating organisms, inconceivably minute, and as numerous as the stars in heaven." Physiologists, who chiefly will be interested in it, will comprehend the hypothesis from these brief statements, and will see that its germs are the considerably modified descendants of various earlier speculations. We have no space left for extracts and illustrations even of the less recondite and more practical portions of these teeming volumes.

Very interesting is the discussion of the ill effects of continued close breeding, which is so necessary to perpetuate and exalt the desirable characteristics of a race, yet at length so deteriorating that a cross must needs be resorted to; and we think that Mr. Darwin has fairly shown that the evil is not exclusively attributable to the cumulative inheritance of morbid tendencies common to both parents, but has some deeper foundation in nature: for, as he remarks, "It is unfortunately too notorious that men and various domestic animals, endowed with a wretched constitution, and with a strong hereditary disposition to disease, if not actually ill, are fully capable of procreating their kind." Domestication and civilization here serve as experiments to determine the point. Under natural selection these feeble individuals would be speedily made way with. We find in another chapter (xi., p. 214) an illustration of this, and of "sound sense" from the natural-selective point of view:

"Unconscious selection in the strictest sense of the word—that is, the saving of the more useful animals, and the neglect or slaughter of the less useful, without any thought of the future—must have gone on occasionally from the remotest period and among the most barbarous nations. Savages often suffer from famines, and are sometimes expelled by war from their own homes. In such cases it can hardly be doubted that they would save their most useful animals. When the Fuegians are hard pressed by want they kill their old women for food rather than their dogs, for, as we were assured, 'old women no use—dogs catch otters.' The same sound sense would surely lead them to preserve their more useful dogs when still harder pressed by famine."

While contending that no distinct line can be drawn between natural and artificial races, Mr. Darwin attributes the usually different aspect of the two to the fact that man selects and propagates modifications solely for his own use or fancy, and not for the creature's own good, while the wild animal, struggling with its incessant competitors and enemies, has every slight variation rigorously tested and preserved or rejected, and is thus kept in full healthful harmony with its surroundings. And he claims that the wide differences of opinion as to whether certain domestic races have descended from one or from several aboriginal stocks, is good evidence that there is no palpable difference between races and species. He effectively compares the firm belief of breeders, that the races which they are rearing and slightly modifying cannot have come from common progenitors, with that of the naturalist, who is sure of the contrary, though he knows not how nor when they arose, and who in his turn rejects the notion that the closely allied natural species which he discriminates ever descended from a common progenitor. Mr. Darwin is convinced that "the long-continued accumulation of beneficial variations will infallibly lead to structures as diversified, as beautifully adapted for various purposes, and as excellently co-ordinated as we see in the animals all around us." The relative potency of the variation and the selection he illustrates in this wise:

"If an architect were to rear a noble and commodious edifice without the use of cut stone, by selecting from the fragments at the base of a precipice wedge-formed stones for his arches, elongated stones for his lintels, and flat stones for his roof, we should admire his skill and regard him as the paramount power. Now, the fragments of stone, though indispensable to the architect, bear to the edifice built by him the same relation which the fluctuating variations of each organic being bear to the varied and admirable structures ultimately acquired by its modified descendants."

And then, on the question which must needs come up; "In regard to the use to which these fragments may be put, their shape may be strictly said to be accidental. And here we are led to face a great difficulty, in alluding to which I am aware that I am travelling beyond my proper province. An omniscient Creator must have foreseen every consequence which results from the laws imposed by Him. But can it be reasonably maintained that the Creator intentionally ordered, if we use the words in any ordinary sense, that certain fragments of rock should assume certain shapes so that the builder might erect his edifice? If the various laws which have determined the shape of each fragment were not pre-determined for the builder's sake, can it with any greater probability be maintained that He specially ordained, for the sake of the breeder, each of the innumerable variations in our domestic animals and plants—many of these variations being of no service to man, and not beneficial, far more often injurious, to the creatures themselves? . . . If we assume that each particular variation was from the beginning of all time pre-ordained, the plasticity of organization which leads to many injurious deviations of structure, as well as that redundant power of reproduction which inevitably leads to a struggle for existence, and, as a consequence, to the natural selection or survival of the fittest, must appear to us superfluous laws of nature. [Not superfluous, surely, if 'survival of the fittest,' 'excellent co-ordination,' and all the harmonious adaptation and diversity we behold are to result from the operation of these very laws.] On the other hand, an omnipotent and omniscient Creator ordains everything and foresees everything. Thus we are brought face to face with a difficulty as insoluble as is that of free-will and predestination." The very same difficulty, indeed, and the same impossibility as that of drawing the limits between the fixed and the contingent, either in the material or the moral world, in which both volition and established order play their mingled parts. But in Mr. Darwin's parallel, to meet the case in nature according to his own view of it, not only the fragments of rock (answering to variation) should fall, but the edifice (answering to natural selection) should rise, irrespective of will and choice!

We are informed that the enterprising publishers of the American Agriculturist propose to reprint Mr. Darwin's new work, under an arrangement with the author. In England the first edition was exhausted within a week.

NEW WORK BY DR. ROBERT HUNTER.

A Popular Treatise on Bronchitis, embracing Bronchial Consumption, Hooping-cough, and Asthma: Their Nature, Causes, and Treatment.
BY ROBERT HUNTER, M.D.,
Author of "Practical Letters on the Nature, Causes, and Cure of Catarrh, Sore Throat, Bronchitis, Asthma, and Consumption; Carbon vs. Oxygen," etc., etc.
Bound in flexible cloth, price 75 cents.
Sent free on receipt of price.
JAMES MILLER, Publisher,
522 Broadway.

L. W. SCHMIDT,
GERMAN BOOKSELLER,
24 BARCLAY STREET, NEW YORK,
Imports regularly all the leading Foreign Publications, including Periodicals.
Foreign works noticed in THE NATION kept constantly on hand or procured to order.

LIFE IN THE WEST;
OR,
STORIES OF THE MISSISSIPPI VALLEY.
BY N. C. MEEKER.
One handsome 12mo vol., 360 pages, tinted paper, price, postpaid, $2.
S. R. WELLES, Publisher,
389 Broadway, N. Y.

DAVID C. FRANCIS
(FORMERLY C. S. FRANCIS & CO.),
DEALER IN NEW AND OLD BOOKS,
506 BROADWAY (UP STAIRS).
Priced catalogues of books in stock issued from time to time, and will be forwarded free to any address.
Orders for any obtainable books promptly filled.
Binding executed in any style.

IN PRESS—A NEW POEM, ENTITLED THE MEXICAN;
OR LOVE AND LAND.
By JOHN M. DAGNALL, Author of "Daisy Swain."
ALLEN EBBS
183 BROADWAY (Up-stairs), NEW YORK,
IMPORTER OF
Fine Standard and Illustrated Books.
RARE, CURIOUS, AND VALUABLE BOOKS,
In all Languages and Departments of Literature,
For sale by
GEO. P. PHILES & CO.,
173 Fulton Street, New York.

The Nation.

VOL. VI.—NO. 143. THURSDAY, MARCH 26, 1868. { FIVE DOLLARS PER ANNUM. TWELVE CENTS PER COPY.

CONTENTS.

THE WEEK 241

EDITORIAL ARTICLES:
The Magic of Constitutions 244
The Battle of the Railroads 245
The Jersey Railroad and the Dwight Accident 247
Photography in Politics 248

CORRESPONDENCE:
National Repudiation 249
The Bowdoin Pictures 250
Trumbull's M'Fingal 251

NOTES:
Literary 251
The German Settlers of New York 252
Malcom's Theological Index 253
The Magazines for April 254
Gale's Upper Mississippi 256
The Romance of Charity.—Ohio in the War.—A Manual of Anglo-Saxon for Beginners 256-257

Five Dollars per annum, in advance; Six months, Three Dollars; Forty Dollars to Clubs of Ten; Clergymen, Four Dollars.

THE NATION is sent till positively ordered discontinued, and all arrears have been paid. Subscribers are particularly requested to note the expiration of their subscriptions, and to forward what is due for the ensuing year, with or without further reminder from this office.

GEORGE STREET, 30 CORNHILL, LONDON, E. C., AGENT FOR THE RECEIPT OF SUBSCRIPTIONS AND ADVERTISEMENTS.

E. L. GODKIN & CO., PUBLISHERS, Box 6732, NEW YORK CITY.

The Week.

THE Senate, on Wednesday, March 18, was chiefly busy with the bill to exempt manufactures from internal revenue tax. The Senate, moved probably by a cautious regard for the fact that the revenue bids fair to be less next year than the requirements of the Government, seemed disinclined to make the measure so sweeping as the House had made it. In the House, on the same day, Mr. Broomall called up a bill of his which has been for months sleeping with the Judiciary Committee, and there was a general debate upon it. It enacts impartial suffrage throughout the Union. Mr. Stevens delivered part of a wild speech and had the rest of it read by the clerk, and then moved as a substitute a bill enacting what Mr. Stevens calls universal suffrage—only women and other specified classes being denied the "inalienable right." Mr. Broomall, who perhaps brought back his bill for the sake of this speech, finally withdrew his motion, and the bill remains with the committee. Then Mr. Farnsworth brought in a bill for the admission of Alabama, the same in substance as that one which Mr. Stevens had withdrawn a day or two before, and of which we prophesied last week that no more would be heard of it. Not much more, we should have done better to say. A resolution was adopted calling on Mr. McCulloch to inform the House as to commissions paid on sales of gold and bonds since 1862. On Thursday, after a business-like debate and a sharp contest over several amendments, the Senate passed the bill relieving manufactures in substantially the form in which it left the House. It is amended by a reduction of the tax on products of petroleum and other bituminous substances one-half. The Senate paid no attention to a suggestion of Mr. Davis's that a good way to provide against an apprehended deficiency would be to cut down the whiskey-tax to half-a-dollar a gallon—probably much the briefest and truest speech Mr. Davis ever delivered. In the House, on Thursday, the Freedmen's Bureau bill was passed—97 to 37. In debate, Mr. Fernando Wood professed to be in possession of proofs that General Howard has made the Bureau subserve his personal interests. This statement Mr. Eliot and Mr. Blaine severely denounced; no doubt it was incorrect; the character of few men stands so high as that of General Howard. On Friday the Senate did nothing of general interest; appropriations kept the House busy most of the day; but this, which is of general interest, was done—a bill was introduced regulating the tariff for freight and passengers on the Pacific Railroad. On Saturday the Senate by resolution thanked Doctor Hayes for reaching the most northerly point ever reached by an Arctic explorer. In the House, general debate in Committee of the Whole turned partly on Mr. Schenck's and Mr. Wilson's sharp practice in the amendment of the Judiciary bill. Debate on Alaska makes it rather doubtful if the House will vote to pay for that territory; it seems to show an unwillingness to throw up gold to knock down fruit perhaps worthless, and at any rate sure to fall into our lap as soon as we need it. On Monday the Senate at one o'clock resolved itself into a court. Mr. Garret Davis attempted to put on record a written protest against the trial of the President—for whom every State in the Union, we suppose he would say, cast its votes—by a Senate which does not contain senators from all the States. In what capacity Messrs. Davis and McCreery draw pay and mileage they did not say. The other senators, without distinction of party, refused to allow the protest to be submitted. The President's counsel then read—Mr. Curtis, Mr. Stanbery, and Mr. Evarts taking turns—his reply to the charges. The House managers announced their readiness to go on with the case on the next day; but the President's counsel asked for thirty days' time in which to prepare for the trial. This the managers opposed, and after discussion the court refused the request. Ten days was then suggested as the proper term of delay, but the Court adjourned without decision of the question. The managers obtain credit for the way in which they handle the case; but their hardest work is to come. They invite it to come quickly, however. On Tuesday the House's replication was made. It simply makes a general denial of the truth of the President's answer, and offers to prove the charges. The Senate, after two hours' discussion, ordered the trial to proceed on Monday, the 30th instant.

The case against the President, as presented by the House, may be briefly described as naturally falling under three heads—that part relating to Secretary Stanton and the Tenure-of-Office law; that part relating to General Thomas, and the alleged attempt to use General Emory for a forcible resistance to law; and that part relating to Mr. Johnson's stump speeches. In his answer, then, he had some, but only a very slight, chance to say anything that has not already been repeatedly said, and there is no wonder that the managers, after hearing his replication, expressed their readiness to make answer on the following day. As to the "swinging round the circle" speeches and the speeches in Washington, the President declares that what he said on those occasions was not correctly reported; that what he said was intended to have no other meaning than is borne by his messages to Congress; that he did not seek occasions for speaking, but spoke in deference to the expressed wish of his fellow-citizens; that he had no intention of bringing Congress into reproach and contempt; and, finally, that in making them he exercised the right of free speech and free thought which belongs to the President as to every other man in the land. As for General Emory, the President says he merely requested that officer to call on him for the purpose of finding out if any change had been made in the disposition of troops in Washington, and that in speaking to him in regard to the constitutionality of the law that directs orders for changes to be transmitted through the General of the Army, he did no more, and had no thought of doing more, than he had already done in a message to Congress—namely, express an opinion which he thought, and still thinks, sound. As to General Thomas's appointment, the President says it was not an appointment, but an ad interim designation of an officer to fill a vacancy; that if it had been an appointment it would have been valid, for the Tenure-of-Office law does not apply to Mr. Stanton, and there was a vacancy; that the Tenure-of-Office law is, however, not valid; that even if it were valid the President, in violating it, was in the discharge of his constitutional duty to test a law—and so on, as in the arguments already familiar. Since the trial began, Mr. Jeremiah S. Black has, it seems, withdrawn from the case; his place is taken, if hardly filled, by Mr. U. S. Groesbeck.

The report purporting to come from the Committee on Retrenchment, on which we commented a fortnight ago, and which, after giving a dreadful account of the condition of the revenue service, concluded by gravely recommending as a remedy the reduction of the whiskey tax and the abolition of bonded warehouses, has been repudiated by the committee, who say it is the work of one member, Mr. Van Wyck, alone, and that he had no authority to present it as the report of the committee. We were the more surprised by it, as Mr. Jenckes, of Rhode Island, is a member of the committee, and the facts of the report told very strongly in favor of his Civil Service reform, while the conclusion was, coming after such a recital, perfectly ridiculous. It is now alleged, in excuse for Mr. Van Wyck, that although the report had never been formally considered by the whole committee, and was the work of a sub-committee of two, nevertheless "the facts set forth in it were undeniable," and that it was the personal jealousy of some member of the Committee of Ways and Means which caused it to be repudiated. This may be all true; but the practice of presenting to the House and the country, as reports of a Congressional committee, a document which the committee has never seen, is nevertheless, to say the least, highly objectionable. If it took "personal jealousy" to induce the committee to repudiate Mr. Van Wyck's report, it simply shows not that he was right, but that the committee also was wrong.

Arkansas, it is likely, has ratified the new constitution; reports to the contrary are discredited, and the time of voting has been extended. In Florida the election is set for the first week in May. Dissensions among the Republicans are apparently healed, and Mr. Harrison Reed, a Northerner, is likely to be governor. General R. K. Scott, a Western man, Assistant Commissioner of Freedmen, is likely to be governor of South Carolina, for it is conceded that the convention's nominations are equal to election. The constitution is a good one, liberal and sensible in providing education, and liberal and sensible as regards disfranchisement. It disqualifies no one not disqualified by act of Congress. Of North Carolina the same thing is true. There will be a severe contest between the Conservatives, who are "stumping" vigorously, and Mr. Holden and the Republicans. The election is held in South Carolina on the 14th, 15th, and 16th days of April; in North Carolina on the 21st, 22d, and 23d. Georgia will probably ratify the Constitution. From Louisiana it is old news that General Hancock is asking to be relieved, and that the Republicans will be glad if his request is granted. The convention is ill-spoken of by judicious Republicans who have watched it at work. What it has done in the way of a constitution confirms the view of it which makes it an unwise body. It was very severe in disfranchisement. And what can be got from forcing the white children of the State to go to private schools or no schools, or else to the same schools with colored children, except increase of class hatreds, increase of ignorance among Louisianians, and increase of insecurity in the political foundations the convention is trying to lay? In Texas the convention is called, it is believed. From what the Texas papers say of the men elected, it seems that it will be highly respectable for the ability, character, and social standing of its members. The Mississippi convention is complete, and now only Virginia and Texas are still at work. It may be interesting to our readers to learn the proportion borne by the number of colored to the number of white delegates in the various constitutional conventions. A great deal of exaggerated talk in relation to it has been going the rounds of the press. In Virginia there are 125 delegates, of whom 25 are colored; in North Carolina there were 120 delegates, of whom 13 were colored; in Arkansas 78 delegates, of whom 5 were colored; in Mississippi 128 delegates, of whom 12 were colored; in Florida 80 delegates, of whom 20 were colored; in Georgia 195 delegates, of whom 15 were colored; in Alabama about one-fifth, and in South Carolina about one-half of the delegates were colored men, and in Louisiana alone the negroes were in a majority—a majority of 10.

We regret to say that the great crusade against the wearing of court dress, which Mr. Sumner began last year, and in which Mr. N. P. Banks so distinguished himself, has resulted in keeping Mr. Adams away from a royal levee the other day in London. There is an absurd rule that everybody shall on these occasions appear either in military uniform or in court dress, which is a ridiculous costume, but the wearing of which has the advantage of preventing guests from seeming singular, and from being mistaken for waiters or valets, which anybody wearing ordinary evening dress is apt to be. Mr. Adams, being forbidden to wear court dress, and not being entitled to military uniform, stayed at home. We hope the effect of this republican protest against monarchical follies will be as deep and lasting as Congress intended it to be, and will hasten the day, foreseen by Mr. Banks, when the United States will prescribe to the whole of this continent—the cut of its clothes. This prophecy, it is due to Mr. Banks to add, was suggested to him by an observation of the great Turgot.

